Again, he must know that various circumstances have tended to enlarge the number of the diplomatic corps, and to increase the expense of our foreign intercourse; commercial relations have been established under treaties with nations, with which, ten years since, we had no such connection. That this item of expenditure should be greater now than it was in 1820, cannot fail to strike all, as unavoidable. Under this head, he must subtract $34,000. When all these equitable and professedly necessary deductions shall have been made, he will find the charge of extravagance not only not justly imputable to this Administration, but that it recoils upon that which has received such overwrought eulogies from himself and his friends for its economy. Many of the items that swelled the amount which has elicited his denunciations, have been rendered necessary by the gradual increase of the wants of the nation, arising from the enlargement of our population, and the other causes incidental to increasing prosperity and resources; others, such as the public buildings, are contingent and extraordinary, but necessary and proper. I have gone through the principal details, which have contributed to expand the aggregate of expenditure provided for by this bill, and which has been called extravagant. I shall now collect them in one table, and by subtracting their sum from the whole amount in the bill, it will be clearly seen, that so far from deserving censure for its prodigality, this Administration merits commendation for its economy.

The whole expenditure for the civil list, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse, for the year 1840, amounts to - - -	$4,972,000
For the same objects in 1829, there were required - - -	3,169,000
Making a difference in favor of 1829, of - - - - -	$1,803,000
But the sums which I have shown not to be liable to the charge of extravagance, must be deducted from this difference, viz:
For the pay and mileage of members of Congress - - - -	364,000
For the contingencies of Congress -	240,000
For the increased expenses of the Post Office - - - -	91,000
For the Judiciary - - -	190,000
For surveys of the public lands -	220,000
For the expenses of the mints -	43,000
For the Territories - - -	68,000
For public buildings - - -	391,000
For the diplomatic corps - -	34,000
Altogether making the sum of -	$1,641,000
Which, subtracted from the amount against 1840, will leave the small sum of - - - - -	$162,000

Thus by a careful examination of a few items of the bill which I have discussed, I show distinctly, that after a lapse of ten years in a country of unprecedented growth, the prodigality of this extravagant Administration has increased the civil list but 163,000 dollars. I leave the question here, although still further deductions might be made.

It cannot have escaped the attention of the committee, that in the preceding argument I have yielded every advantage to the opponents of this bill. I admire the tact which selected the year 1829 to bring it in contrast with the present But confident in the cause I am defending, I followed their lead, and joined issue with them on their own ground. Why that year was so cautiously chosen I have already intimated. But even with this disadvantage, I think I have demonstrated the charge of extravagance to be groundless.

But my colleague does not like details. It is due to him that he should be gratified, and that the question should be argued in the manner which he prefers. By adopting his mode of reasoning, I shall show that it is not only fallacious and inconclusive, but unjust. The administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts has been held up to us, as a model of economy, and the subsequent administrations have been denounced as extravagant. Suffer me for a moment to adopt his mode of reasoning, and comparing the aggregate expenditures of one year of the Administration when economy was the order of the day, with a year in the Administration that succeeded it. In 1828, (one of Mr. Adams's administration) a year of economy, the whole amount expended for the civil list, miscellaneous and foreign intercourse, was $3,826,579; in 1830, (one of General Jackson's,) a year of extravagance, the amount expended for the same objects was $3,469 616; the extravagance costing the country about $357,000 less than the economy. Such is the result of the mode of reasoning adopted by my colleague, when applied to the appropriations provided for by bills at the period to which I have referred. According to his method of argument, the inference is irresistible, that the year 1828 was one of most faulty extravagance. Perhaps he will not yield his assent to this; but it is just as fair, and the conclusion as fairly deduced, as the one he has reached in reference to the appropriations in this bill.

I have now presented to the committee the reasons which appear to me satisfactorily to account for the difference between the amount appropriated in 1829 for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, and that proposed to be appropriated by the bill under consideration, for the same objects in 1840, and which, to my mind, clearly rebut the charge of extravagance urged by my colleague with so much confidence.

13TH APRIL.

Mr. WISE next obtained the floor, and insisted on the ground he had before taken in reference to the extravagance of the present Administration; in illustration of which, he went into a comparison of the expenditures under the different Presidents, from General Washington downward; concluding the whole by stating, that this Administration had doubled the expenditures of its illustrious predecessor.

Mr. JONES rose in reply. Mr. Chairman: The remarks of my colleague again render a brief explanation incumbent on me. I wish merely to call the attention of the committee to a single view which has been taken by him. I am so antiquated in my notions of the propriety of debate, that I have endeavored to adhere scrupulously to the subject under discussion, and have steadily resisted every attempt to lead me into an argument on extraneous matters. My minuteness may have exposed me to the necessity of responding to numerous interrogatories, which my colleague, in his zeal, has chosen to propound; but my opinion of the correctness of the views I have presented, is still unchanged, notwithstanding the authority of contrary opinions which have been advanced in the discursive debate, that has taken up the time of the committee for several days.

Those presented by my colleague have evinced a full proportion of this erratic spirit. He has not attempted to rebut any proposition which I have submitted; he has not pretended to discuss any question which is calculated to contribute to a full understanding of the bill. Instead of confining himself to the path marked out by the laws of reasoning, and the rules of debate, restricting himself, as I have attempted to do, to the bill under consideration, he has preferred to furnish us with indistinct outlines of the history of every Administration, and to give a comparative view of their general expenditures? And what conclusion has he established by his labor? Why, that there has been a gradual increase of expenditure from the days of Washington down to the present time.

[Mr. WISE. Not gradual.]

Mr. JONES. Notwithstanding the dissent of my colleague, I still maintain the augmentation of expenditure to have been gradual in the whole lapse of time to which I have referred; and that the increase has steadily progressed with the increase of population, and the enlargement of resources, until the total of expenditures has reached, as my colleague says, the enormous sum of thirty-seven millions of dollars; or, to speak more correctly, for I wish here to have the full benefit of the amount, until it has reached the sum of more than thirty-nine millions of dollars.

[Mr. WISE. I spoke of the average.]

Mr. JONES. I do not design to follow my colleague through the whole range of his argument. The tediousness of such a reply would be wholly unnecessary. I will meet him in his strongest hold—I will take the case which, in his opinion, operates most forcibly against me; and I feel no apprehensions for the result.

Assume the greatest amount yet expended under any Administration to have been in the year 1838, reaching the total of more than thirty-nine millions of dollars. This sum, my colleague asserts, is threefold the expenditure in any year during the administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS] I make no comment at present on the accuracy of this assertion; but, for the sake of the argument, grant the correctness of the statement. I am called upon to account for the difference, and I will do so. To make this exposition, I have once more obtruded on the attention of the committee.

To simplify my explanation, I shall institute a fair comparison between the expenditures of 1826, the second year of Mr. Adams's administration, and 1838, the second year of the administration of Mr. Van Buren. In the comparison, I not only manifest perfect fairness towards my opponents, but yield them every advantage they can desire.

The gross amount of all expenditures for 1838, was - - -	$39,455,438 35
For all the expenditures in 1826, there were required only -	24,103,399 46
When one sum is deducted from the other, a balance is left against 1838 of - - -	15,352,038 89

[Mr. WISE inquired whether the gross amount referred to during the administration of Mr. Adams, did not include ten millions of public debt.]

Mr. JONES. If my colleague will endeavor to put a slight curb on his impatience, he shall soon be satisfied on this, as well as on other points, against which his objections have been directed. I am unwilling to desert the order of explanation which I proposed for myself when I rose; but to indulge him in all his requisitions, I inform him that, while it is true, that more than ten millions of the gross expenditures of 1826 were for payments on account of the public debt, it is also true, that more than five millions were expended during this year of the administration of Mr. Van Buren for the same object.

[Mr. WISE. Strike both sums out.]

Mr. JONES. As the omission of both sums might be supposed to furnish me an advantage in the argument, my colleague will permit me to concede to him the benefit of retaining them. I have nothing to withhold, nothing to conceal. My conclusions have been reached through an honest and assiduous investigation. The inferences, which I have honestly made, I intend frankly to state. Where all is upright, concealment and subterfuge, if under any circumstances I could be induced to resort to them, are unnecessary. I do not design to ask the attention of the committee to an elaborate display of minute numerical statements: in a speech such details must be tedious, uninteresting, and unintelligible. I shall select for comment, from the gross expenditures, the largest and most striking items. These, without the mention of small sums, will be sufficient for illustration and proof. But in presenting my comparison, as I have already said, I wish to make every concession, to yield every advantage; and, therefore, instead of complying with the suggestion of my colleague, to strike out the amounts required for payments on account of the public debt, I shall, in accordance with my ideas of perfect fairness and liberality, include them in my comparison of the expenditures of the two years, in which my comments are intended to be made.

The payments on accounts of the public debt in 1826, were	$11,041,082 19
For the same object in 1838,	5,607,720 27
The one amount subtracted from the other, will leave an excess against the latter year, of	5,435,361 92
This last sum, added to the excess of expenditure given above, of	15,352,038 89
Will form a gross amount in 1838 over 1826 of	20,787,400 81

This excess, though great, I am prepared to show cannot make good the charge of extravagance; and if my colleague will take the trouble to deduct the sums expended for objects extraordinary and indispensable, during the administration of Mr. Van Buren, but not required under that of Mr. Adams, he will discover, however, reluctantly, the amount of disbursements in the two years, to vary but slightly.

In the year 1838, the amount expended for pay of the army, subsistence of officers, subsistence and forage, was - - - $2,559,758 08

In 1826, the second year of the administration of Mr. Adams, the amount expended for the same objects was only - - - $1,307,759 34

Leaving an excess against 1838 of $1,251,998 74

Here is a great augmentation of expenditure in this branch of the public service. But the whole amount was applied to the support of the army. The increase of the army was not the offspring of the Administration only: it was a measure sustained by both parties, deemed unimportant by both sides of the House. It was not a project of the Executive and its friends alone, but received the cordial and zealous support of many of their opponents. If there existed a necessity for the increase of the army, if even in the conception of the party adverse to the Administration, the increase on account of peculiar circumstances was judged indispensable, surely the friends of the measure cannot, in fairness, throw the culpability of an expenditure which they advocated on the Administration. If, in this instance, there be faulty extravagance, the Administration can boast as partners in its guilt many of those who now condemn it.

[Mr. WISE. I never voted for the increase of the standing army, but this Administration recommended it, and this is one of the very sins with which I charge it. I charge it not only with its extravagance, but with its increase of the standing army.]

Mr. JONES. I wish to do injustice to no one—certainly not to my colleague; but if he was opposed to that measure, he should recollect that I voted against it also; and while he and I accorded in our sentiments on this subject, many of his friends voted for an enlargement of the military force. They, and those who voted with them, deemed such an increase indispensable, on account of our having a more extended frontier to protect, made necessary by the removal of the Indians, the existence of Indian hostilities, and for the requisite garrisons for the fortifications on our extended seaboard. But if the army had not been increased, there is still sufficient reason to justify enhanced expenditure for its support in one year beyond what may have been required in another. The cost of provisions, of clothing, of transportation, of camp equipage, is not always the same; and variation in the price of these and other articles required for the army must justify a correspondent variation in the total expenditure necessary for its maintenance. The cost of subsistence, &c. in 1838, exceeded the same item in 1826 by the sum of $571,282.

Supposing that I have furnished my colleague—or, at all events, some of his friends—with a sufficient reason for subtracting the sum I have mentioned from the amount of alleged extravagance, I will now proceed to the examination of another item:

In 1838, the expenditures for fortifications, armaments, repairs, ordnance department, cannon, shot, and powder, were - -	$1,123,162 85
In 1826, the expenditures for the same objects were - -	835,121 07
An excess in 1838 over 1826 of -	288,041 78

To justify the increase in the cost of ordnance, &c. I need but mention a fact which none will dispute, that, since the year 1826, there has been a necessary addition to the naval force actually in service; and, to say nothing of the additional supply of ordnance required for fortifications, my colleague, with all his zeal of opposition, cannot make the same assertion with respect to this branch of the service, that he just now ventured in regard to the army. He has always manifested a disposition to put no restrictions on his liberality when the prosperity of the navy has been involved.

[Mr. WISE. I hope my colleague will permit me to interrupt him once more. If I had my way, I would vote twenty-five millions per annum for the navy, instead of five. But I ask my colleague, while the expenses of the naval establishment have increased, have we a larger force on the ocean? I ask him to tell his constituents and mine what force we have in the Pacific, what on the West India station, on the Mediterranean station. If I am wrong—and would that I were—let gentlemen contradict me. We have one, and only one, vessel that is respectable. In the face of a threatened war, at this moment, while Great Britain has battery upon battery frowning down upon any vessel that bears the stars and stripes—while she has hundreds of ships on that station, you have but a solitary ship to meet the power of Great Britain. And still the gentleman tells us there is an increase. I say that the navy department is in a worse condition than it was five years ago.]

Mr. JONES. My colleague has finished his episode; I am aware it cannot be made to harmonize with my work. It is obvious to the committee that while his spirit of opposition is so indiscriminate and uncompromising, it is scarcely possible that our views can be made to accord. I ask not for liberality, but for sheer justice; he extends to me neither. If there be a measure for which he will not vote, and it increases the annual appropriations, it is denounced by him as reckless extravagance; but if there be one which he approves, increasing the expenditure not five millions, but twenty-five millions per annum, we are condemned with the same equitable consistency, because we shrink from giving our concurrence to his schemes of thoughtless prodigality.

[Mr. WISE did not complain. He said that the Administration had not spent twenty-five millions, but that it had spent less than five or six millions. He complained, that with an excess over the amount expended in Mr. Adams's administration, the party in power had nothing to show for the increase, and that the navy was in a worse condition than it was then. His colleague would certainly excuse the interruption, when he called to mind the fact, that in setting out, he (Mr. J.) said, he would show item by item that the increase of expenditure would be justified by objects which all would admit to be necessary and proper. He (Mr. W.) would admit that the navy is a proper object of expenditure; but the question was, what was there to show for the navy, from what had been spent?]

Mr. JONES. I make no objections to any explanations or interrogatories which my colleague may choose to make. A reply to such interruptions is a courtesy which usage has established, and which I am willing to extend to him or to any other. I have but to complain that his brief explanations are too frequently expanded into protracted speeches. He wishes he may be in error when he asserts that there is but one respectable vessel in the Mediterranean. I think I can relieve his apprehensions on that score. We have in that sea not only a ship of the line, but also a frigate of the first class, and a corvette; three respectable ships, constituting a force, found amply sufficient in time of peace to protect our commerce, and to fulfil all the purposes for which cruizers are wanted. Nor is he less in error, when he asserts that our naval force can boast of no improvement since the Administration of Mr. Adams. On the contrary, it has been greatly augmented. For since that period there have been launched one ship of the line, and two frigates, besides seventeen vessels of inferior classes.

But, Mr. Chairman, being unwilling to consume too much time in incidental remarks, I will digress no farther, but continue my analysis. When I said I could demonstrate, by a fair comparison, that the expenditures of 1838, vary but little from those of 1826, I did not make the assertion with any confident anticipation that I should be able to subdue the fixed opposition of my colleague. He is not easily susceptible of change. Pride of opinion, and respect for appearances, raise impregnable barriers in the way of open admission of error. But I trust that others will not be disposed to disregard the strong language of facts.

In the year 1838, the whole amount expended for the War Department, including annuities and disbursements on Indian account, except the charges for the Creek and Seminole wars, was - - - - $5,564,223 75

1826, the expenditure for the War Department, Indian annuities, and treaties with the Indian tribes, was - - - 753,247 54

Being an excess in 1838, over 1826, of - - - $4,810,976 21

An immense difference between the two Administrations is perceptible in this single item. The excess forms a large deduction to be made from the sum of alleged extravagance. These five millions of dollars have been indispensably required for the purpose of concluding Indian treaties, for removing Indians beyond our territorial limits, and for extinguishing Indian titles within the States. These measures received general sanction, and I presume it is a policy which no party would now be disposed to change.

We have succeeded in removing from our borders hordes of restless and ruthless savages, secured peace and quiet to the inhabitants of those States from which they have been removed, and acquired the possession of immense tracts of valuable land. The policy was approved by our opponents; but the expense necessary to be incurred, in order to carry it out, is denounced in unmeasured terms. If the disbursements in 1838 were extravagant, they were the effect of the policy to which reference has just been made. The cause should be blamed, not the effect; the law is in fault, not the expenditure. You vote willingly for a bill which all know must lead to vast expenditures of money, and condemn as extravagant the very expenditures which you yourselves have authorized.

But there are still further expenditures, in which the Government has been involved by the attempt to remove the savage aborigines from our territory. We have been forced into a war by the philanthropy which prompted the dissociation of the Indians from the whites. The consequence was, that the amount required in 1838 for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities was $3,804,359 20, while, in 1826, there was no requisition on the Treasury for any such object; not a dollar was then wanted for such a purpose. But, had such an expenditure then been necessary, is there any man of any party who would have refused to draw the last dollar from the Treasury, if he could by such extravagance have saved but one woman or one child from the butchery of the savage? And yet the present Administration has been the object of no measured vituperation, because it has been obliged to appropriate, for the protection of our women and children, large sums not called for under the administration of Mr. Adams, when there existed no Indian war within our borders. Were the millions expended during the late war in defence of our honor, and to protect our soil from foreign invasion, an extravagance of the Administration? Was the debt entailed upon us by that struggle an extravagance? If so, the hundred millions of debt which have since been paid, must, I presume, be also denominated extravagance. I know that war was by many thought wrong—I know that many deemed it irreligious and immoral to rejoice for victories achieved by our brave troops over the common enemy of our country—but I also know my colleague is not to be ranked among such zealots in opposition to that war.

[Mr. WISE. I was always a Democrat.]

Mr. JONES. I know he was a good Democrat when he was elected to his present dignified station.

[Mr. WISE. I am a better one now.]

Mr. JONES. My colleague was elected as an opponent of Mr. ADAMS. He came into office, if I do not mistake, on the shoulders of General Jackson; he was then a good Democrat.

[Mr. WISE said he had always (God forgive him) gone with his colleague in support of General Jackson; but he [Mr. W] never came here on the shoulders of General Jackson; on his own independent character he came here, indedendent of the power or the influence of General Jackson. The very first session he was undeceived as to his principles; he [Mr. W.] saw that neither General Jackson nor his party belonged to the Democracy at all. He stood where he was, on his Democratic ground; they had left him, he had pursued an independent course, and had never for a moment truckled to the power of General Jackson.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, perhaps in the warmth and hurry of debate, I may unintentionally have employed language conveying a much stronger meaning than I wished; I was far from intending to make any insinuation against the independent character of my colleague; I meant only to say, that by being the friend of General Jackson, he was aided by the popularity of that distinguished individual, in attaining the object of his youthful ambition—a seat on this floor; and when he asserts that he has been deserted by the Democracy, and derives to himself consolation from the position assumed, he will find it difficult indeed, to satisfy the tens and hundreds of thousands of the true Democracy of the country, who have never for a moment faltered in their onward course, of the sufficiency of the reason he now assigns.

He expresses a hope that God will forgive him for supporting the cause of General Jackson. Sir, if my colleague has a comfortable assurance of forgiveness for the political sins of which he has been guilty since that day, and there be truth in Holy Writ, let me assure him, that those which appear to disturb him, will be blotted out no more to be remembered against him.

But let me return from this digression, and proceed with the analysis. The amount expended for the surveys of ports, harbors, breakwaters, military roads, and other schemes of internal improvements in 1838, was $1,188,876 66.

In 1826 not a dollar was expended on any such objects.

[Mr. WISE here inquired if the Executive did not furnish estimates for those improvements? He asked his colleague to tell his constituents whether the majority of the New York delegation at that time were Whigs or Locofocos. He wished their votes to be shown on this subject of harbors in the State of New York; he wished his colleague to tell his constituents what made the fortune of the present Minister at the Court of St. Cloud, of our then Secretary of War, of Lewis Cass; but the harbors and improvements on the Northern lakes: my colleague shall not escape.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman: I am incapable of subterfuge or evasion, and my colleague, if he knows me at all, will vouch for my assertion. I have indulged in no reasoning, relied on no fact, which can have a tendency to lead me to any other than a fair and just conclusion. I am in no position from which I desire to escape; nor do I intend that he shall escape from the perplexities in which he is involved; nor shall he make me a participant in the difficulties with which he is shackled. I again repeat that I shall not permit him to escape; and consequently I shall not permit myself to be led off from the discussion of the question at issue. He shall not allure me from a discussion of the affairs of the nation, into an examination of the private affairs of Lewis Cass, or of any other individual. I am already sufficiently employed by the duties which my station imposes on me in the investigation of the numerous important questions which daily come up for discussion, without wandering from the appropriate sphere of those duties, to discuss the affairs of any individual whatever. Nor is this the proper time for any such discussion. Shall I in conformity with my own views of the rules of argument, adhere closely to the topic under consideration. An enemy to subterfuge, I am equally unwilling to become its dupe. If the affairs of Mr. Cass should be brought up in a proper form and at a proper time, I shall not be found to shrink from the investigation.

I have but one other remark to make on this branch of the subject. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] has volunteered to demonstrate that it was through the instrumentality of the Whig party that the harbor bill was carried through; he claimed it as their measure. My colleague controverts the assertion. It is not for me to become the arbitrator of their differences. I shall leave them to settle their own dispute. If they can settle the difficulty between themselves, be it so. I shall certainly not be found using any effort to disturb their harmony.

But to proceed to the next item of alleged extravagance. My colleague will surely not complain of the extravagance which pays to the pensioners of every class the pittance allowed them by their country's gratitude. He will not denounce as extravagance the sums paid to those who, in the days which tried men's souls, perilled their lives and poured out their blood on the battle field, in defence of the rights and liberties which he and I this day enjoy. And yet a large item in the amount now denounced as extravagance, is an excess paid under existing laws to this class of our citizens. In 1838, the amount paid for pensions was - - - - $2,113,418 79
In 1826, it was - - - $1,556,593 83

Making an excess in 1838 over 1826 of - - - $556,824 96

[Mr. WISE said that he never would deny any sum, which the Administration might have appropriated for the descendants of our Revolutionary sires, for Revolutionary services; and he said it with more pride than he took in any other subject, that more claims for Revolutionary services came from the consecrated district he represented here, than, probably, from any other district in the United States. Almost every man that was captured at Germantown during the Revolutionary war, came from Accomac and Northampton, Virginia. Almost every spot in that district was a soldier's sepulchre. He believed, however, that this Administration deserved a deeper and more damning curse for the frauds it had countenanced in these very Revolutionary claims, than for any cause whatever. Mr. W. proceeded to state, that the most gross and palpable frauds had been committed, while many of those who were entitled to pensions had never received a cent. He had been informed that some of the officers of the Government had been concerned in admitting claims, which never ought to have been passed.]

Mr. JONES. My colleague has thrown into my speech another episode of illegitimate length. But of this I will not complain, since it concedes all I could desire. He admits that there is no extravagance in the increased amount required for the payment of pensioners; but his complaint is that frauds are countenanced by the Government in the settlement of these claims. This is the charge. Sir, if the frauds of which my colleague speaks do, in point of fact, exist, he will find my denunciations of them no less earnest than his own, and my zeal and labor for their correction no less assiduous. But I must be first convinced of their existence, before I will undertake either to punish those to whom guilt is imputed, or to denounce them, especially when we have six committees clothed with ample powers of investigation. These committees, we were told at the commencement of the session, were appointed for the special purpose of thoroughly investigating all the departments of the Government. Their chairmen are known to be as zealous and decided opponents of the Administration as are to be found on this floor. They are confessedly men of ability; they are not only competent, but willing to investigate frauds, if they exist; they unquestionably are not disinclined to arraign any man friendly to this Administration, who may come within their jurisdiction, and is suspected of countenancing any fraudulent transaction. If these frauds exist, why have they not been discovered by your committees? Heretofore it was alleged that frauds could not be detected, and their authors exposed, because the committees were packed. Until the present session, the committees were said to be composed of a majority of the friends of the Administration, who were unwilling to make public, even if they knew of, the existence of dishonesty. Now there exists no such excuse. If the alleged frauds are not discovered, it cannot be said to be attributable to the unwillingness of the committees to expose to public view the crimes of the party in power. The doors for examination are thrown open as wide as gentlemen could desire. These committees are composed each of five members, three decided and zealous opponents of this Administration, and two of its friends. Constituted as they now are, I must believe that if frauds were countenanced by, and disgraced the Government, as my colleague alleges, they would long since have been detected and exposed. The discovery not having been made, the conclusion is legitimate that they are either imaginary, or else my colleague has suffered himself to be deluded and deceived by common rumor. Upon such grounds no charge should ever be sustained, for we all know that common rumor is a common liar. Let the facts be exhibited—let the alleged frauds be proved; and I, as well as those with whom I act, will go willingly with him, not only to expose them, but to visit upon their authors the severest punishment for so high an offence.

I return to my figures. In 1838, the expenditures for the naval establishment were $6,131,580 53

In 1826, for the same object, they were - - - - 4,257,476 43

Making an excess in 1838 over 1826 of - - - - $1,874,104 10

When, by reference to the history of this branch of the public service, it is seen that there were more ships in commission in the latter year than in the former, and when my colleague himself now not only calls for an increase of that force, but is loud in his complaints because it has not been provided; when we know that the number of officers and men has been necessarily greatly enlarged, and their pay, by the act of 1835, also increased when in active service, surely there can be no pretence whatever on his part for the charge of extravagance, because, under such circumstances, the navy cost more in 1838 than it did in 1826. The navy, with all parties, is the favorite arm of our national defence; and very few, if any, of the opponents of the Administration, voted against these increased appropriations. They knew an accession to the naval force in commission to be necessary for the protection of our commerce. They cannot, therefore, in justice or consistency, condemn as extravagance what they themselves approved, because considered indispensable.

Nor can the trust funds paid out by the Government in 1838, be charged among the expenditures of that year. These funds, I need scarcely remark, form no part whatever of the public expenditures. The term explains itself too clearly to require a definition. They are nothing more than sums—as, for example, the Smithsonian bequest—deposited in the care of the Government; and consequently, though charged on the books of the Treasury, cannot be included in the list of expenses. Yet the amount of these funds entrusted to the Government and paid out in 1838, was $2,305,321 89

In 1826, the amount of funds of the same description was only - 266 47

Leaving the large balance of - $2,305,055 42 which must, in fairness, be deducted from the total of alleged extravagance.

It can scarcely require an argument to prove that the amount disbursed for indemnities in 1838, should not be charged to the Government, in order to swell the amount of expenditures with a view to make good the charge of extravagance. If, as has frequently been the case, foreign powers commit aggressions on the rights of our citizens, and deprive them of their property, and the Government shall afterwards redress the injuries, by obtaining indemnities for these spoliations, and become the mere agent or trustee for paying to its citizens the amount thus recovered, it would indeed be drawing largely upon the credulity of the people to attempt to show that a faithful execution of the trust is to be converted into a charge of extravagance. And yet, strange as it may appear, those who keep constantly held up to public view the gross amount of more than $39,000,000, which they charge to have been expended by this Administration in 1838, not only make no deduction on account of funds thus paid out, but they do not even venture an explanation.

In 1838 the amount paid on account of indemnities was - - - $975,577

In 1826 paid on the same account - 9,967

Making the sum to be deducted - $965,610

There is yet another very large sum which, in fairness, must be deducted from the gross expenditures of 1838. I allude to the amount disbursed in that year in the construction of durable fire-proof buildings, for the preservation of the public archives, records, &c. &c. This branch of expenditure was not ventured on by the Administration, until experience had taught the lesson, how impolitic and hazardous it was, to confide the most valuable trusts to buildings constructed of materials which render them liable at any moment to total destruction. This expenditure, so far from being extravagant, is plainly dictated by the soundest economy. It is temporary and contingent in its character, and few, I think will deny, that it would have been more conducive to the public interests had it been met at an earlier day.

The large sum of $1,009,084, the excess paid for public buildings in 1838 over the sum required in 1826, must, in fairness, be deducted from the aggregate expenditures of 1838.

But it is unnecessary, for the purpose of my argument, to weary the attention of the committee with comments on every minor item of appropriation which necessarily swelled the expenditures of 1838 beyond those of 1826. To most of the former, my colleague, I believe, gave the sanction of his vote; or, to avoid the invidiousness of particularizing him, I shall say that a majority of his political friends gave them their support. In justice, therefore, all those appropriations which they approved, or which all allow to be indispensable, must be subtracted from the sum of alleged extravagance. They must therefore deduct the sums contained in the exhibit I here furnish, in addition to the large items commented on already:

$439,000 00	For the protection of the Northern frontier, for which object nothing was required in 1826.
262,614 00	For building light-houses, beyond the sum required in 1826. The increase in the number of the establishments deemed necessary by Congress principally for the convenience and safety of the mercantile interests, justifies the addional expenditure.
97,242 00	For mints. Three branch mints having been lately established accounts for the excess.
113,860 00	Excess in pay of Senators, owing to the increase of their number and the length of the session.
120,910 00	Excess in the contingent expenses of the Senate, increase of business requiring more printing &c.
189,744 00	Excess in the compensation of the members of the House, accounted for by there being twenty more Representatives, and by the length of the session.
177,617 00	Donations in money to the District of Columbia, an occasional expenditure only, accounted for by the peculiar circumstances of the District.
454,586 00	For duties refunded. There was no such charge on the Treasury in 1826.
161,413 00	For the Exploring Expedition. There was no such expenditure in 1826.
186,878 00	The difference between the expenditures for the Military Academy in the two years.
190,354 00	For the salaries of custom-house officers, paid out of the Treasury, from 1833, to render their salaries equal to what they were prior to the tariff act of that year.
$2,394,218 00	Form the sum total of these smaller items.
1,251,998 74	To this amount add the aggregate of the various divisions of indispensable and approved expenditure, on which my remarks have been extended to greater length, viz: Excess in 1838 for the pay and subsistence of the army.
288,041 78	Excess for fortifications, &c.
4,810,976 21	For the Indian Department.
3,804,359 20	For preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities.
1,188,876 66	For surveys of ports and harbors.
556,824 96	For revolutionary pensions.
1,874,106 10	For the naval establishment.
2,305,055 42	For trust funds.
1,069,084 00	For public buildings.
965,610 00	For indemnities.

$20,449,151 07 make the total to be subtracted from the excess of 1838 over 1826. When the subtraction is made, it will be perceived, at a glance, that the charge of extravagance cannot be sustained. That excess amounts to $20,787,400; leaving the very small sum of $338,249 of excess of expenditure in 1838 over 1826; an excess which could be very easily accounted for by a more minute examination of the expenditures of the two years.

But my colleague cannot be made to understand how it is, that $39,455,438 35, disbursed in 1838, is not to be denounced by all, as prodigality in the extreme, when in 1826, a year of economy, as we are told, the expenditures were but $24,103,399 46; when he furnishes the proof, that in 1796, the expenditures were but $2,532,930, and in some of the preceding years still less. Suppose I were to call upon him to explain to his constituents, and to mine, and to the people of the country, upon what principle it is, that he can pass high-wrought eulogiums upon the economy of 1826, which had in the space of thirty years, increased the expenditures of this Government nearly tenfold, or one thousand per cent. approving, as he does, the economy of each of those years; and condemn the extravagance of 1838, which had, in the space of twelve years, increased them but little more than seventy per cent. Do you not think, sir, that, to enable him to account for nearly one thousand per cent. of increase in the space of thirty years, the economy of which he approves, he would make figures full as fast as he charges me with doing, when I undertake to account for an increase, in twelve years, of but little more than seventy per cent.; and which he condemns as reckless extravagance? And by the time he had cyphered it all out straight, as I doubt not he would, do you not also think that there would be some reason to fear, that the multitude of which he speaks, the plain common sense men, would come to the conclusion, not that the Democratic lawyers, but that these Whig lawyers, "knew a little too much, and could figure a little too well."

It must, I think, sir, be conceded, that the gross amount of expenditures unexplained, though large, is not per se proof of extravagance; and, consequently, that no safe opinion can be formed by a mere inspection of the aggregate. To make good the charge, and to satisfy an intelligent people, my colleague will find it necessary to go farther, and to investigate the details. He will be required to point out the specific items which are objectionable; to show the objects upon which money has been unnecessarily and improperly expended. Let him bring forward his specifications, let him point to the appropriations, which he condemns as extravagant, and I have grossly deceived myself, if I do not prove from the documents before me, that all such charges are utterly groundless.

SPEECH OF MR. HUBBARD,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In Senate, May 25, 1840.—The bill for the establishment of a general bankrupt system coming up for consideration—

Mr. HUBBARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I admit most willingly that the subject involved in the bill now before the Senate is one of the greatest importance, not only to the indebted classes of our community, but to other portions of our fellow-citizens. I have, with all the attention I could give, listened to the able arguments which have been offered in favor of the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary; but, sir, after the most careful examination of the provisions of that bill—after comparing them with the authority given to Congress, by the express terms of the Constitution, to legislate upon that subject—I am compelled, from a sense of duty, to oppose it, as both unconstitutional and inexpedient. Could I be pushed forward to a vote upon this bill from the mere impulse of feeling, that vote would be in favor of its passage. There is no man, within or without the walls of this Senate chamber, who can more feelingly commiserate the misfortunes of his fellow beings than myself. There is no man who can be more sensible to the reverses—the sad reverses—which have, within a few years past, taken place in the affairs of individuals. I am not ignorant of the character or the extent of this calamity to our business community. It has spread over the land like a pestilence. Wealth and independence have, by magic as it were, been changed to poverty and wretchedness. A sort of mania had seized upon our community, and by a course of untoward adventures and speculations, had involved in one common deluge of disaster and distress the fortunes of the rich and the hard earnings of the industrious. These facts are too well known to me. I have seen and heard more than I can now well describe. But how has all this occurred? No man who has been an attentive observer of events for the last three years—no man who has been a faithful looker on here in Vienna—but must admit that the most improvident, wild, and unwarrantable abuse of individual credit, has brought upon the country and the community the distress and dismay which now overwhelm the land.

"The general system of credit, which has been introduced through the agency of banks, brought home to every man's door, has produced a fictitious state of things, extremely adverse to the sober, frugal, and industrious habits which ought to be cherished in a Republic. In place of these virtues, extravagance, idleness, and the spirit of gambling adventure, have been engendered and fostered by our institutions."

These are sober truths—sad realities. I mention not these things in the spirit of reproach; I mention them not in the language of complaint. No, sir, I state the facts as they exist; and I am too forcibly reminded, by my own sad experience, to entertain a doubt of the truth of my declaration.

There is, beyond all doubt, a deep feeling, an extraordinary embarrassment, the most poignant distress, pervading the indebted classes of our community. Would to God that I had power, coextensive with my disposition, to remove them. If it were so, and were no other interests involved, I would at once relieve the debtor from the burden which bears him down. I would drive from his mind those dreadful forebodings which liken him to the maniac. I would impart to his mental energies the mighty influence of freedom. I would encourage his physical efforts, by all the hopes and promises which honest industry can inspire. But, sir, I have no such power. As a member of this body, in my action upon this measure, I can only be guided and controlled by the lights of the Constitution. The only authority I can or shall presume to exercise over this subject, is conferred by the Constitution itself. And what is that authority? What are the terms of the specific grant of power contained in that instrument? "Congress may pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." It is by virtue of this clause that the bill now before the Senate has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. That specific grant of power confers upon Congress no authority to pass this bill. What is this project, but a bill for the abolition of all the subsisting debts and for the abrogation of all the existing contracts of the country? This is the true character of the measure; and unless Senators are prepared, by a most liberal construction of the power conferred—a construction which the kind and generous feelings of the heart might lead them to adopt—they can find, in my judgment, no sufficient warranty for the passage of this bill.

It is my purpose to examine this subject, and I hope to be able to show that the particular measure now before the Senate cannot be sustained by the authority of the Constitution. That it is not recommended by any considerations of general expediency. That, notwithstanding the degree of pecuniary distress and of individual indebtedness existing in the country, relief is now within the the power of every honest debtor. The statutory provisions of the States, aided by the force of popular opinion, will afford sufficient remedies for all existing evils.

Mr. President, I represent, in conjunction with my honorable colleague, an almost exclusively agricultural community—a body of as industrious, patriotic and intelligent farmers, as can be found within the limits of our Republic. But, sir, I know not the sentiment of an individual citizen of my State in relation to this subject. I have not myself received from New Hampshire the first letter or the first memorial touching this question. My colleague may have been more fortunate. I am wholly ignorant of the views of my worthy friend near me [Mr. Lang, of my State,] upon this matter. In the absence, then, of all information of the opinions, feelings, and wishes of my constituents, I have been induced, with all the care and attention I could bestow, to examine the details of the bill reported from the committee, and the amendment proposed to that bill by the Senator from New Jersey; and the conclusions to which I have come will be freely stated. They have been most conscientiously formed, and formed against the whole current of my individual feelings; and if they shall be approved by my constituency, I shall not only derive from that fact a high personal gratification, but it will confirm me in the soundness of the views I shall have expressed. According to my reading of the Constitution, as I understand the letter of that instrument, Congress has not the power to pass the bill reported by the committee.

At the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, the distinction between an insolvent, and a bankrupt system, was well understood in England, and as well understood in our own country. And, since that period, they have been equally well understood in England, by our own Government and by the States of this confederacy. They have been always regarded as totally distinct systems; the one having for its object to afford a summary and speedy remedy for creditors, against fraudulent or failing traders—the other affording relief to insolvent debtors of all denominations. The one embraces particular classes within its provisions, and from the circumstance of their connection with the commerce and trade of the country, they can only be reached by the exercise of that power conferred upon Congress, "to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies;" while the other comprehends debtors of every description, who can only be relieved by the States, in the exercise of the power reserved to them, but not in a way "to impair the obligation of contracts." In 1827, when a bill was before the Senate, for establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, it was remarked, in substance, by one of the most distinguished statesmen of our country:

"That if Congress had the constitutional power to pass a voluntary bankrupt bill as applicable to all classes of the community, (which he regarded as an insolvent law,) the States had no right to pass any law upon the subject of insolvency; not even to authorize the discharge of debtors imprisoned upon a process issuing out of their own courts, otherwise than as it might suit the pleasure or convenience of Congress to permit.

"There was no middle ground. If the partition wall between bankruptcy and insolvency were broken down, all State legislation was subject to the arbitratry, and absolute supervision of Congress."

These views are sound, practical, full of good sense and are familiar to the understanding of the community; and I cannot but regard the bill now before the Senate as a general insolvent system, unauthorized by that clause of the Constitution which gives authority to Congress "to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies." It is made to embrace all classes of the community within its provisions, and hence assumes the character of a general insolvent bill. The power conferred is specific, and cannot be enlarged by construction. Congress, I admit, has authority to pass laws upon the subject of bankruptcies, and to make them uniform throughout the United States; but they derive no power from that provision of the Constitution to abrogate all contracts between man and man, to abolish all the debts of the country, to destroy the relation between debtor and creditor. The subject of bankruptcies over which Congress had an exclusive jurisdiction, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, had a technical as well as a popular signification; and in no sense was it supposed to embrace any class of persons but that engaged in trade.

From the act of Henry VIII to the bankrupt law of George IV, passed as late as 1825, which provides for the discharge of the debtor from his pre-existing liabilities, I have not been able, from my researches, to find a single enactment which, in terms, includes any class within its provisions except those who are denominated traders; and had the framers of the Constitution designed to have given to Congress any greater power over this subject than was contemporaneously exercised in England, it is passing strange that the additional power was not expressly conferred. No one will say but that the bankrupt system of England, so far as it included those upon which it was intended to operate, was not perfectly well understood by the statesmen and constitutional lawyers of our own country, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution. And it is difficult for me to concieve why the specific grant of power was not enlarged in terms, if it was intended to be made more comprehensive than was the existing bankrupt system of England at that time, and then in full force. No one will say that bankruptcy and insolvency are synonymous terms; they were not then so unstood elsewhere—they were never so understood here. "In strictness, no person but a trader can be a bankrupt." Bankruptcy is applied to merchants and traders—insolvency to other persons. To bankrupt is to break one in trade. These definitions are given by one of the most approved lexicographers that has ever given us the meaning of English terms. A bankrupt is defined by another to be "a trader who secretes himself, or does certain other acts tending to defraud his creditors. The derivation of the term itself shows that it was originally descriptive of a "broken trader."

A bankrupt law is well described to be such a law as, upon a bankrupt surrendering all his property to commissioners for the benefit of his creditors, will discharge him from the payment of all his debts. The power to pass such laws is conferred upon Congress, and I admit that they must be uniform—they must operate alike throughout the United States, and upon the subsisting contracts between merchants and traders, as a distinct class of debtors, and their creditors. This is what I understand to be the subject of bankruptcy—the subject upon which Congress is bound in its legislation to adopt uniform laws—equally protecting the interests of creditors and the rights of debtors who may constitutionally be embraced in a general system of bankruptcy. What can possibly be the subject of bankruptcies, upon which Congress is required to pass uniform laws, but the debts, the contracts, the personal rights, subsisting among those upon whom the law can be made constitutionally to operate?

Entirely different is an insolvent system. The unfortunate and embarrassed debtor seeks temporary relief under the operations of this system; and the States, under their reserved powers, provide this temporary relief, according to their own discretion. They cannot impair the obligation of contracts; but in almost every State of the Union, insolvent laws of some description have been passed, looking to the benefit of the unfortunate, and securing to the debtor the privilege of obtaining temporary relief from pressure and embarrassment. These laws are different in different States; but the power of passing them is reserved to the States, and cannot be exercised by Congress.

"Under a special grant of power to us in 1789, to pass "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies," how could we then extend those laws to persons who at that time were not within the letter or spirit of the bankrupt system, any more than we could extend them to distinct subjects of land titles, or forms of legal process? It need hardly be argued that if we, as the agents of the several States, with expllcit powers, undertake to construe the extent of these powers broader than what we know the language was then understood to mean, it is as much a violation of the Constitution as it would be to usurp powers entirely new."

It has sometimes been argued, and with much force and ability, that as the Constitution has prohibited the States from passing any law "impairing the obligation of contracts," that under the power conferred to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcy, no such laws can be passed, even by Congress, impairing the obligation of any existing contract, or having a retrospective operation. This matter I am disposed to leave for others to settle. It is wholly unnecessary for my purpose to discuss that question. I take the bill as it is, and I find sufficient objection upon its face to deter me from giving to it my support. Looking at the general object of the measure; regarding it as comprehending classes, unauthorized by the Constitution itself, I am constrained to oppose it. This question of constitutional power, as was well said on a former occasion, by one of the most efficient, industrious, and learned judges that ever occupied a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court of my native State,

"Is a question to be settled by the books, and not by conjecture or argument. There had, it was true, been some difficulty in determining who were, and who were not traders. The courts had, by construction, embraced several classes of persons within the statute; but it had always been done on the express ground that their principal employment was that of trading. So particular statutes, since the thirteenth of Elizabeth, have included some and rejected other classes from the bankrupt system; but invariably on the ground that they were or were not engaged in trade. Such was the theory of the statute of George II; such of the new bankrupt act of 1825; and such the principle running through all the one or two hundred reported decisions upon this system."

If the power to include all classes of the community, within the provisions of this bill, cannot be inferred from the express terms of the Constitution itself, it certainly will not be presumed to appertain to Congress from the records of our own history anterior, as well as subsequent, to the adoption of the Constitution; nor can we find authority for any such opinion in the whole history of England for the last two centuries.

"No instance could be found for the whole two centuries since the introduction of the system, of a mere agriculturist having been adjudged a bankrupt. The definition of a bankrupt in the statute, forbade such a construction; judicial decisions, more than one hundred and fifty years old, had forbidden it; and the subsequent statutes had again and again forbidden it; and this, not because they had before been included, nor on any local theory of politics in England, but because a bankrupt system, in its true extent and meaning, was not adapted to the education, habits, opinions, or condition, of an agricultural population."

The Constitution of the United States, as before stated, declares that "no State shall pass any bill impairing the obligation of contracts." No gentleman will contend that it is within the constitutional power of any one State of the Confederacy to pass a voluntary bankrupt bill; such a bill as that reported by the majority of the committee. This power is expressly prohibited by the Constitution of the United States; and it may be well to consider under what circumstances the provision to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, and the prohibition above recited, were incorporated into the Constitution. It is perfectly manifest to my mind, that to the States, and to the States exclusively, did the power belong, to pass an insolvent law; that this power could no more be exercised by Congress, under that clause of the Constitution, giving authority to pass a uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy, than it could exercise the power to abolish all contracts and all debts. The express power conferred upon Congress has its meaning and its limitation. The power prohibited to be exercised by the States, has also its meaning and its limitation. No one doubts that it is perfectly competent for State Legislatures to prescribe remedies for the collection of debts. No one can doubt that State Legislatures can pass acts of limitation with reference to all contracts entered into subsequent to the passage of such acts; but no one will have the boldness to assert that States can pass any act of limitation which shall have a retrospective operation. States, with reference to contracts in future, can exempt this and that piece of property from attachment and execution—can even free the person of the debtor from arrest and imprisonment. But in doing all this, which are remedial provisions, they cannot impair the obligation of the contract itself. They have not the power to nullify a contract between individuals—to abolish a subsisting debt. States have the power to pass insolvent laws, which look to the relief of the debtor, as well as to the interest of the creditor. They may legalize an assignment, honestly and fairly made by the debtor, of his property; but they cannot abrogate the contract, or destroy the debt of the creditor, without his agency or assent. In my own State, the body of the debtor is liable to imprisonment on all debts beyond a certain amount; but when the debtor is, by due course of law, discharged from that imprisonment as an insolvent, he cannot afterwards be arrested on the same cause of action; but when fortune shall smile upon his efforts, and prosperity crown his enterprises, the creditor then can reach the property of his debtor. All the doings of State Legislatures since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, have, in relation to this matter, been confined exclusively to the passage of remedial acts—to the establishment of a mere insolvent system—to the affording that relief to the unfortunate and honest debtor which they could do, without destroying the absolute rights of creditors. These salutary provisions, we all know, are not the same in all the States. They are essentially different in different communities. In some of the States the body of the debtor is not liable to arrest on mesne process; in others it is. In some of the States judgments operate as liens upon the real estate of the debtor; in others they have no such operation. In some of the States property of one description is liable to attachment; in others the same description of property is exempt from the process of the law. But in no State, without the assent of the creditor, can the obligation of his pre-existing contracts be impaired by the force of State legislation. It may then be asserted, and I trust without contradiction, that all the power the States possess over this subject, is, in short, to afford, by their legislation, temporary relief to the insolvent debtor, leaving the absolute rights of the creditor unimpaired. I admit that the States possess this power; but, in making that admission, I am not prepared to acknowledge that such a power as is asserted in the bill before the Senate, is vested in, or can be exercised by, the Congress of the United States.

This is the important question: Has Congress the power to pass a general insolvent system, looking to the entire abrogation of all contracts? If Congress has no power to interfere with the remedial statutory provisions adopted by the States with reference to the rights of their own citizens—if Congress has not the power to abolish the subsisting debts of the citizens of a sovereign State—then, sir, it follows that it has not the constitutional authority to pass the bill before us. With just as much propriety can it be said that Congress possesses the power to annul any contract entered into between any one of the States and a foreign Government, as to say that it can embrace within the provisions of a general bankrupt system every class of the community. With equal right can it be urged that Congress has the power to nullify the acts of a State, as to contend that it has the power to nullify the debts of the citizens of that State.

If the bill proposed by the committee could be regarded as a limit, beyond which the constitutional power of Congress over this subject could not extend, then I freely admit the farming classes would not object to its general provisions. And I as freely admit that, if any such bill can be passed by Congress, it should embrace every class of debtors. But, Mr. President, it is in reference to this whole subject—it is in view of the power which it is alleged that Congress does possess in relation to this question—that I oppose this particular measure. If Congress can pass this bill, establishing a system of voluntary bankruptcy, there can be no doubt that, under the same specific grant of power, it can establish a system of compulsory bankruptcy. If Congress can extend to the farmer the privilege of declaring himself a bankrupt, at his mere will and pleasure, it can, by the compulsory process of the law, force him to be declared a bankrupt, however much such a declaration might militate with his interest, or be opposed by his judgment. If a farmer debtor can be permitted, without the knowledge of his creditor, to declare himself a bankrupt, and be proceeded against accordingly, and in effect obtain a certificate of discharge, it follows, irresistibly, that Congress may authorize a creditor of any such farmer debtor to originate proceedings against him—cause him to be decreed a bankrupt—compel him to surrender his whole estate, his lands, his flocks, his herds, his implements, his every thing, into the hands of assignees, for the benefit of his creditors. And believing, as I most conscientiously do, that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated the exercise of any such power—never, for a moment, supposed that the specific grant of power to Congress to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies, "gave authority to embrace classes of the community within the provisions of a bankrupt system, who, according to the popular, as well as the technical, meaning of the term bankruptcy, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, were most clearly excluded—I feel constrained to oppose the measure. If Congress has the power to pass this bill, it possesses full and plenary power over every part of the subject. If it can permit the farmer to become a bankrupt, it can compel him to become a bankrupt. If it can give to him the privilege of selecting time, place, and every other circumstance, to declare himself a bankrupt, it can compel him, without his agency, and against his will, when the creditor shall see fit to move, to yield to the decree of a judicial tribunal declaring him a bankrupt. If the power is admitted, it must be conceded for every purpose. It will not do to say that Congress can pass this system for voluntary bankruptcy, and is precluded from passing any bill providing for involuntary, compulsory bankruptcy; and the practical farmers of my own country will not infer, from my decided opposition to this bill upon constitutional grounds, that I am disposed to deprive them of any privileges which I would extend to the other classes of the community. Far otherwise: if there is any portion of our citizens for whom I entertain a strong predilection, it is for the farming classes. If there is any portion of our community whose great interests deserve the vigilant attention of Congress, it is that of the agricultural class. The merchants never fail to be heard, when, in their judgment, a proper regard to their rights requires the legislative interposition of Congress. We have them always with us. Well understanding their own peculiar interests, they never fail to declare them and to maintain them with great ability, and with most untiring zeal. Not so with the yeomanry, the practical husbandmen of our country. Their retiring habits—their little connection with commercial men—their disposition to cultivate their own soil in peace, seldom leads them to present their grievances in our halls of legislation; and, sir, it is this very characteristic habit of the farmer—this retirement from the business and the bustle of commerce and trade—it is this absence from all the confusion and hazards of enterprise and speculation, that led the framers of our National Constitution to incorporate the guarded and qualified provision which they did, defining the power of Congress over the subject of bankruptcies. Had they intended to have subjected the farming classes of our country to all the evils of a bankrupt system, why was this clause thus guarded? Why was not the word insolvency coupled with that of bankruptcy? Why was not the clause made in express terms to embrace portions of our community which had never been included within the provisions of any bankrupt system of England, from the thirteenth of Elizabeth, to the time of the adoption of our Constitution. It was for the reason that no such grant of power to Congress would have been sanctioned by the American people, the source of all political power in this country.

Mr. President, does any Senator now present, for a moment believe, that if the Constitution had, in express terms, conferred upon Congress the power to include all classes of our community within the provisions of a bankrupt system, as it was then understood, that such a power would have been affirmed and approved by those who ultimately ratified that instrument? No, sir; such a clause, instead of being assented to, would have produced, in my judgment, an entire revolt among the people. The farming classes of our community were not mingling in the active business operations of the country. They were not accustomed to that rigid and precise punctuality and promptness so essential to the honor and credit of the merchant. They confided in each other—they knew each other's responsibilities and resources; and will any man say that it was contemplated by the framers of our Constitution, that if a farmer—an industrious mechanic—a hard handed workingman, should commit, according to the law of merchants, an act of bankruptcy, that he might, thereupon, be compelled to submit to the severe operations of an involuntary bankrupt system? that if the farmer, mechanic, or laboring man, should fail to pay his note at the time and place of payment—that he was to be declared a bankrupt,and that his estate, his house, his property of every description was to be taken from him, and his affairs to undergo an administration in the lifetime of the owner? Sir, the idea is preposterous; and he who would venture to argue the policy of any such measure, is little acquainted with the character, spirit, and tone of independence, which distinguishes the hardy cultivators of our soil, and the industrious mechanics of our own workshops. Sir, no such bill as this would be endured. It would be expunged from our statute book by the force of public opinion—by the irresistible sentiment of an indignant community, sooner than were those odious acts of Congress, "the alien and sedition laws." Such a system is at war with all the noble, generous, confiding feelings of our agricultural community; and it is, sir, for the reason that Congress has not the power to pass a compulsory bankrupt law, embracing all classes within its provisions, that I deny the existence of the constitutional power to pass the bill seeking to establish a voluntary bankrupt system, and embracing within its provisions the same classes of the community. As I have before said, if the power of Congress to pass this bill is admitted, the power is necessarily yielded for every purpose. Sir, policy may lead to the recommendation of this measure at this time, but beware of the consequences. Pass this bill—the power is admitted—the fate of the mechanic and farmer is thus jeoparded.

I well recollect the indignant feeling, the strong popular bias, which existed in the public mind against the bankrupt act of 1800. The fate of that law should induce the Senate to pause, before it gives its sanction to another bill, much more objectionable in its terms. But I refer to the act of 1800, for the purpose of strengthening the position I have assumed, that the framers of the Constitution could not have intended to give, nor does the Constitution itself expressly give, to Congress the power to include in a bankrupt system all classes of the community? I have looked into the history of that measure; and infer from the fact that the law of 1800 included only merchants and traders within its provisions, that no other classes could be constitutionally embraced? This law, it will be recollected, was brought forward within a very few years after the adoption of the Constitution, when the author of our Declaration of Independence, and those who took an active part in procuring the ratification of the Constitution by the sovereign people, were connected with the councils of the nation; when, indeed, the Representatives themselves, then fresh from the people, were of that very people; when this great palladium of our political, civil, and religious rights, was considered, discussed, and finally adopted; and yet, not a word or line is to be found within the bankrupt act of 1800,comprehending agriculturalists and mechanics within its provisions. That fact itself is high authority against any attempt, at this period of our history, by the descendants of the fathers of the Republic, to give such a forced construction to this specific grant of constitutional power. If those who made the Constitution, familiar with its terms, conversant with its provisions, could not, consistently with their sense of public duty, on the passage of the first bankrupt bill, embrace all classes of the community within its provisions, it would seem to me to be great arrogance, a violent assumption of power, for us to assume the exercise of such an authority under the same clause of our Constitution.

Sir, no such power was presumed to exist then; no such power was then attempted to be exercised. And I regard this important fact, (considering the time when the first bankrupt bill was passed, and under what circumstances, and by the agency of what men it was adopted,) as proof strong as holy writ against the bill before us, and as a practical construction of the specific power conferred upon Congress "to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies," given by those very men who were not only cotemporary with the very origin of the instrument, but who were active in obtaining the assent of the people to its ultimate ratification.

In the course of my remarks upon the unconstitutionality of this particular bill, I have adverted to the fact, that merchants and traders were intended to be exclusively embraced within the provisions of a national bankrupt system, on account of their necessary connection with the commerce of the country. In further illustration of that idea, I would refer to the commentary upon the Constitution of the United States by Justice Story, wherein it is alleged that "The power to pass laws on the subject of bankruptcies was not in the original draft of the Constitution. The original article was committed to a committee, with the following proposition: 'to establish uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies, and respecting the damages arising on the protest of foreign bills of exchange.' The committee subsequently made a report in favor of incorporating the clause on the subject of bankruptcies into the Constitution; and it was adopted by a vote of nine States against one."

No better or more satisfactory evidence could be adduced to show that this specific grant of power to Congress, over this subject, was intended to include only merchants and traders. As that class of our citizens has a necessary connection with the general commerce of the country, and with the commerce between the respective States, this power was intended to operate exclusively upon them. Their business relations unavoidably extended to all the commercial States of the Union. Debtors were to be found in one, and creditors in another member of the confederacy. And in this way it is easy to account rationally for the peculiar phraseology adopted in the Constitution. Laws upon this subject were to be uniform throughout the United States. The bankrupt trader of Carolina was to be subject to the same statutory provisions as the bankrupt trader of Massachusetts. The rights of all creditors were equally protected in the one, as in the other State. Considering, then, the peculiar circumstances under which this particular grant of power was incorporated into the Constitution—considering the history of the times at the commencement of our national Government—considering the character and extent of the English bankrupt system, at the adoption of our Constitution—I cannot doubt that the framers of that instrument introduced the specific grant of power to Congress, "to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies," with the intent of limiting its practical operation to those classes of our community engaged in trade. With one single extract from the Federalist, a work prepared and sent forth to the American people by Mr. Madison and others, to procure the ratification of the Constitution itself, I shall take leave of this branch of the subject.

"The power of establishing uniform laws of bankruptcy, is so intimately connected with the regulation of commerce, and will prevent so many frauds, where the parties or their property may lie, or be removed into different States, that the expediency of it seems not likely to be drawn in question."

But, if Congress had the power to pass this bill under the Constitution, viewing it as I do, I should nevertheless feel constrained to oppose it as inexpedient and impolitic, because it provides exclusively for a voluntary bankruptcy, and upon the ex parte proceeding of the debtor himself. He causes himself to be declared a bankrupt, when and where he pleases. He selects his own time—his own place. He makes all the needful preparation—he looks into his own affairs—he passes in review his long list of creditors—he selects one here, and another there, and pays them the uttermost farthing. No one knows his motives; no eye can look into his heart, except the eye of Omniscience; no man can judge what is passing in his mind; he makes all ready, and, without the agency, the assent, or even the knowledge of his creditor, declares himself a bankrupt. Nothing could be contrived by the cunning device of man, which, in its effects, would be more demoralizing upon the community, more disastrous to the hopes of the debtor, than the very measure before us. It is most admirably calculated to make honest debtors rogues. The temptations to fraud and deception are too strong for an unfortunate debtor to resist. You say to him, select your own time, your own place, arrange all your affairs, keep your own secrets, favor whom you will, do in all things as you please, and, when every necessary preparation shall have been made, proceed and declare yourself a bankrupt—deliver up to the assignees what little substance shall remain—be declared a bankrupt, and claim a certificate of discharge from all outstanding liabilities. There might be, under the operations of this bill, now and then an honest proceeding; but in nine cases out of ten, fraud would be so nicely interwoven that the keen and vigilant exertions, subsequently made, even by a creditor himself, would not be able to detect it. Yet fraud would lie concealed at the foundation of the whole proceeding. The creditor would know it; but unable perhaps to expose it, he would mark the bankrupt as a knave, and a long subsequent life of purity would not be sufficient to wipe away the deep stain, with which his moral character would be tainted. An honest but unfortunate debtor seldom appeals to his creditors for indulgence or favor, without effect; but in our action upon this bill, we seem to lose sight of the great body of creditors; we seem to be legislating without any regard to their interests; we seem to forget that where there is a debtor there is also a creditor; and in our great sympathy for the former, we become cold and indifferent to the claims of the latter. This very consideration and state of feeling unfit us for fair, prudent, and safe legislation upon the subject. While we are ready, from the abundance of our good feelings, to set the debtor free, to abrogate all his contracts and absolve him from all his debts, we should bring to mind that the very act may not only bankrupt his creditor, but may also involve the fate of an innumerable train of other honest creditors. While we are loud and long in expressing our commiseration for the misfortunes of A, and are ready by the strong impulse of feeling to procure his deliverance from the bondage of debt, we should remember that we may, by that very act, bankrupt B; and his bankruptcy may produce the ruin of C; and so on to the end of the alphabet. A fair, honest, straight-forward dealer, on looking into his affairs, counting upon his means, considers himself well enough to live, and retires from the active scenes of life to enjoy the earnings of his industry; but, in the twinkling of an eye, without any agency, or even knowledge, on his part, his long list of debtors have been declared bankrupts. Embarrassment, if not utter ruin, is inevitably his fortune.

I have said, sir, that no unfortunate debtor appeals in vain to his creditor for aid. His affairs are examined, and forthwith his efforts are encouraged. He goes forward with renewed vigor, and with fresh and confident hopes. This seasonable relief from an indulgent creditor has had the effect desired. The man is saved; every debt is fully paid; success has crowned his last efforts. But let this bill pass—let the debtor procure himself declared a bankrupt, without the agency, or even knowledge of his creditor, and never can that debtor again enter into the business of life with any good prospects of success. He can gain no new credit. The kind and friendly relations once subsisting between him and his creditors are entirely changed. Their good opinion is alienated. The debtor is forced to begin life anew without means, without credit, and without friends—effects resulting from the very acts which he would be authorized to do. If this bill passes, it destroys the confidence and the trust which must subsist when credit is extended; and one of the very objects which the friends of this measure suppose would be accomplished by its passage, would never be realized—and that is, the immediate and ultimate benefit to the debtor himself. It may afford temporary relief to the debtor; but such a course cannot fail to excite the distrust, and to destroy the confidence of the creditor, and must inevitably lead to the embarrassment, if not to the utter dismay of the debtor himself.

I would not pass this bill, then, looking exclusively and solely to the future interests of the insolvent debtor himself. In my firm belief, it cannot fail to produce upon the moral character of the debtor class the most deleterious consequences.

The following sentiment, offered in 1827, by a most distinguished statesman, should induce the Senate to consider well before they pass this act:

"However meritorious a portion of the debtors of our country may be, and however honest they might prove in the surrender of their estates under such a law, are we prepared to offer the temptation, and to throw wide open the door to more than five hundred thousand debtors of every description, dispersed in every direction throughout the United States, to stain the fair fame of their country, and defile the temple of justice with their corruptions, their frauds, their prejudices, and subornations of perjuries, until every moral principle is debased, and every pecuniary obligation is dissolved! These were the effects that flowed from the bankrupt law of 1800, when the debtors were very few, and the principles of morality more respected. Therefore, what are we to expect from that heterogeneous host of paper credit dealers, brokers, stockjobbers, and banking adventurers, which twenty-three years of times of more than ordinary character have thrown into the community? The most demoralizing effects must result from such a bill as that before the Senate."

That bill, sir, was far less objectionable in its details than the bill now before us.

Under the provisions of the bill emanating from the majority of the committee, the order of things is entirely reversed. The creditor becomes the victim of the debtor; he is subject to his pleasure. When the debtor wills he acts; not to protect the interests of his creditor, but to free himself from all existing liabilities, to put his creditor—the man whose favor he had solicited, whose friendship he had won, whose money he had obtained, and to whom he had pledged his honor and his faith—at defiance; to say to this creditor, I have enjoyed the blessings of this credit system to my heart's content—I desire now to wipe off my debts—to be declared a bankrupt; and this I intend to accomplish without your agency, and even without your knowledge. The very man who would gladly extend to his debtor, if desired, further favor, rather than to see his substance, his whole estate, pass from his control, and become subject to the exclusive order and direction of an assignee, is denied all interference in this matter. All offers of friendship are contemned, and acts of kindness are regarded without favor.

Sir, this is neither honest nor just. For what purpose does the debtor declare himself a bankrupt? To free himself from embarrassment—to be no longer made subject to the power of his creditor—to give up his property in possession for distribution, and receive full absolution from all prior contracts. This is the avowed purpose of the bankrupt debtor. But should any such purpose be carried out without the assent of, or even notice to the creditor, a proceeding which contemplates a surrender of the whole estate of debtors to assignees for the benefit of creditors is to be commenced and prosecuted without their knowledge. I object most strenuously to this feature of the bill. It is calculated to promote frauds, and utterly to destroy that confidence so essential to the very life and being of a trading community. Pass the bill of the committee, and I ask what will be the inevitable consequences? Will it benefit the debtor class to the extent contemplated? No, sir. Will it aid them in their future operations? No, sir. Will it tend to encourage their hopes, and to stimulate their enterprise? Will its passage afford them any substantial relief? Will it give them that permanent good which has been so feelingly and eloquently described on this floor? No, sir. There is a fatal delusion touching this subject. Senators have entirely miscalculated the benefits which would result to the debtor class by the passage of this bill. Unless I have formed a most erroneous judgment in relation to the ultimate effects of this measure, debtors will find from sad experience that it will prove an embarrassment rather than a relief—a curse rather than a blessing. Pass this bill providing for voluntary bankruptcy, and you necessarily impose consequent burdens upon the debtor, which his condition would illy enable him to bear. I admit that he might, under the operations of this bill, obtain a full discharge from his existing debts; but this is a mere temporary relief. One of the benign effects imputed to this measure, according to the speeches of Senators, is not only to set the debtor free, but to give him new impulses—to stimulate him to new enterprises—to put in requisition all his mental and physical energies, in order to regain a standing and to acquire a character and influence, which have been temporarily lost to him by adverse scenes.

But, how are these things to be accomplished? True it is the debtor has obtained his certificate—he is free from debt—he is without property; but as true is it that, if his proceedings have been carried on against the will of his creditors, he will be without credit, naked, powerless and moneyless, and without friends. Can such a man engage in new enterprises with any fair prospect of success? Would not such a condition paralyze the active energies of his mind? Could he go forward? No sir, no; he would ask for credit, but would be answered, you have abused the confidence reposed in you; you have disregarded the kind offers of your creditors; you have spurned our friendly overtures; you have taken our means against our will, and without our knowledge, to obtain your discharge; you have thus destroyed the very confidence and trust which we had reposed in your honor and in your integrity. The relations, therefore, which have subsisted between us, can no longer be continued. Such, sir, would be the responses which such debtors would receive on attempting to engage anew in business upon the credit of others. Men are actuated by known principles in all their transactions: a different course of conduct, under the circumstances, would be opposed to the motives and considerations which ordinarily influence human nature. How then, is this voluntary bankrupt to begin life again? How is he to take a new departure? How is he to obtain a new credit? Sir, in nine times out of ten his application would be obstinately resisted, and never would it be accomplished but by the agency of responsible friends or relatives. Men are not so injudicious and so improvident in the management of their pecuniary affairs, that they will a second time trust their property, without security, to an acknowledged bankrupt, who has only to consult his own interest, or his own convenience, to again originate a like proceeding, as will lead to a second declaration of his bankruptcy.

Pass this bill, sir, and, my word for it, experience will show, that, although you may have given to the unfortunate debtor temporary relief, you will have added difficulties insuperable to his again embarking in successful business. While you have discharged the debtor from his debts, you have created an impassable breach between him and his creditor. While you have obtained for him a certificate of freedom, you have bound him in the worst shackles of slavery. True, he is free from debt; but he has lost the confidence—he has forfeited the support of the capitalist. He cannot again embark, with any hope of success, in the risks of trade.

The bill, in its details, secures no practical advantage to the creditor—he is not only denied the privilege of participating in the proceeding which leads to the consummation of the bankruptcy of his debtor, but his rights are entirely overlooked from beginning to end. The debtor is the sole actor in this scene. He enters and exits at his pleasure. He keeps his creditor ignorant of all his movements, and I ask, would it be difficult for any designing debtor, in possession of a large estate, to make such transfers as would elude the closest search of his creditor—as would prevent, in any subsequent movement, the discovery of the truth? If this bill is to find a place upon our statute book, it will become, like the act of 1800, a fruitful source of frauds and perjuries, disgraceful to the character of our country.

With all the guards and checks incorporated into this bill, the creditor will be unable to do any thing. The very proceeding will not be stayed an hour by the powerless efforts of a creditor. The debtor will be decreed a bankrupt. That was the object in view, and the end will sanctify the means. Such portion of his substance as the debtor himself, in the abundance of his liberality, shall reserve for that purpose, will be distributed among his creditors. Now, sir, is it not palpably wrong that, while we are giving to the debtor these peculiar privileges, we should withhold all from the creditor, when he may have good reason to suspect that his debtor is a bankrupt? He may wish to proceed against him, and to compel a surrender of his property for the benefit of his honest creditors; but this is denied him. I ask, why shall the debtor declare himself a bankrupt? It is answered, that his effects may go to his honest creditors, and he be discharged. Be it so. Why, then, shall not his creditor have the privilege of showing to the court acts of bankruptcy committed by his debtor, in order to obtain the possession and control of his estate for the self same object? The interest of creditors and the relief of debtors, lie at the bottom of all this proceeding in bankruptcy. By this bill, you say to the latter, you shall be the exclusive judge when and how you can best advance the interest of the former, and promote your own freedom from embarrassment. By this bill, you coerce the former to follow in the wake of the latter; you deny to them the right of judging how their own interest can best be subserved. You, in short, bind the creditor, head and foot, to the will of the debtor. These are some of my objections to the bill emanating from the majority of the committee. But, sir, before we pass this bill we ought to survey the whole ground. Adopt this provision of voluntary bankruptcy, and you involve the community in confusion worse confounded; you add to the embarrassment and distress of the country; you break up all the relations between creditor and debtor; you introduce a state of things, the evil of which may be conceived, but cannot well be described.

Pass this bill, sir, and you will drive every man of property to distrust his fellow man—you will destroy the benefit of all well regulated credit, the effect of which will be greatly to augment the embarrassments of the business communities. I look upon the passage of this bill as a fruitful source of frauds—as productive of consequences to the community deeply to be deplored. Sir, before we give our sanction to the measure, we should at least pause long enough to bring to our recollection the baneful effects of that bankrupt system which received the sanction of Congress in 1800. It cannot fail to be remembered that it produced the most demoralizing and damning influence upon the character of our country. The grossest frauds and perjuries were but the ordinary effects of that measure; and although its operation was limited to five years, yet such were its deleterious effects upon the community, that, by the force of public sentiment, it was repealed at the end of three-fifths of the time allotted for its existence. Pass this bill, sir, and the youngest member of this Senate may not have years of penance enough left for him in this life, to atone for all the evils which its passage may inflict upon the country. The sad experience under the act of 1800 should deter Congress from any new experiment. I look upon this scheme as pregnant with the most mischievous effects. Credit is of too delicate a character to be violently assailed—it is too sensitive to be roughly handled. And may I not ask who is benefited by credit? who seeks to obtain it? who grants, and who receives? An honest and just answer to these inquiries should at least check the debtor in any course which shakes the confidence and trust of the creditor.

This measure is not called for by the mechanics, farmers, agriculturalists, and working classes of the State in which I live. I have said, sir, that I know not the sentiment of a single citizen of New Hampshire upon this subject; but if there was any such feeling there, as has been described with so much impressiveness and eloquence as existing in other sections of our country, sure I am that my colleague and myself would have learned the will of our constituents before this time. They would have expressed their opinions freely, and confidently called upon us to carry into effect their wishes. But, sir, I greatly mistake the signs of the times, if the farmers of our country, generally, feel any great solicitude for the fate of this measure. Men engaged in trade, adventurers and speculators, have been knocking loudly at the door of the Senate, and are now anxiously looking for the passage of this bill. They ask relief in order to start afresh; they are now in bondage; they wish for liberty; they are trammelled in their operations; they seek to obtain a full discharge. It is all accomplished. Then they will attempt to go forth again, doubling their diligence, their hazards, their adventures, in the hope that success may attend their efforts. They become, however, once more involved by reason of their mad speculation—their hopes have been deluded—their anticipations have not been realized; they find themselves once more bankrupt, if not in character, in property; and if this bill passes, they will again go forth, and in due time obtain a second deliverance from their indebtedness. I leave for others to descant upon the morality of such a proceeding. It can find no favor with me. Sir, we are blinded by our feelings, pushed on by our prejudices, and are ready, body and soul, to enlist under the banner of the debtor; while the poor creditor, whose children are left penniless; whose prospects have all been blighted by the madness, corruption, and fraud of his debtors, can excite none of our sympathy, or awaken in his behalf even the ordinary feeling of exact justice. Our feelings have taken a wrong direction. "Judgment has fled," and passion has assumed the place of reason.

There are other objections to the bill before the Senate. It takes from our State courts and transfers to the Federal courts, the entire control of the real and personal property of the insolvent debtor. After the decree of bankruptcy has been made, "all the property of every name and nature" of the bankrupt, is, by mere operation of law, divested out of such bankrupt, and vested, by force of the same decree, in an assignee, to be appointed by the court. And every subsequent proceeding in relation to said property must receive the sanction of the court having jurisdiction of the subject matter. And no longer are we to look into the office of county registers and of county courts for the evidence and history of titles to individual property, but to the records of the Federal courts of the country. This will be found in practice to be an evil of no ordinary character. Under the provisions of this bill the assignee is required to reduce to money the property committed to his charge, and to cause a dividend to be made as often as once in six months, from the time of the decree declaring the bankruptcy; and within a period of one year after said decree, all the proceedings in each case shall be finally settled, adjusted, and brought to a close. Pass this bill, and let these provisions be rigidly executed, and the better half of all the estates of bankrupts must unavoidably be sacrificed. Pass but this bill, and it would not only in name be a bankrupt measure, but in its consequences, effects and operations, would, in truth, produce a general bankruptcy.

I have, Mr President, said all I wish to offer against the constitutionality and expediency of the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary. I cannot give to the measure my support. I should regard its passage as a palpable violation of the Constitution.

I should consider the adoption of this measure as unsettling the foundation of our society—as an invitation to fraud and corruption—as a direct and violent attack upon the rights of property—as sacrificing the interests of one portion of the community, and that, too, without their assent or knowledge, for the benefit of another. I look upon it as sanctioning the principle that the private property of one citizen, without his consent, may be taken, not for the public use, but for the use and benefit of another citizen.

Entertaining these sentiments, I must oppose the passage of the bill.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey is much less objectionable than the bill itself. But, sir, unless there can be some material modifications of the substitute, it cannot be acceptable to me. I entirely approve of one purpose, distinctly manifested in the proposed amendment; and that is to include banks and other corporations concerned in the business of trade, within its provisions. This principle, if adopted by the Senate, would reconcile me to the amendment, with such modifications as I presume my honorable friend himself would be willing to have made. I am in favor of including corporations absolutely and unqualifiedly within the provisions of the bill. I would not have their inclusion depend upon the act of the State Legislature. They are artificial persons; and there would be no more propriety to make their inclusion dependent upon the will of the State wherein the corporation may be located, than to make the inclusion of natural persons, citizens of the State, dependent upon the action of her Legislature.

Such corporations are comprehended within the description of persons whom Congress has the power to embrace in a bankrupt bill. They are most emphatically and most truly concerned in trade; and if there is any reliance to be placed on rumor, some of these banking institutions have been most extensively connected in all manner of speculation. Believing, as I do, that Congress has the power to include these trading corporations within the provisions of a bankrupt bill, I am for this part of my friend's amendment, with some slight modification.

Mr. President, this is no new idea. It has long been a subject upon which our public men have reflected and expressed opinions. Immediately after the close of the last war, when the community was suffering most severely by the course which had been pursued by the banks, we find in an official report to Congress the opinions of one, whose opinions, when known, cannot fail to be respected.

In March, 1816, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Dallas, in replying to certain inquiries submitted to him by "the Committee on the National Currency, had suggested specific regulations, with a view to the ultimate collection of the dues of the Government in gold and silver coin, and to compel banks to redeem their paper in specie, went on to remark, that "Although the success of these measures is not in any degree doubted, it may be proper to add that, if it ever shall become necessary to increase their force, provision might be made under the constitutional power of Congress to subject all banks and bankers, failing to pay their notes according to the terms of the contract, to a seizure of their estates and effects, for the benefit of their creditors, as in case of a legal bankruptcy."

The then Secretary of the Treasury, a distinguished jurist, entertained no doubt as to the power of Congress over the State institutions. At that early period of banking operations, and when these corporations had entirely disregarded their obligations to the community, by refusing to redeem their notes with specie, at a time when they had literally flooded the country with their irredeemable paper, this eminent lawyer and statesman suggested the appropriate remedy for such an evil: "A seizure of their estates and effects for the benefit of their creditors." This was an adequate and an appropriate remedy; and while we are urged to adopt a system of bankruptcy, looking to the entire surrender of the property of insolvent natural persons for the benefit of their creditors, a sense of justice calls upon us, in my judgement, to extend the provisions of the bill equally to artificial persons.

Mr. Crawford also, in his able report upon banks and the currency, made in 1820 to Congress, conveys a very similar idea to the one advanced by Mr. Secretary Dallas, showing that, in his judgment, banks might be made subject to the operations of a national bankrupt system. He remarks, that "whenever the agency of banks should be employed in furnishing part of the circulation, a refusal or omission to discharge their notes on demand, in the national currency, should be treated as an act of bankruptcy;" and most clearly where a bank refuses to redeem its own promissory notes, issued for a valuable consideration in specie, it should be regarded as an act of bankruptcy, and should subject the corporation to be proceeded against as bankrupts. Any thing short of this would be unequal and unjust, and would give to these corporations, the creatures of the law, privileges denied under a bankrupt system to rational persons, the creators of the law; would extend to those soulless beings immunities withheld from the active classes of our community.

I have made these allusions to show that the proposition to include corporations is no new project. It was suggested as early as 1816, repeated in 1820, and pending the bankrupt bill reported to the Senate by the late General Hayne, of South Carolina, it will be found that a similar amendment was then proposed and discussed, but finally rejected, as was the bill itself.

It will be found, on reference to the history of that proceeding, that the proposition to include banks in the bill then before the Senate, was submitted by Mr. Branch, of North Carolina; and his motion was sustained not only by my friend upon my left, [Mr. BENTON,] but also by Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, Mr. Macon, Mr. Randolph, and others.

I cannot, myself, feel the force of the objections which have been urged against this particular amendment. It is said that Congress has no right to interfere with State corporations; that it necessarily brings Congress into conflict with the States. This objection proves too much; it is made by those who sustain the bill from the committee; and does not the same objection, the same argument, hold good to including individuals in a bankrupt bill? Are the rights of the States more sacred than the rights of individuals?

State laws regulate the collection of debts—define the rights of the citizen—declare the power of the creditor over the property and person of his debtor. Does not the bill of the committee interfere expressly with those rights? Does it not entirely take them away? And is any doubt expressed as to the power of Congress over these individual rights by the friends of this measure? No, sir. But it is said that any action of Congress interfering with corporations would bring the General Government in conflict with the States—as much, and no more, than in the case of individual rights.

Whence do these corporations derive their peculiar and exclusive privileges? From State legislation. Whence do individuals derive the rights secured to them for the collection of their debts—the power over the person and property of their debtors? From the same legislation of the States. And an interference in the one case is just as much an attack upon State sovereignty as an interference in the other.

It seems a predominant sentiment, that the banking institutions of the country must be protected—their sanctity must remain inviolate." I should like to understand some good reason for making a distinction between insolvent artificial persons and insolvent natural persons. "If the merchants of the country were to be made bankrupt when they ceased to pay their notes promptly, why should not incorporated banks, when placed in the same circumstances, be subjected to the same consequences?" No good reason for the distinction can be assigned.

Certain it is that I have heard no satisfactory reason stated why banking, manufacturing, and other trading corporations, should not be included within the operations of this measure. Mr. President, very recently a bank, which had been incorporated nearly forty years, in my own State, has failed, and utterly refuses to redeem its paper. If rumor tells the truth, it has been under the control and direction of some of its largest debtors. How its affairs will be wound up, I am not able to conjecture. But, sir, whenever it so happens that a bank of discount shall improperly manage and conduct its affairs, a regard to the interest of creditors and of the community, demands that the concerns of such an institution should at once cease to be controlled by its own directors, and be transferred to some disinterested tribunal, that shall, by virtue of the law, administer its affairs with a view to the rights of just and honest creditors. If such a law as this had been in force, the funds of that bank would not have been abstracted for the purpose of private speculation—they would have been employed for legitimate objects—for the use and accommodation of our citizens. Banks are supposed to be competent to afford ordinarily essential relief and benefit to the community. They combine the capital of individuals; and this concentration of capital enables them to extend accommodations beyond the means of individuals; and if such a legislative provision as this had been in being, the bank to which I have referred would not have ventured to embark in any hazardous enterprises—it would, in truth, have kept them constantly in check, and saved our community from the sacrifice of selling this bank paper at fifty per cent. discount, and saved many of our citizens from the embarrassments in which the failure of the bank has involved them.

It is said that the States are interested in these local institutions, and that any interference by the General Government with their management, or with their concerns, would be a direct infringement, not only of State rights, but a direct attack upon State property. Mr. President, I have well considered this objection, and it seems to my mind, that it has no good foundation. The States are interested in banks, it is said, and, therefore, we must forbear exercising any control over them. The States are stockholders and so are individuals. The banks have the credit of the State, and so have they the credit of individuals. Both are stockholders and creditors. I am an owner of stock in a bank in New Hampshire. My own State is also an owner of stock in one of her banks. And shall this circumstance prevent Congress from exercising its constitutional power over these institutions? My amount of stock is equal to that owned by my State. As a creditor of the banks—as a stockholder—as one anxious to have these institutions well managed and well directed—I desire to have them made subject to such legislation as shall tend to accomplish the object. But, inasmuch as the State happens to be a stockholder, the hands of Congress are tied, it is said; they have no power to act; they cannot interfere with State sovereignty and with State rights. I cannot yield my assent to this doctrine. The State is entitled to no higher consideration than any other stockholder. She has, as such, no more power over the institution than her amount of stock secures. In the event of a failure, her loss is in the same proportion to that of any other stockholder, as the amount of her stock bears to that of the individual stockholder. She has, or should have, the same interest in the judicious management and successful operation of the banks as other stockholders. Her interests are embarked with theirs; she is merely a partner with individuals in the capital of these institutions, entitled to her just proportion of the profits, and subject to her just proportion of the losses. And shall it be said that, under the Constitution, giving power to Congress to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies, this authority cannot be extended to banks, for the reason that the State happens to be the owner of one-twentieth, or one-tenth, or one-fifth, or any other proportion of the capital stock of a banking corporation?

Mr. President, my rights as a stockholder are just as sacred, just as much entitled to protection, as those of my State. We have both become, by the same proceeding, stockholders in a corporation created by law, and there is no act of that corporation that can legally extend any greater favor to the State, as a stockholder, than it can extend to me. We have equal rights, equal privileges, and are subject to the same duties; and upon what ground can it be urged that this interest—this property in banks possessed by the States—shall throw over and around them such a panoply, such a shield, as must secure them inevitably from the operations of any legislation of Congress? If this be true, banks are only to interest the States in their capital, and then they will be placed beyond the control of the General Government. These institutions, from their very business and character necessarily connected with the currency of the country—whose issues constitute the great portion of the circulation—who are most extensively engaged in exchanges, in all money operations, as well as in the business of buying and selling—elevated above the law, cannot be reached by any bankrupt system which Congress may establish, because, forsooth, the States within whose limits these institutions are located, happen to be stockholders, partners with others in their capital; because they happen to be, with individuals, the creditors of these corporations. These objections are not well taken; they are entirely unsatisfactory to my mind; and, sir, having, with much care, examined the bill offered by the Senator from New Jersey as an amendment to the bill reported by the committee, I shall not hesitate to vote for that part of the proposed amendment, which is designed to include banks within the provisions of a bankrupt system. I believe this to be right and just, called for by every consideration of propriety. And, sir, if the Senator will consent so to modify that part of his amendment as to take away the power of the States to have their banking corporations embraced, or not embraced, within the bill, I shall vote for it. We either have, or have not, the constitutional authority to include banks and other State corporations within the provisions of this system. If the power is conceded, then there would be no fitness to leave the matter of their inclusion dependent upon any subsequent action of State Legislatures. Suppose that some of the States should object to having their banks made, subject to this bankrupt bill, while others would assent; would not the uniformity of the system be marred by such a state of things? Would such a provision be consistent with the exercise of the constitutional power? Can Congress include the banks of my State, and exclude the banks of South Carolina? Can they include the banks of New Hampshire, and make the inclusion of the banks of other States depend upon their will and pleasure? Can Congress transfer its power to the State Legislatures? Can it say that your institutions shall be subject to the operations of the bankrupt system, provided you shall interpose no objections?

Mr. President, this qualified legislation finds no favor with me. I doubt the power of Congress to make such an exception as that contained in the amendment upon the subject of banks. I entertain no doubt of the great injustice and inexpediency of any such provision.

But, sir, let the principle now contended for be carried out, that trading corporations created by State legislation, cannot be reached by a bankrupt bill, and the whole benefit of a bankrupt system would be entirely lost, for it would be within the competency of State Legislatures to multiply these artificial persons to any extent.

And it occurs to my mind that the interests which States for the time being may hold in their corporations form no sufficient objection to their inclusion within the provisions of a bankrupt system, for this reason, (in addition to what has been before urged,) that the States can at their pleasure part with that interest. The State may purchase stock to-day and part with it to-morrow. Her interest terminates whenever she shall so determine.

Let me ask, would there not be equal propriety in saying to South Carolina, "Congress has passed a uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy. Now, it depends upon your action, whether your citizens shall or shall not be embraced, as to say it depends upon your action whether your corporations shall or shall not be included." Would it not be ridiculous for Congress to pass a bankrupt bill, containing a provision that the natural persons of Virginia shall not be included without the express assent of that Commonwealth? And would it not be equally objectionable for Congress to pass a bankrupt bill, providing that the artificial persons of Virginia shall not be included without her assent? Sir, such a bill would only be recommended by its novelty, not by its uniformity—it could lay but little claim to that character—a character which we are bound to preserve, or else we transcend the limits prescribed by the Constitution. These are my views. And I again say, that, if the amendment can be modified in this particular, as suggested, it shall have my vote.

The most beneficial effects would immediately result from the adoption of this amendment. The sound and solvent banks of the country would be sustained, while the banks of a different character would no longer be able to impose upon, and deceive the community. The affairs of such institutions, under the operation of this amendment, would be placed under the direction of a board, for the purpose of final settlement. Specie payments would be resumed and we should have no more of bank suspensions. The condition of the paper currency would become stable. The community would then be enabled to repose confidence where confidence is merited. They would no longer be cursed with a worthless circulation—they would no longer be compelled to submit to the pecuniary sacrifice, necessarily incident to irredeemable paper money. The people would sustain those institutions which, by their integrity and punctuality, might render themselves worthy of public trust. In my judgment, there is not a banking institution in the country, under the direction of honest and upright men, having in view its own immediate interest, that would not desire the adoption of this amendment. If, then, a bankrupt bill is to be passed at this session, I would not hesitate to include banks and trading corporations within its provisions. I would do it to advance the best interests of the community. I would do it to promote the best interests of the sound and solvent institutions of the country. I would do it to put an end to the operations of all those worthless and dishonest and rotten institutions which, without capital and without credit, by their gross and palpable frauds, have been able to palm upon the country their paper issues. Sir, the people have suffered enough—they have been most shamefully wronged. The laboring classes of our country have had already to bear loss upon loss, by the partial failure of banks.

The evil should be remedied. It is within the constitutional power of Congress to prevent such recurrences. Pass this amendment and you will do much to give value and stability to our currency.

I shall not at this time add any thing further upon the proposed amendment; the provisions embodied in the proposition for an involuntary and compulsory bankruptcy, limited and confined as it is, would not be strenuously opposed by me, should the Senate determine to include banks and other trading corporations within the system. That I regard as a sine qua non—as the great desideratum; and should that part of the amendment be rejected, the measure will cease to find favor from me. I am one of those, Mr. President, who are inclined to the opinion that there is no pressing, urgent and absolute necessity for a bankrupt bill unless banks are included in its provisions.

Sir, in the section of the country in which I live, I do not believe that the honest but unfortunate debtor experiences any oppression or severity from his creditors. So far from it, as far as my information extends, there exists in our community a commendable and praiseworthy disposition to extend favor, protection, and substantial relief, to the debtor. A merchant fails by reason of unforeseen losses—unanticipated reverses. He calls together his creditors; his affairs are examined; his condition is ascertained—an assignee is at once appointed to dispose of his effects for the benefit of his creditors, and the debtor has his discharge; and what is of more importance, he has his character left untainted. He at once, by force of that integrity and honor which has characterized his whole course, is reinstated in business by the indulgence and liberality of his old and faithful friends.

I am no merchant, and live remote from the scene of large mercantile operations; but I submit to those who well understand this whole matter, whether any unfortunate, upright, and honest debtor, who may have been compelled to stop payment, has ever found difficulty in the adjustment of his affairs, or in the procurement of his discharge? These revolutions in the affairs of men frequently occur; and it is to the credit of our community that their occurrence is looked upon as a misfortune, not as a fault; as accident, not design; and in ninety-nine instances out of a hundred, in all such cases, the most substantial relief is at once extended. Show me an honest debtor, and you will show a man not without friends, or without credit. I happen to reside in a town in which is located the county prison, and, as before remarked, persons in my State, owing debts beyond the amount of four pounds, are liable to be imprisoned at the suit of their creditors, on mesne, as well as on final process; and yet, sir, I do not believe that, within the last five years, five individuals have been committed to that prison for debt. Such a course is entirely revolting to humanity, and in no instance is it resorted to but to bring to light the frauds of the debtor himself.

Public opinion has a powerful influence over this whole matter. It is looked upon as cruel, unjust, and barbarous, to send an honest but unfortunate debtor to prison for the purpose of coercing from him, or from his friend, the last dollar. And seldom, very seldom, indeed, do we find in my country the existence of any such practice. And so it is in our cities or larger towns; the honest failing debtor is not abandoned and pursued with an unrelenting spirit of persecution; but he is visited, sustained, relieved, discharged, and ultimately reinstated in business by his former creditor, whose confidence in his honor and integrity has never for a moment been shaken. There is, then, sir, very little occasion to pass this bill for honest but unfortunate men. There is another class that may and will find this measure an essential benefit to their plans. How far it is fit and right to legislate for such classes of our community, the Senate will determine. For myself, I am not prepared to do a great evil, in the belief that by possibility some good may grow out of it.

I have said, what I most conscientiously believe, that the passage of the bill reported by the majority of the committee would bring about an entire revolution in the affairs of men; it would make honest debtors rogues in practice; it would hold forth temptations to fraud and villany too strong to be resisted; it would inflict a deep stain upon the moral character of the debtor, which a subsequent life of penance could not efface. Would to God these were all the evil effects which would result from this measure. It would blast the hopes and paralyze the efforts of the unfortunate debtor himself—it would destroy the confidence of the creditor—it would be but the commencement of a most disastrous war upon credit. Our character as a nation would receive a deep and abiding wound, in the estimation of foreign Governments, by the adoption of this measure. An end would be put at once to all individual credit, relying for its redemption upon the honor, character, and faith of those receiving it. The capitalist, the man of wealth and means, would find, instead of the confiding, generous, liberal feeling which had previously prompted him to encourage the efforts and enterprise of the young, industrious, honest, but destitute adventurer, distrust and suspicion filling his mind and controlling his whole subsequent conduct. No, sir, this very bill, should it become an act of Congress, could not fail to induce capitalists and creditors to suppose that they were put far from our favorable consideration—were regarded as unworthy of the protection and care of the General Government. They would look upon themselves as a class excluded and put at defiance. This very sentiment would induce that portion of our community to withdraw their capital now used in the active business of commerce and trade, no longer relying upon the honor and character of the merchants for its safe return, and invest it in the permanent, real and substantial property of our own country, or in the estates of other portions of the world, where their rights would be more regarded and respected. I cannot but look upon the bill reported by the committee as full of evil—as tending to a course of events disastrous to the hopes and prosperity of the debtor—destructive to the rights and interests of the creditor—and degrading to the moral character of our beloved country.

SPEECH OF MR. LOWELL,

OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, May 27th and 28th, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Mr. LOWELL addressed the committee substantially as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It was not my intention, at the commencement of the present session, to participate in the debates which might arise in this body. A young man, and a new member, I formed the resolution to strive rather to profit by the wisdom and experience of those with whom I have the honor to be associated, than to present, for their consideration, any views of my own.

In pursuance of this determination, I have been a careful observer of the proceedings of the House on the various subjects which have come before it; have listened attentively to the arguments of others; have exercised my judgment on the merits of the questions presented; and have contented myself with giving a silent vote.

I would not now depart from that resolution, but for the conviction that the duty which I owe to my constituents and the country, requires me to do it.

Invited, solicited, challenged, as the friends of the Administration have been, by the enemies of this bill, to bring it forward, and enter into a discussion of its merits, although the humblest member on this floor, I will not shrink from my share of the responsibility and the labor of defending it.

There are but two modes or systems by which the fiscal operations of the Government can be transacted. First, by the agency of banks, or other corporations: and, secondly, by the officers of Government, elected by the people, or appointed by the Executive. The former is the system on which we have heretofore generally practiced; the latter, the system proposed by the bill: and in the course of my remarks, I shall consider the two systems, principally in relation to three points, namely, constitutionality, convenience, and security; and shall endeavor to maintain the principles contained in the bill, by comparing and contrasting the two systems.

To show the unconstitutionality of banks, and the constitutionality of the Independent Treasury, it may be well to take a glance at the nature of our Goverment, and the history of its formation.

Our system of Government is necessarily complex. The people of the United States owe a two-fold allegiance: First, to the State within which they reside; and second to the United States. The authority of the Government is derived from the consent of the governed. All power is inherent in the people—originates with, and emanates from them. They first established State Governments, to which they delegated a portion of their own powers, and gave up a part of their own rights as an equivalent for the protection of the laws of the State. At the time of our separation from, and independence of, the mother country, the original thirteen States became separate and independent sovereignties, to all intents and purposes. They at first formed a temporary confederacy for mutual assistance and protection. But after the lapse of a few years, the States, by their delegates, met in convention, "In order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to the people and their posterity."

This convention formed what has been very properly denominated the Federal compact, for the purposes before mentioned. It was the work of compromise and concession; and was carefully and wisely framed. By this compact the States formed a new Government, for national objects; and conferred on it a few certain, defined and limited powers. They restrained the several States from the exercise of such powers as were considered inconsistent with the good of the whole; and reserved to the States respectively, and the people, all powers not so delegated or prohibited. The powers of the General Government, therefore, being delegated, defined and limited, are to be sought for in the plain and definite provisions of that sacred instrument. Such powers as are not found there conferred on the General Government by the instrument itself, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In order to preserve inviolate the line of demarcation between the respective Governments, it is necessary that it should be clearly drawn, distinctly marked, and kept constantly in view.

While, therefore, the General Government should have the free exercise of its legitimate rights, as defined in the Constitution, great care should be observed that those rights are not enlarged and extended beyond the plain and manifest provisions of the instrument. The line once passed by an unwarrantable construction, there is no place at which to stop short of the entire destruction of the State sovereignties, and the establishment, on their ruins, of one grand consolidated Government.

Bearing in mind these principles, let us turn to the situation of our country at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

Before the Revolutionary war, efforts had been made in Massachusetts and other provinces to establish and sustain a paper currency, which efforts failed, and were brought to a close just before the commencement of the Revolution.

Other efforts were made during the war by several provincial Legislatures, and by the continental Congress. In 1775, bills of credit to the amount of three millions of dollars were issued by Congress, in addition to those issued by the individual States. By new emissions, at different times, this sum was increased at the close of the year 1778 to more than one hundred millions. Depreciation of this paper was the necessary consequence of such large emissions. This was seriously felt in the beginning of 1777, and, to provide a remedy, Congress, in January of that year, made it a tender in payment of all public and private debts; and a refusal to receive it was declared to be an extinguishment of the debt itself: and they thought proper to declare that whoever should refuse to receive it in exchange for any property, as gold and silver, should be deemed an enemy to his country. The bills still continued to depreciate, and new emissions were made, which swelled the amount in 1779 to one hundred and sixty millions. The increasing wants of the country increased the issues in 1780 to more than three hundred millions, which depreciated so rapidly that, in the course of that year, five hundred dollars of those bills would not purchase a meal of victuals to satisfy the cravings of hunger, and finally they ceased to circulate, and quietly died in the hands of their possessors.

Thus we see, in this effort to establish and sustain a paper currency in the United States, an effort made from painful necessity, the people who were fighting for freedom, suffering every hardship, enduring every privation, and encountering danger and death in all their various forms, suffered a direct and total loss by paper money of more than three hundred millions of dollars.

The men who framed the Constitution were among the heroes of the Revolution.

They had seen and felt the evils of a depreciated and worthless paper currency. They had seen the provincial and continental bills, although encouraged and supported by the Government, and made a tender in the payment of debts, depreciate from time to time, and finally cease to circulate.

Under such circumstances, what kind of a currency, would such men, with their knowledge of the entire failure of paper money, and the losses and sufferings growing out of the use of it, be likely to establish for the people? There can be but one answer to this question. Men of their characters, with their experience, and with their judgment, would, in all human probability, establish a hard money currency: and they would also strive to guard against the possibility of a recurrence to that system, which had contributed so largely to increase the evils and sufferings of the country.

Having seen that the situation of the country, and the history of its monetary affairs, were such as to render it highly probable that the framers of the Constitution would establish a hard money currency, and guard by all possible means against the evils of a paper money system, let us turn to the instrument itself and examine its provisions.

Among the powers of Congress, in article first, section eighth, are the following:

"To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and to fix the standard of weights and measures." Also,

"to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States."

There is no other power delegated to the General Government in relation to the currency, unless it be contained incidentally in some of the General provisions, such as:

"To levy and collect taxes, pay the debts, provide for the common defence and general welfare, borrow money, make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Here is found no express power to establish banks, or to use bank paper, nor is any necessarily implied, as all the powers vested in the United States, and every department and officer thereof, by the Constitution, may be exercised without them. But, on the contrary, the language used is such as naturally to convey the idea of a currency composed of coins. And in the tenth section of article first, it is provided, that no "State shall coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; or pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." We have, then, the plain provisions of the Constitution, that Congress alone shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures; and the States are expressly prohibited from "making any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in the payment of debts, and from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

What is the natural construction of this language? What the intention of the framers of the instrument, as gathered from the language used? Is there a sentence, which, by a fair construction, admits the idea of paper money? But, on the contrary, is not the intention to establish a hard money currency manifest in every line which I have quoted? Banks, bank bills, corporations, and paper money, are no where mentioned in that instrument as among the subjects to be regulated by Congress; nor is any insimation or allusion made to those subjects, except by the prohibition of the States before cited.

There being no provision in the Constitution, which, upon a fair construction, contains the power to incorporate a bank, or to issue bank paper, it may not be wholly unprofitable to examine, for a few moments, the proceedings of the convention which framed it, the debates which occurred at its adoption, and the contemporary construction of its provisions.

The Madison Papers, which contain a history of those proceedings, vol. 3, page 1343, throw a flood of light on this subject. The original draft of the Constitution contained a provision, among other powers of Congress, "To borrow money, and emit bills on the credit of the United States." The words, "and emit bills," were rejected and struck out by a vote of nine States against two; and the remainder adopted. Mr. L. here read the proceedings of the convention, dated August 16, 1787. By the same work, vol. 3, pages 1354, 1576, and 1577, we find that it was proposed by Mr. Madison to give Congress power "to grant charters of incorporation where the interest of the United States might require, and the legislative provisions of the individual States may be incompetent;" which proposition, after debate, was so modified, as to admit a distinct question, specifying and limited to the case of canals; but three of the eleven States then represented voted in favor, and eight against this question. The other part fell, of course, as included in the powers rejected.

Mr. L. here read the proceedings of the convention, dated September 14, 1787.

The proposal to invest Congress with the power to grant charters of incorporation, and the direct vote of refusal by so large a majority, show most clearly and conclusively the intention of the framers of the Constitution.

I have endeavored to show, first: That the framers of the Constitution, from the characters of the men, their experience of the evils of paper issues, and the circumstances of the country, would in all probability have established a hard money currency.

Second: That a fair construction of the instrument shows that they did thereby establish such a currency. And third: that the proceedings of the convention show conclusively that it was their intention to establish such a currency.

In accordance with this construction, the new Government went into operation under an Independent Treasury system, and one of the first acts of Congress to regulate the collection of duties, passed July 31, 1789, provides that the duties shall be collected in gold and silver coins only.

The opinion of Mr. Madison, as expressed in the Federalist No. 44, corresponds with this view of the subject; and surely no man had better means of knowing than he. In that article, he says:

"The extension of the prohibition to bills of credit must give pleasure to every citizen in proportion to his love of justice, and his knowledge of the true springs of public prosperity. The loss which America has sustained since the peace, from the pestilent effects of paper money in the necessary confidence between man and man; in the necessary confidence in the public councils; in the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of Republican Government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States, chargeable with this unadvised measure, which must long remain unsatisfied; or rather an accumulation of guilt, which can be expiated not otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice, of the power which has been the instrument of it."

And when the bill to grant a charter to the first Bank of the United States was under consideration in Congress, February 21, 1791, Mr. Madison denied the right of Congress to pass it. He said:

"He had entertained this opinion from the date of the Constitution. His impressions might, perhaps, be the stronger, because he well recollected that a power to grant charters of incorporation had been proposed in the general convention, and rejected. Is the power of establishing an incorporated bank among the powers vested by the Constitution in the Legislature of the United States? This is the question to be examined.

"After some remarks on the limitations of all political power, he took notice of the peculiar manner in which the Federal Government is limited. It is not only a general grant out of which particular powers are excepted; it is a grant of particular powers, leaving the general mass in other hands. So it has been understood by its friends and its foes; and so it was to be interpreted."

And he concluded his speech in these words:

"It appeared, on the whole, he concluded, that the power exercised by the bill was condemned by the silence of the Constitution—was condemned by the rule of interpretaion arising out of the Constitution—was condemned by its character to destroy the main characteristic of the Constitution—was condemned by the expositions of the friends of the Constitution, whilst depending before the public—was condemned by the apparent intention of the parties which ratified the Constitution—was condemned by the explanatory amendments proposed by Congress themselves to the Constitution; and he hoped it would receive its final condemnation by the vote of this House."

Mr. Stone, in a speech made on the same occasion, uses this language:

"When implication first raised its head in this House, he started from it as a serpent which was to sting and poison the Constitution. He felt in unison with his country. The fears, the opinions, the jealousies of individuals and of States, had been explained by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Madison.) He should only remark that all those who opposed the Government dreaded this doctrine. Those who advocated it declared that it could not be resorted to; and all combined in opinion that it ought not to be tolerated. Never did any country more completely unite in any sentiment than America in this—that Congress ought not to exercise by implication powers not granted by the Constitution. And it is not strange, for the admission of this doctrine destroys the principles of your Government at a blow. It at once breaks down every barrier which the Federal Constitution has raised against unlimited legislation."

When the bill to renew the charter of the first Bank of the United States was under consideration in the Senate, February 15, 1811, Mr. Clay used the following language:

"This vagfant power to erect a bank, after having wandered throughout the whole Constitution in quest of some congenial spot whereupon to fasten, has been at length located by the gentleman from Georgia on that provision which authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, &c. In 1791, the power is referred to one part of the instrument; in 1811, to another. Sometimes it is alleged to be deducible from the power to regulate commerce. Hard pressed here, it disappears, and shows itself itself under the grant to coin money. The sagacious Secretary of the Treasury, in 1791, pursued the wisest course; he has taken shelter behind general, high sounding, and imposing terms. He has declared, in the preamble to the act establishing the Bank, that it will be very conducive to the successful conducting of the national finances; will tend to give facility to the obtaining of loans; and will be productive of considerable advantage to trade and industry in general: no allusion is made to the collection of taxes."

On the same occasion, in the House of Representatives, January 23, 1811, Mr. Crawford said:

"It is a most dangerous doctrine; it is an abandonment of the State sovereignties, who have for twenty years practically opposed and denied such doctrine. More than three-fourths of the States have, for a large portion of that period, been in the practice of establishing banks within their respective State sovereignties. If they had divested themselves of this sovereignty by a delegation of such power to the United States, they would never have dared to exercise such a flagrant usurpation of power. Congress could not, without violating their oaths, have permitted this usurpation of their delegated authority."

Mr. Webster, at a subsequent period, February 28, 1816, when the bill to incorporate the late Bank of the United States was under consideration in the House of Representatives, observed:

"He regretted the manner in which this debate had been commenced, on a detached feature of the bill, and not a question affecting the principle; and expressed his fears that a week or two would be lost in the discussion of this question to no purpose; inasmuch as it might ultimately result in the rejection of the bill. He proceeded to reply to the arguments of the advocates of the bill. It was a mistaken idea, he said, which he had heard uttered on this subject, that we were about to reform the national currency.

"No nation had a better currency, he said, than the United States—there was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the Constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard money men; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they therefore sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject in regard to which Congress had run into no folly."

In connection with this branch of the subject, I will a so cite the able and learned report of Mr. GALBRAITH, of Pennsylvania, made in the House of Representatives, at the second session of the 24th Congress—House Reports No 306. Mr. G. was chairman of a select committee, to whom were referred certain memorials, suggesting an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in relation to banking companies, and against the re-issuing of the notes of the United States Bank. The report, among other things, says:

"At the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, there were but three banks in all the States, with a capital, in all, of $4,550,000: the Bank of North America, in Philadelphia, with a capital of $2,000,000, first chartered by the old Congress, in 1781, and afterwards by the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and New York; the Massachusetts Bank, at Boston, chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts, in 1784, with a capital of $1,600,000; and the Bank of New York, chartered the same year, with a capital of $950,000. This constituted the whole banking capital of the United States at that time. The framers of the Constitution, therefore, had but little knowledge of a banking system such as it now is in this country. It could scarcely be expected that they could have anticipated that, within half a century, there could be eight hundred and twenty-three banks, with a capital of $378,421,168. Such an anticipation would have required a revival of the spirit of prophecy. They had experienced the fatal effects of the provincial paper money, and the no less pernicious results of the continental paper, and provided, as they supposed, in the Constitution, against both; against the former, by providing, in the 10th section of the 1st article, that 'no State shall emit bills of credit, or make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts;' against the latter, by nowhere giving to Congress the power of creating a paper circulation. It is matter of history, that the old Congress of 1776 had emitted continental paper to carry on the war by a majority of its members, until the adoption of the articles of confederation, in 1778, in which it was provided, among other things, that Congress should 'not emit bills, nor borrow money, on the credit of the United States, &c. unless nine States should assent to the same.' It is very probable that the small amount of bank issues at that time attracted very little attention, particularly as specie was very abundant for some time after the Revolutionary struggle; the French and English armies at New York and other places, the foreign loans, and the Havana trade, having introduced great quantities of the precious metals into this country. With the provisions, therefore, that 'no State should emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts;' and that Congress should have the power 'to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;' and the silent negation of power to Congress to emit bills of credit; the framers of the Constitution, no doubt, supposed they had thrown an ample guard around the currency of the country, and secured the poor and industrious from the pestilential effects of a paper money system, and the curses of the speculation and frauds which follow it. Such appears to have been the sentiment of political writers of the day."

After the passage of the act incorporating the first Bank of the United States, February 12, 1791, General Washington took the opinion of Mr. Edmund Randolph, at that time Attorney General, on the question of its constitutionality. Mr. R. was clearly of the opinion that no such power had been conferred by the Constitution. He then took the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, which coincided with that of the Attorney General. He then furnished General Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, with the written opinions of Mr. Randolph and Mr. Jefferson, and requested him to examine them, and answer their objections to the constitutionality of the bill. On the 23d of February, 1791, General Hamilton returned a long, labored, and ingenious argument in answer to their objections, and in favor of the bill. Two days afterwards it received the signature of the President, and became a law.

We may now look back to the situation, the talents, and the influence of one individual, aided and assisted by his political friends, for the establishment of the paper money system in this country, in violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution. His talents, and his situation at the head of the Treasury, enabled him to prevail in the national councils on questions relating to the currency; and he thus succeeded in striking a blow at the Constitution, the effects of which have been deplored by the Democratic party from that time to the present. Thus were its provisions violated through the art and cunning of a man who was opposed to our free institutions—who had no confidence in the virtue and intelligence of the people—who doubted their ability for self-government—who considered the British Constitution the most perfect form of Government in the world—and who was a zealous and eager imitator of all British institutions. He thus succeeded, by an unwarrantable construction of the Constitution, in fastening upon this country a system, the inevitable tendency of which is to overthrow our free institutions, blot out the State sovereignties, and establish upon their ruins a central, consolidated Government, similar to that of Great Britain.

Much stress is laid by the advocates of a National Bank on the fact, that some prominent Democrats have recommended such an institution, and among them Mr. Alexander J. Dallas, Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Madison. But it should be recollected that Mr. Dallas, in recommending the late Bank of the United States, December 6, 1815, admits that, "under the constitutional authority, the money of the United States has been established by law, consisting of coins, made with gold, silver, or copper." And he adds, upon the next page of his report:

"But it is within the scope of a wise policy, to create additional demands for coin, and in that way to multiply the inducements to import, and retain the metals of which it is composed. For instance, the excessive issue of bank paper has usurped the place of the national money, and, under such circumstances, gold and silver will always continue to be treated as an article of merchandise: but it is hoped that the issue of bank paper will be soon reduced to its just share in the circulating medium of the country, and consequently that the coin of the United States will resume its legitimate capacity and character."

Again:

"The Treasury, yielding from necessity to the general impulse, has hitherto consented to receive bank paper in payment of duties and taxes; but the period approaches, when it will probably become a duty to exact the payment either in Treasury notes or in gold or silver coin, the lawful currency of the United States."

Thus it will be seen Mr. Dallas most distinctly admits that the lawful money of the United States is gold and silver coins; and foreseeing a different state of things from what then existed, he predicts the future establishment of the measure now under consideration.

The committee of Congress on so much of the President's message as related to the national currency, in their communication with Mr. Dallas, say, that "They had determined that a National Bank is the most certain means of restoring to the nation a specie circulation." Such was the avowed object for which the late bank of the United States was established; and how signally it failed to effect the great object for which it was instituted, is within the recollection of all. But it has been said that Mr. Madison, after all his former opposition to a National Bank, became the friend of such an institution, and approved of the charter in 1816. It is indeed true, that it was chartered during his administration, and received his signature; but I will venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that you can bear witness, from your intimate acquaintance with that distinguished man, that his own opinion remained unchanged. He states the reasons for his course in a letter to C. J. Ingersoll, June 25, 1831:

"The charge (he says) of inconsistency, turns on the question, how far legislative precedents, expounding the Constitution, ought to guide succeeding legislatures, and to overrule individual opinions."

Again: I am told that there have been numerous decisions of the Supreme Court sustaining the constitutionality of such an institution. That is also true; and I have had occasion to examine some of them. They are to be found in the 4th, 8th, 9th, and 12th of Wheaton's Reports.

But however much I may be disposed to respect the decisions of that court in questions over which the Constitution has given them jurisdiction, I cannot wink out of sight the fact, that the distinguished men who composed that court, and made those decisions, belonged to a party which has always been disposed to enlarge the powers of the General Government by construction. Nor can I forget, that our Government consists of three separate and distinct departments, each independent of the other, each intended to act in some measure as a check upon the other, and each bound by the oath of office to support the Constitution. It is under the solemnity of such an oath, and as a member of one of those departments of Government, that I now address you. In such a case I would suffer no man, or set of men, whatever might be their characters or situation, to influence me against the obvious meaning and intention of the framers of the instrument.

From every view which I have taken of this subject, I can come to no other conclusion, than that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to adopt gold and silver as the standard of value, and to establish a metallic currency; and that the Government should perform its fiscal operations through the agency of its own officers I am, therefore, in favor of the bill, because it is based upon, and is in accordance with the principles of the Constitution. I am opposed to the system of bank agency, which is the antagonist of this measure, because it violates the Constitution; and I cannot concur in the opinion that legislative precedents are to be regarded as imposing an insuperable obligation on subsequent Legislatures. If they are right, they should be followed—if wrong, they should be abandoned. Precedents which contravene the principles of justice and equality—which assume powers never delegated—which violate the reserved rights of the States—and trample under foot the liberties of the people, can have, and ought to have, no influence over an American Legislature. Instead of being a guide for future legislation, they should be viewed as the prudent mariner would regard a dangerous reef or ledge, around which he sees scattered the wrecks and fragments of vessels.

Second. As a mere question of convenience, the proposed system is greatly superior to a bank agency for transacting the fiscal operations of the Government. It is more direct and simple in its operations.

There are three great sources of revenue, namely: the duties on imports, the sales of the public lands, and the postage of letters and papers. When banks are used as agents, these revenues are collected by officers of the customs, receivers of land offices, and postmasters, in bank notes, and deposited periodically in banks in various parts of the Union. When money is needed for the purposes of Government, drafts are drawn by the Treasurer on the banks in favor of the disbursing officers, who go, or send, to the banks, procure the amount in bank notes, and pay it out for the purposes for which it was appropriated.

By the Independent Treasury system, the money will be collected by the same officers in gold and silver, and deposited in the Government vaults, under the charge of the officers of Government, who are bound to keep it safely in specie until it is drawn for by the Treasurer, and is then paid out in specie in pursuance of appropriations made by law.

The old system deposites the money in banks, which are authorized to discount and loan money to individuals on the strength of it; while the Independent Treasury system entrusts it with the officers of Government for safe keeping, who are under heavy bonds, with ample sureties, not to loan it to others, or to use it for any purpose whatever.

To illustrate the subject. When banks are used as depositories and fiscal agents of the Government, the postmaster at Machias, Maine, is required to deposite the revenue of the office quarterly in some bank in Bangor, or Portland, or elsewhere in the State. The contractor for carrying the United States mail from Bangor to Eastport, applies to the Postmaster General for his quarter's pay, who draws in favor of the contractor upon the bank where the money is deposited; and the contractor goes, or sends, to Portland, or Bangor, and procures the amount in bank notes.

By the Independent Treasury system, the postmaster at Machias will notify the Postmaster General of the amount in his hands, at the end of each quarter, and the Postmaster General will immediately draw in favor of the mail contractor, on the several post offices on his route, which drafts he will present, and take the specie, instead of going, or sending, to Bangor or Portland, for bills.

Again: when banks are used as the depositories and agents of Government, a collector of the customs at Boston, New York, Philadelphia or Baltimore, collects the duties on imports in bank notes, and deposites them in some bank, or banks in the same place; and when the money is needed for the erection of fortifications, public works, or other purposes, in pursuance of law, it is drawn out by the treasurer by drafts in favor of the contractors.

By the Independent Treasury system, the duties will be collected in gold and silver, deposited in the Government vaults, kept safe until it is needed for the same purposes, and then be disbursed by the officers of Government, in gold and silver.

Again: when banks are used for the fiscal operations of the Government, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana, are collected by the receivers at the public land offices, in bank notes, deposited in the banks most conveniently situated, and when needed to meet appropriations for Indian treaties, or other expenditures, in the Western States, are drawn from the banks in bank notes, on the draft of the treasurer of the United States, in favor of the disbursing officers.

By the Independent Treasury, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands would be collected by the same officers, in gold and silver, kept safely until drawn from their hands, for the purposes before mentioned, by drafts in favor of the contractor; and then paid out in specie.

This system is, therefore, much more simple, direct, and convenient, than that of a bank agency.

Third. The Independent Treasury system has the advantage of the other, not only in constitutionality and convenience, but also in the security of the public revenue.

To maintain this position, it will be necessary to consider at some length the origin, objects and qualities of banks, and the principles on which they are established and conducted.

The business of banking is said to have been commenced in Italy by the Lombard Jews, in the year 808. The Bank of Venice was established in 1171. The Bank of St. George, at Genoa, in 1407. The Bank of Amsterdam in 1609. The Bank of Hamburg in 1619. In Sweden, the Bank of Stockholm in 1657. The Bank of England in 1694. The Bank of Copenhagen in 1736. The Bank of Berlin, in Prussia, in 1765. The Bank of Assignats, in Russia, in 1768. A Bank for the discount of commercial paper in France, in 1776; and the Bank of Assignats in 1789.

The first bank established in this country was the Bank of North America, at Philadelphia, in 1781. The Massachusetts Bank, at Boston, in 1784. The Bank of New York, at New York, the same year; and the Portland Bank, at Portland, Maine, in 1799. Since which time, the whole number of banks and branches in the United States has increased to 901, with a capital stock of $358,442,692; bills or notes in circulation, $106,968,572; and specie in their vaults, $33,105,155.

Banks were originally designed to be places of deposite merely, and not of discount and circulation, as at the present day. They were not the manufacturers of paper, but the bailees of gold, silver, and every description of coins. These coins were deposited principally for safe-keeping; and were received by the banks at their intrinsic value, subject to transfer or withdrawal by the owner, at a trifling expense. They afterwards became banks of discount, as well as deposite; and still dealt chiefly, if not wholly, in hard money. They have more recently become banks of circulation, as well as deposite and discount; and many of them are at this time but little more than the manufacturers of paper.

The history of paper money, as it is termed, both in this country and Europe, is a history of alternate expansions and contractions, of apparent prosperity and real adversity, of an excited and unnatural abundance, and a painful deficiency of the circulating medium, of plenty and scarcity, of profusion and poverty, extravagance and want, confidence and distrust.

All countries which have tried it, have suffered more or less severely from time to time. Austria, Sweden, Denmark, Russia, France, England, and the United States, all, all have suffered more or less the evils of this unwise, unstable, and dangerous currency.

The famous Mississippi bank paper establishment of John Law, in 1718, spread consternation and distress throughout the kingdom of France. The South sea act in England, the next year, enacted through the influence of Sir James Blunt, became equally celebrated for the mischief, infatuation and ruin which it produced. These schemes, so productive of idleness, extravagance, immorality, and crimes, have become a part of the history of those countries.

But the former has so far profited by experience, that she has made reformations in her currency until it has become probably one of the safest and the best in the world. At the close of the year 1838, no bills were allowed, by law, to be issued, of a less denomination than 500 francs or 93 3-10 dollars. The circulation of all her banks which issue notes payable on demand and to bearer, was at the time, 248,968,500 francs. Cash on hand, 165,325,000 francs. Discounts, 1,235,777,000 francs.

The establishment of the Bank of England in 1694, may be regarded as the foundation and origin of the present system of paper currency, which prevails in England and in the United States.

That Bank was established on credit; and has been sustained by acts of legislation, and by its connection and identity with the Government. Yet it suspended specie payments from 1797 to 1823; and it is said, was recently saved from another suspension by a loan from the Bank of France of many millions of francs.

This bank being located in London, the great centre of the commercial world, has, in the nature of things, a commanding and controlling influence over the currency and trade of other countries, unless they are established and regulated on such principles as to guard against the influence which a great emporium naturally exercises over those countries whose business concentrates at that point.

Hence its expansions and contractions are felt in all parts of the world—less, perhaps, in France than any other country, because she has taken measures to secure her people and her currency from such a dangerous influence; and more in the United States than any other, because we are so intimately connected by commercial relations—have adopted her paper system, and have contributed, by our bank policy, to expand the amount of paper circulation, and to involve our citizens and our States in a vast debt to the merchants and bankers of London.

In imitation of the Mississippi scheme of France, the South Sea bubble of England, and the Bank of England, various banking institutions have been established in this country, which have increased their numbers, influence, and extent of their paper operations, until the ancient laws of trade and commerce are entirely overthrown, and the country covered with a flood of paper.

The following table, from Blodget's Economica, is perhaps sufficiently accurate to give a correct idea of the number of banks, their amount of capital stock, bills in circulation, and metallic medium, from 1784, soon after they were established in this country, until the year 1804, a period of twenty-one years; by which it will be seen that up to that period, the amount of specie in circulation was very great—sufficiently so, perhaps, to answer the purposes of a sound currency, there being, at the last of those dates, a metallic medium of $17,500,000, while the bank bills had reached only o $14,000,000.

The following table, compiled from authentic public documents, contains as full a history of the expansions and contractions of the banks, for the last thirty years, as I have been able to find in the course of my researches:

STATEMENT of the condition of the banks in the United States, as taken from the official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, at various periods.

Date.	No. banks.	Bills in circulation.	Specie in their vaults.	Capital stock.	Deposites.	Loans and discounts.
January 1, 1811	89	$28,100,000	$15,400,000	$52,601,601
1815	208	45,500,000	17,000,000	82,259,590
1816	246	68,000,000	19,000,000	89,822,423
1820	308	44,863,344	19,820,240	137,110,611	$35,950,470	$200,451,214
1830	320	61,323,898	22,114,917	145,192,268	55,559,928	324,119,499
1834	506	94,839,570	-	200,005,944	75,666,986	365,163,824
1835	558	103,692,495	43,937,625	231,250,337	83,081,365	457,506,080
1836	567	140,301,038	40,019,594	251,875,292	115,104,440	525,115,702
1837	768	149,185,890	37,915,340	290,772,091	127,397,185
1838	829	116,138,910	35,184,112	317,636,778
1839	840	135,170,995	45,132,673	327,132,512
1840	901	106,968,572	33,105,155	358,442,692	90,240,146	492,278,015
					75,696,857	462,896,523

Thus we see that, from 1811 to 1815, a period of four years, the bank bills in circulation were increased from twenty-eight millions to forty-five millions, while the specie on hand increased but one million and six hundred thousand dollars; from 1815 to 1816, one year, the circulation was increased from forty-five millions to sixty-eight millions, while the specie on hand increased but two millions; from 1816 to 1820, four years, the circulation was diminished from sixty-eight millions to less than forty-five millions, and the specie on hand in that time increased near a million; from 1820 to 1830, ten years, the circulation was again increased to sixty-one millions, and the specie to twenty-two millions; from 1830 to 1835, a period of five years, the circulation was increased from sixty-one to one hundred and three millions, and the specie from twenty-two to forty-three millions; from 1835 to 1836, one year, there was a further increase of the circulation to one hundred and forty millions, with a decrease of specie to forty millions; from 1836 to 1837, one year, there was a further increase of circulation to one hundred and forty-nine millions, with a further decrease of specie of more than two millions; from 1837 to 1838 there was a contraction of the circulation of more than thirty-three millions, and a decrease of specie of near three millions; from 1838 to 1839, they expanded the circulation about nineteen millions, and increased their specie about ten millions; from 1839 to 1840, the year last past, they again contracted their circulation more than twenty-eight millions, and their specie more than twelve millions.

From 1830 to 1834, they swelled their loans and discounts from two hundred millions to three hundred and twenty-four millions; from 1834 to 1835, one year, they increased their loans and discounts to three hundred and sixty-five millions; from 1835 to 1836 to four hundred and fifty-seven millions; and from 1836 to 1837 to five hundred and twenty-five millions. At this point they reversed the screws, and commenced contracting their loans and discounts, which, in two years, from 1837 to 1839, they contracted about thirty-three millions; and within the last year they have made a still further contraction of near thirty millions.

This plain statement of facts will enable us to judge of the causes of the plenty and scarcity of the circulating medium, which has been experienced in this country at various periods of time within the last thirty years, and the part which the late Bank of the United States and the present United States Bank of Pennsylvania performed in this work of expansion and contraction will appear by the following tables:

From Janury, 1832, to January, 1833, that bank contracted its loans and discounts from sixty-six to sixt-yone millions, and its circulation from twenty-one to seventeen millions. During the first quarter of 1833, it increased its loans and discounts from sixty-one to sixty-four millions, and its circulation from seventeen millions to eighteen millions. During the second quarter of that year, it contracted its loans and discounts to sixty-three millions, and increased its bills in circulation to nineteen millions. During the third quarter of that year, it made a further contraction of loans and discounts to sixty millions. During the last quarter of that year, it made a further contraction of loans and discounts to fifty-four millions. In the first two quarters of 1834, its loans and discounts were contracted to fifty-one millions, and its circulation diminished near three millions. In the third quarter of that year, the loans and discounts were reduced to forty-six millions, and its circulation diminished about one million. In the last quarter of that year, the loans and discounts were still further reduced to about forty-five and a half millions; making in all, from April, 1833, to December, 1834, a period of one year and eight months, a contraction of loans and discounts of near nineteen millions; and of bills in circulation about two and a half millions. From December, 1834, to July, 1835, seven months, it expanded its loans and discounts near twenty millions, and its bills in circulation near ten millions. Within the next following five months, to December, 1835, it contracted its loans and discounts more than eight millions, and its circula tion more than three millions. In the next two months, to February, 1836, it again expanded its loans and discounts to three millions; and in the next succeeding two months, it contracted them again near eight millions. During the whole of this period, of little more than four years, it increased its specie from seven millions to sixteen millions; and then reduced it to about five and a half millions.

After it became a State institution, its bills of exchange and discounts increased from April, 1836, to May, 1837, to $63,000,000. Its bills in circulation were contracted to about $7,000,000; and its specie to less than one and a half millions. In the mean time, it had contracted a loan in Europe of more than eleven millions of dollars. This was the condition of the institution, which was claimed by its friends to be the great regulator of the currency ten daysbefore the suspension in May, 1837. That this amount of specie was nearly exhausted, during the ensuing ten days, is by no means improbable.

At the suspension of specie payments in 1837, it was among the first to suspend, and the last to resume; and in the suspension of last fall, it was among the first to suspend; and it will be the last to resume, if, indeed, it ever do resume.

The great expansions in 1816, 1817, and 1818, led to the revulsion of 1819, 1820, and 1821; the expansion of 1822, and 1823, to the revulsion of 1824, 1825, and 1826; the expansions of 1829, 1830, and 1831, to the revulsion of 1832, 1833, and 1834; the expansions of 1835, 1836, and the early part of 1837 to the revulsion of 1837, 1838, and 1839.

These alternate expansions and contractions first gave real estate, and all articles of property, a fictitious and deceptive value; and led all classes of people into new enterprises, in the expectation of accumulating sudden wealth; and then produced disappointment, embarrassment, and pecuniary ruin. They excited men to abandon their usual employments, to embark in dangerous speculations, which were sure to result in disappointment, if not in vice and misery.

The inconsiderate issues of bank bills in England and in the United States, in 1835 and 1836, excited a spirit of enterprise and speculation. It engendered an uncontrollable thirst for sudden wealth. It encouraged the merchant in Europe to sell, and the American merchant to buy, on credit, and import into this country, large quantities of foreign merchandise, which the necessities of this country did not require. It inspired our farmers with the desire to embark in the various enterprises of the day, for the accumulation of large fortunes, by speculating in lands, timber, granite, marble, cotton, flour, beef, pork, and various descriptions of stocks; by which means, the cultivation of the earth was neglected, and agriculture in a great measure abandoned, and hence the quantity of breadstuffs in this country was not sufficient to supply the demand, which was naturally increased by an increase of population, and by thousands of foreign laborers, who had come to the United States to labor on the canals and railroads. Necessity then compelled us to import grain and flour from Europe; and an expenditure, which in 1834, amounted to but two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, was suddenly increased to more than two millions in the first two quarters of 1837.

This turned the balance of trade against us; made us an importing instead of an exporting nation; and in the year 1836, the imports exceeded the exports by $61,316,995—in 1837, by $23,569,841—and in 1838, by $5,330,788, making an excess of imports over the exports in three years, of $90,217,624.

As our bank bills do not circulate in foreign countries, the balances of trade must be paid in gold and silver. In this way our specie is withdrawn from circulation at home, and exported to pay foreign debts. Our inflated currency swells the prices of goods—prevents the duties on imports from operating as any protection to domestic manufactures; for as the balance of trade must be adjusted in gold and silver, the foreign merchant can purchase at a low rate in Europe where labor and materials are cheap; send them to the United States, pay the duties in bank notes, and sell at the inflated prices; and then demand specie to take back to Europe.

Our banks have also established agencies in those countries, not to loan, but to borrow money. These agents, it is understood, are engaged in speculations of various kinds. They deal in cotton, tobacco, provisions, in bank, railroad, and other corporation stocks, and in State bonds and other securites.

In this way they have contributed still further to plunge our citizens and the States engaged in internal improvements into debt, and into bondage to the bankers and speculators of England, France, and Holland. The extent of their indebtedness is now two hundred millions; and the payment of the interest alone will be a constant drain upon the specie of this country. The effect of these speculations in State bonds and securities is already apparent. In the years 1836, 1837, and 1838, while the sales were the greatest, the imports of gold and silver coin and bullion exceeded the exports by $29,139,299. When the sales diminished, and the interest became due, during the last year, the exports exceeded the imports by $7,969,859, or near eight millions of dollars.

For the bonds and State securities sold or pledged, the bank agents procured English and French goods at most extravagant prices, and money at the rate of four millions for five millions. The goods have been consumed; and the money itself must sooner or later be refunded in specie; and the interest must be paid in the same currency. There can be no doubt, therefore, that what seemed for a time to afford relief to our merchants and bankers must ultimately produce very serious embarrassment.

By the speculations at home in wild lands, the sales which, in the years 1833 and 1834, amounted to but eleven millions, were suddenly extended in the following years of 1835 and 1836 to forty-one millions. These purchases were principally made with bank bills of little value; and were no sooner used to meet one purchase, than they were returned to the banks and reissued to pay for others. So wild and reckless was this thirst for speculation, that, had it not been for the Treasury order, issued in 1836 by the direction of General Jackson, commonly called "the specie circular," the entire public domain would have been purchased up by speculators, and paid for in worthless paper.

This is the history of those events which preceded and are connected with the suspension of specie payments in May, 1837.

The Bank of England, the United States Bank, and the State banks, having swelled the expansion of credits and circulation until they could not be inflated any further; it became necessary to commence the work of contraction. As the Bank of England was the first to expand, so it was the first to contract the circulation. This it commenced on the 7th of March, 1837; and within nine months reduced its loans £7,852,000. It increased its specie in the mean time £4,124,000. This amount of specie being withdrawn from circulation, the contraction amounted to near £12,000,000.

The shock was soon felt in this country; and was followed by an immediate suspension on the part of the United States Bank and the State banks throughout the Union.

With about thirty-eight millions of specie in their vaults, one hundred and forty-nine millions of bank notes in circulation, one hundred and twenty-seven millions of deposites, near forty millions of which was the property of the Government, they had increased their loans and discounts to five hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars. And in this situation, at peace with the world, aided and encouraged by the Government, and in a time of universal prosperity, they closed their doors against the people and the Government of the people's choice; and set all law and authority at defiance! They thus deliberately separated themselves from the Government and the people—dissolved the connection by their own voluntary act—and but for the expedient of issuing Treasury notes, would literally have stopped the wheels of Government.

The question now arises, shall this connection be renewed, or the separation continue, and be made perpetual by law? It is a great question. Shall this be a Government of the banks or a Government of the people? Are the American people capable of self government? Shall we be governed by men; by free, intelligent, reasonable, intellectual beings, who have souls to save—chosen by the people, from among the people, to transact the people's business, and accountable to the people; or by corporations, unknown to the Constitution, possessing neither soul nor body, and being under no responsibility or accountability to any power, here or elsewhere? For myself and my constituents, I cannot hesitate or doubt as to the answer. Let the separation continue, and be made perpetual, by all constitutional measures.

According to Mr. Gallatin's tables from 1811 to 1830, nineteen years, one hundred and sixty-five banks failed, the capital stock of which amounted to about thirty millions. The parliamentary returns in Great Britain show, from 1790 to 1818, twenty-eight years, the failure of two hundred and seventy-four banks in England. In 1837, all the banks in the United States failed; and in 1839, all the banks at, and South and West of, Philadelphia, with some few honorable exceptions.

The system of banking needs a radical reform; but it can only be done effectually by the State Legislatures. It should be carried back to the object of its institution—to commercial operations—to the accommodation of trade—leaving the currency as it was at the formation of the Constitution, principally metallic, or as the framers of that instrument intended that it should be, gold, silver, and copper. Let the banks be established by those who have money to lend, and not those who desire to borrow—require them to keep a sufficient quantity of specie in their vaults to redeem all their notes when presented—let them be confined to the issue of bills of a large denomination on business paper—prohibit them from engaging in speculations—and require them to conduct their affairs on the principles of commercial banking.

This would call in the post notes and bills of little value. It would call home our speculators in cotton, in stocks, bonds, and State securities, and, by requiring them to labor for a living, would contribute something to the wealth and capital of the country.

Paper and specie of the same denominations cannot circulate together. As Pharaoh's lean and ill-favored kine devoured the fat and well-favored kine, so a spurious currency will devour the precious metals, and drive them from circulation. That is effected in this way: If a person having different kinds of money—for instance, bank notes of a doubtful character, bank notes considered good, and gold and silver coins—should have a debt to pay, or be making a purchase, he would pay out first the doubtful bank notes, in which he has the least confidence; next, the bank notes considered good; and would lock up the gold and silver, to be used only in cases of absolute necessity. Not only the individual to whom he pays the bank notes, but the whole community, will be governed by the same principle. The bank notes, therefore, in which they have no confidence, will be constantly passing from hand to hand, while the gold and silver coins will be treasured up for future use.

Most of our banks at the present day are established by a combination of men, for the purpose of enabling themselves to borrow money from the public, at the same time that they seem to lend, by exchanging their own notes, without interest, for the notes of responsible individuals, with interest, and are, therefore, debtors to the public for the whole amount of their bills in circulation.

Having but a small amount of specie in their vaults, compared with their bills in circulation, they are sustained principally by confidence. These bills or bank notes are not money; nothing but gold, silver, and copper coins, being properly denominated money. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] said the other day, that they are the representative of money, or certificates that the holder is the owner of an equal amount of coins. They are not the representative of mo ney, any farther than the banks which issue them have gold and silver in their vaults to be represented. What is our idea of a representative? A few may represent many—one may represent another, or one may represent many others. But how three or six paper dollars can represent one of gold or silver, is not easily perceived. There is but one sense in which they can be said to be the representative of specie; and that is the sense in which a painting represents the original, as the picture of an ox, a house, or a ship; but there are few persons who would be willing to take the pictures instead of the originals. If they are the certificates of the ownership of an equal amount of coins, and there are more paper dollars issued than gold and silver in the vaults, they certify what is not true, and thereby deceive the public.

Bank notes purport to represent what does not exist; they are certificates of the ownership of what can never be realized; they promise to pay on demand, but the payments must be made in their own notes; they redeem old promises by giving new; in fine, like the weird sisters in Macbeth,

"They palter with us in a double sense;
They keep the word of promise to our ear,
And break it to our hope."

I would not include all banks indiscriminately in these remarks. There are some honorable exceptions; as many, perhaps, in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, as in any other; but truth compels me to add:

"They are, like angels visits, Few and far between."

The principal objections raised against this measure are found in the report of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, at the second session of the 25th Congress, which, I understand, was drawn up by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT.] The same objections are repeated and enforced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] They are, first, "That this system will establish one currency for the Government, of gold and silver, and another of depreciated paper for the people." Second, "That it will increase the power of Executive patronage;" and third, "That Congress ought not to pass the bill without submitting the question to the people." To the first objection, I answer, that the Government and the people are, in effect, one and the same. Their interests are identical. It is the people's Government, administered by the people's agents, who are elected by the people, to transact the affairs of the people, and who are accountable to the people.

The money required for the expenses of Government, and which is derived from the revenues, will be received in gold and silver, and paid out in gold and silver. It comes chiefly in the shape of duties on imports; and is immediately disbursed by the officers of Government, in payment of our army and navy, the contractors for erecting fortifications and other public works, for furnishing materials for our armed ships, provisions for our troops and seamen, and lastly for the wages of laboring men in the employment of the Government. If the officers of Government receive specie, they will also pay out specie. What has been received in the shape of duties, will be immediately disbursed to the public creditors. The effect upon the currency has probably been overrated by both the friends and opponents of the measure. I may, however, say, with safety, that to the extent that specie is required in payment of dues to the Government, will the precious metals be infused into the circulation, and the currency thereby be gradually reformed and improved.

It will lay the foundation for a sound circulating medium, and tend gradually to restore the national currency. There is but one standard of value and one currency known to our Constitution and laws, namely, gold and silver coins.

The humblest citizen has a legal right to demand this currency in payment of debts. Why, then, should it be said that the people are to have a different currency from the Government? Will you deny to the public servants the right which the Constitution has secured to every individual in the land? and if so, why this invidious distinction?

Are the officers of the Government, in whom we have placed confidence, and on whom we impose many burdens, less worthy than ourselves? Why compel our own agents and the public creditors to receive payment in a depreciated currency, when any individual has the right by law to demand gold and silver? The effect of the measure will be, ultimately, to give one and the same currency to the people and the Government, leaving the banks to stand or fall upon their own merits, as they may prove to be beneficial or injurious to commerce.

The second objection will "vanish into thin air" before the light of a brief examination. By the proposed system it will not be in the power of the Executive to touch a single dollar of the money, not even the pay for his own salary, except on the draft of the Treasurer, and in pursuance of appropriations made by law; while the additional officers to be appointed consist of only four receivers general, and some ten to fifteen clerks, who will be restrained by bonds and penalties from loaning or using the money under any pretence.

But how tremendous would be the power of the Executive, should the system contended for by our opponents prevail, and the Government be associated with, and allied to a National Bank, with a capital stock of seventy millions of dollars, with branches established in all the States, and the proceeds of the public lands divided among them, and invested in the stock of the bank, as proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. POPE,] in addition to the 900 banks now in the country, scattered over the whole Union, commanding the services of a million of bank officers and bank dependants, whose operations are extended into all parts of the country, and whose influence will be felt through all the ramifications of business, having the possession of the public revenues, and authorized to discount and loan money on the strength of them! Such a power would be most dangerous to the liberties of the people and the safety of the Republic. Yet, if I understand the argument of the report before alluded to, and the doctrine advocated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DELLET] in his eight hours' speech against this measure, and the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Opposition offer no substitute for the Independent Treasury, but a National Bank or the State bank deposite system, either of which, in my opinion, would be a most dangerous engine in the hands of any Administration.

But it is also objected, that the passage of the bill at this time, would be premature, and a disregard of the popular will. The will of the people, when fully and fairly expressed, is a tribunal, before which we should all bow with respect. How, then, is the fact? The report, dated March 23d, 1838, page 32, says:

"In this state of things, the plan of an Independent Treasury is propounded, and pressed to a decision, before the people can have an opportunity to act upon it."

And on page 28, the report says:

"By action, is meant election to Congress; an election which will give them an opportunity, constitutionally and effectually, to express their will, and to have that will obeyed."

And this objection is now renewed and enforced by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

At the Presidential election in 1832, the people tried the United States Bank, and condemned it. They gave it a new trial at the Presidential election in 1836; and affirmed their former decision. And at the election of the members of the present Congress, in 1838 and 1839, they tried the State banks, and the Independent Treasury system, as proposed by the present Chief Magistrate. They condemned the former, and approved the latter.

The campaign was opened in the fall of 1838, by the election in Maine, where that question was put distinctly in issue, and resulted in a gain of two Administration members. Next came Ohio, with a gain of three Administration members. And Tennessee, with the same number; and even Kentucky, with a gain of one; Massachusetts with one, Vermont with one, New Jersey with five, Indiana with four, and Mississippi with two; and in all the States where the question was put distinctly in issue at the polls, it is believed that the result was either a gain of members of Congress, or of popular votes. How, then, can the opponents of this measure say that the people have not acted on this question?

They have acted. They have expressed their will in a way not to be misunderstood; and I now call on the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and those who are politically associated with him, to obey that will.

In the last Congress this measure was no sooner ushered into the House, than it was prostrated at a single blow—it was nailed to your table by a majority of twelve to fourteen votes, from which the Administration could not raise it.

But now, I trust that the will of the people may prevail—that the bill may be fully discussed—that we may have an opportunity to record our names in its favor, and that it may be passed into a law, and sent out to the people, for the good of the country.

But it is said, that this system will overthrow our manufactories—destroy commerce—impoverish the laboring classes—that it will ruin the country—and that the people are in great distress, either because the system is already in operation, or is about to be adopted by the Government. The cries of distress have been raised, both in and out of Congress.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] said, the other day, if I understood him correctly, that he had just left that city which boasted of more capital than any other on this continent; that they had no currency there, none whatever; that the country was in an unexampled state of depression; that every limb of almost every man, woman, and child in the land, was paralyzed by oppression, and that the nation was crying out for relief.

Having occasion, soon after, to visit that and some other commercial cities, you will judge of my astonishment, when I found myself wholly unable to discover any signs of that distress which had been depicted in such glowing colors, but, on the contrary, found the steamboats filled with genteel passengers, the railroad cars crowded to overflowing, the hotels occupied by men of business, the markets filled with the comforts and luxuries of life, merchant vessels constantly arriving and departing, seamen in good demand, at high wages, and the people, to all appearance, prosperous and happy! I was perplexed to account for this sudden change, until I recollected the anecdote of the priest and the lady, who were looking through a telescope at the moon: While the priest could discover nothing but churches, spires, and other preparations for religious observances, the lady could see nothing but green arbors and pleasant groves, with lovers sitting under the shade of the trees. Thus each saw what was passing in the mind.

The shrill cry of distress which so often salutes our ear, comes not from the poor, the destitute, and the suffering. It comes from those gentlemen who are connected with, and have the control of, the nine hundred banks and branches in this country; from bank presidents, bank directors, and bank dependants, and their political associates, who desire to overthrow the Administration. It comes from the Whig merchants in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other large cities, who ride in their carriages, drawn by gay horses, surrounded by rich equipage, who live in marble palaces, furnished in the most splendid and magnificent style, who fare sumptuously every day, sitting down at tables which groan under the weight of the luxuries, and the dainties of the season; and while partaking of rich viands, and sipping old and choice wines, they will mourn over the hardness of the the times, the pressure in the money market, the distress which prevails in the country, and the folly, extravagance, corruption and madness of the present Administration!

Such men cannot be pleased, while the Government is administered on Democratic principles. Though the Administration were as pure as the angels in Heaven, it could not command their approbation. They could not be satisfied. Like the horse leech's daughters, they would "cry, give, give, and never say enough."

In the judgment of a certain party, this country has been ruined many times within the last forty years. They considered it ruined, and the institutions of religion overthrown, when Thomas Jefferson was elected President—ruined again, when James Madison was elected—ruined when the embargo, non-intercourse, and non-importation acts were passed—ruined when war was declared against Great Britain for the protection of our rights on the high seas—ruined when General Jackson was elected President—when he vetoed the bill to recharter the United States Bank—again when the deposites were removed—when the specie circular was issued—when Mr. Van Buren was elected President—and is about to be ruined again, by the passage of the bill now under consideration; and notwithstanding it has been so frequently ruined, I most seriously and solemnly believe it is still the best country on the globe, with the best people, and the best Government. With all this distress and ruin, we have gone on from prospering to prosper; enlarged our borders until they extend from the Canadas to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific; have increased in population and wealth; erected institutions of learning and religion throughout the land; and established a gallant navy, which commands the respect and admiration of the world.

We have increased our power by land and water, until our commerce whitens every ocean, and our star spangled banner waves triumphant in every clime.

I admit that many persons are laboring under pecuniary embarrassment, and that there is a depression in mercantile affairs, which has fallen with great severity upon a portion of the community; but it is not confined to this country, or England, and is more severely felt in those countries which depend on a paper currency than in any other.

We have been told that no such depression of business occurred during the existence of a United States Bank; and here I take issue with those gentlemen, and will maintain and prove, by the most distinguished men in the Opposition, that there were two such revulsions during the existence of the late United States Bank, namely, in 1819 and in 1824; and yet further, that they were caused by the banks.

First. The Hon. John Bell, of Tennessee, in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives, June 8, 1832, which is reported in Gales and Seaton's Register, vol. 8, part 3d, pages 3364 and 5, uses the following language:

"In 1819 came that sudden eclipse of the glorious scene I have described, which, for a while, was supposed to forbode a permanent prostration of the interests and prosperity of the country. This was the result of a combination of causes. By the abuse of the paper credit system both in Europe and America, and the consequent depreciation of the currency, property of all kinds attained an extravagant artificial value. A universal delusion prevailed upon all subjects connected with trade and the nature and theory of wealth. The machine of production had been stimulated to the highest exertion in every country, and in every branch of industry, peculiar to each, without reference to the amount of similar products in either, and without regard to the probable demands for them. Such was the effect of the steady advance in the prices of all descriptions of property and produce in this country, up to 1819, caused by the state of the currency, that a great portion of society began to imagine that a golden age had set in, which would have no end; that prices would continue to rise without limit, and that the readiest way to wealth was by trade or exchanges. The whole country became a nation of traders or exchangers, as well as the producers of the commodities of trade. The fall of prices in 1819 found almost every individual of the country either a debtor or a creditor, to an amount far beyond the bounds of a moderate adventure. The revulsion of 1819 was as sudden and unexpected as a clap of thunder in a fine day. It was as terrific, too, to thousands. The consequence was general consternation and depression."

Second. Hon. Henry Clay, in a speech delivered in 1824, reported in Niles's Register, vol. 26, pages 378 and 387, says:

"In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention, and challenges our deepest regret, is the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestable character. It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthreshed crops of grain, perishing in our barns and barn yards for the want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes, but extending to all orders of society; by an universal complaint of the want of employment, and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honors and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the reluctant resort to the perilous use of paper money; by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation between debtor and creditor; and, above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation which has, on an average, sunk not less than about fifty per cent. within a few years.

* * * * * * *

"The truth is, that no class of society suffers more, in the present stagnation of business, than the laboring class. That is a necessary effect of the depression of agriculture, the principal business of the community. The wages of able bodied men vary from five to eight dollers per month; and such has been the want of employment, in some parts of the Union, that instances have not been unfrequent, of men working merely for the means of present subsistence. If the wages for labor here and in England are compared, they will be found not to be essentially different."

And third. Hon Daniel Webster, in a speech delivered the same year, which is recorded in the same volume, at the 411th page, discourses as follows:

"The paper system of England had certainly communicated an artificial value to property. It had encouraged speculation and excited overtrading. When the shock, therefore, came, and this violent pressure for money acted at the same moment on the continent and in England, inflated and unnatural prices could be kept up no longer. A reduction took place, which has been estimated to have been at least least equal to a fall of thirty, if not forty, per cent. The depression was universal; and the change was felt in the United States severely, though not equally so in every part of them. There are those, I am aware, who maintain that the events to which I have alluded did not cause the great fall of prices; but that fall was natural and inevitable, from the previously existing state of things, the abundance of commodities, and the want of demand. But that would only prove that the effect was produced in another way, rather than by another cause. If these great and sudden calls for money did not reduce prices, but prices fell, as of themselves, to their natural state, still the result is the same; for we perceive that, after these new calls for money, prices could not be kept longer at their unnatural height."

These three gentlemen, occupying, as they do, high and responsible stations in the nation, and being at the head of the Whig party, will, I presume, be regarded by our opponents as competent and credible witnesses.

But it is said, that this system will ruin the farmer, by its tendency to reduce the prices of grain, flour, beef, pork, and other produce. The prices of such articles must depend, in a great measure, upon the extent of the supply and demand; and prices will, therefore, be necessarily subject to some fluctuation. The tendency of bank expansion and contraction is to make those fluctuations more frequent, more sudden, and more violent, while the Independent Treasury system will tend to counteract the influence of those expansions and contractions. The following statement exhibits the prices of various articles in continental money, in 1779 and 1780:

By way of contrast, I will now cite a Cincinnati price current of December 21st, 1821, which says, pork is now selling at 1¼ cents per pound; flour at $2 50 per barrel; fine beef, hind quarters, at 2 cents per pound; veal 2 cents; fowls 6¼ cents; eggs 8 cents per dozen; butter 10 cents; Lard 3¼ cents; hams 5 cents, and vegetables equally cheap. The United States Bank was then in successful operation; but it had passed through the first period of expansion, and was then engaged in contracting the circulation.

That the great and sudden fluctuations in the prices of bread stuffs are caused mainly by the banks, will appear still more manifest by the following table of the prices of flour at Philadelphia and Washington, for the first three months of each year, from 1796 to the present time, a period of forty-four years, a part of which table was published in the Pennsylvanian in 1837, and the remaining three years were added by the Globe, to make the table complete to the present time. By comparing the expansions and contractions of bank issues with the rise and fall of the prices of flour in those years, any gentleman can judge for himself whether they do not sustain the relation to each other of cause and effect.

*In July and August this year, $11 and $12.

Again, we are told by the opponents of this measure, that it will diminish the wages of labor. And I most frankly confess, that, if this were true, it would be a most serious objection; for there is no principle of political economy better settled than this, that labor is the cause of all wealth, both public and private. The laboring classes are the bone and muscle and sinew of the country. But a moment's reflection will satisfy any person that, so far as it operates on labor, it cannot fail to have the contrary effect. Its tendency being to infuse into the circulating medium a large quantity of gold and silver, it will check to the same extent the expansions and contractions of the banks, and thereby prevent, in a good degree, the fluctuations in the prices of articles of consumption needed by the laboring man, so that those prices may bear a reasonable proportion to the wages of labor.

When the banks expand and inflate the currency, the laboring man, in the receipt of moderate wages, finds himself unexpectedly compelled to pay from ten to fifteen dollars for a barrel of flour, and from thirty to forty dollars for a barrel of pork, with equally extravagant prices for all other articles of consumption. And when, at last, his wages shall be so increased as to bear some proportion to the prices of other things, the banks reverse the motion of the screws, suddenly contract the circulation, the wages of labor are reduced, and the laboring man thrown out of employment. Thus, he is the last to be benefited by bank expansions, and the first to be injured by bank contractions.

But, sir, are the opponents of this bill sincere in their concern for the laboring man? Have they in reality become the friends of those men who earn their daily bread for themselves and their families by their daily labor? Have they in truth such tender regard for the rights of the people? or are their professions of attachment hypocritical and deceptive?

The gentleman from Massachusetts has quoted from a Democratic newspaper published in Boston, (the Morning Post;) and I will also quote a short extract from a Whig newspaper (the Courier) published in the same city, to show what opinions our opponents entertain of laboring men: "The huge paw of the farmer ought never to be laid on the statute book." Mark that.

'As well might a blacksmith attempt to mend a watch, as a farmer to legislate. What mischiefs are sure to be enacted, when a man, born to nothing but the ploughtail, takes to legislating."

Another Whig paper, the Atlas, published in the same city, has since admonished its friends that they must pursue a different policy, in order to get the votes of the people. They must, says that paper, "descend into the forum, and take the laboring man by the hand."

A distinguished opponent of Democracy has said:

"There never can be prosperous times in this country, until a poor man, as in England, is obliged to work for a sheep's head and pluck a day, and lie under a cart at night."

One of the most celebrated Whigs and bankers of this country, has recently proclaimed, that:

"It was only through the infliction of sufferings, that the people could be brought to oppose the Administration; and that the sufferings of the people would scourge the banditti in high places back to their caverns."

Such were the sentiments which our opponents entertained of the laboring people; and I would ask what has caused this sudden change in their feelings and policy? Whence arises this new born affection for the people, for laborers, farmers, mechanics, seamen? Why does "purse proud, bellowing insolence" condescend to take the laboring man by the hand, and to fawn over him, and play the sycophant? The laboring man will answer this question at the polls. He will teach our opponents that they have greatly underrated his intelligence, and his virtue—and that he will not desert his tried and ancient friends, who have stood by him, and been fellow-laborers in the same vineyard.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] was jealous of European measures—he would not follow their example—our institutions were peculiar in many respects. And yet he tells us, near the close of his speech, that there is no Government on earth which he respects so much as he does England. He proceeds to say that she has risen in power and greatness beyond that of any other on the globe; and refers to the evidences of her greatness and the wisdom of her policy.

Among the evidences of her prosperity, he reminds us of the extent of her dominions, of her army and navy, and her 130 millions of conquered inhabitants in India; and he asks if we would not follow the example of a nation which has obtained such greatness by such a system?

Sir, we have followed her example too long. I am jealous of the measures of all European Governments, but especially of England, who has more power to injure us than any other nation, and greater inducements to exert that power. We have already been engaged in two long and bloody wars with her for the maintenance of our just rights; and may yet be involved in another, unless a returning sense of justice, or fear of consequences, should induce her to abandon her pretended claim of title to a portion of our public domain. What would be the result of such a contest, cannot admit of very serious doubts. But the danger at present lies in a different direction. What she cannot obtain by her fleets and armies, she may obtain by her moneyed power; namely: a control over the destinies of this country.

Shall our eyes be dazzled by British splendor, and blinded by British glory, to imitate her policy, which, to say nothing of poor, oppressed, and ruined Ireland, has reduced nearly one half of the people of England and Wales to poverty and wretchedness; which has spread pauperism, disease, and crime throughout her dominions; and which has reduced one hundred and thirty millions of people in India from freedom, and the ownership of fee simple estates, to poverty, servitude, and death by starvation, at the rate of half a million per year? Are such the fruits of her paper system? If they are, let us not follow her example.

The effects of the present banking system on the people of England may be seen by an able and authentic document, now in my hand. It is the report of the Directors of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures at Manchester, England, December 12, 1839, from which I beg leave to read the following extracts:

"It has been shown that the Bank no sooner found itself in a safe position, than it recommenced, in 1838, a system of expansion, and exported part of its stock of gold.

"Prices of the great staples before enumerated consequently advanced during the year 1838, and part of the year 1839, until, as we have seen, the restrictive policy was resumed, the motion of the screw was reversed, and, down to the present moment, prices have again fallen from 20 to 30 per cent. thus inflicting upon the already prostrate trading and manufacturing interest a repetition of the sacrifices of 1837.

"By these forced expansions and contractions of the currency during the last three years, some of the most prudent and wealthy of our merchants and manufacturers have incurred that ruin which, in a more wholesome and natural state of the circulating medium, could befall only the reckless adventurer or gambler.

"Under such a state of things as has been described, calculations based upon the most enlarged experience afford no security against loss and failure. The trader learns the fate of his undertakings not in the markets of the world, as influenced by the law of supply and demand, but in the acts of twenty-six irresponsible individuals conducting a joint stock banking association in the city of London.

"But the heavy pecuniary losses incurred by our capitalists, constitute a minor evil when compared with the moral and social injuries inflicted upon the laboring classes by the fluctuations in the currency. The board have directed their best attention to this part of the subject; the effects produced upon the condition of the great mass of the people by the operations of the Bank of England having hitherto been almost entirely overlooked.

"The late panic, by causing a diminution of our exports in 1837, as compared with the previous year, to the extent of ten millions; and by curtailing, proportionately, the amount of our home trade, was accompanied by a corresponding cessation of the demand for labor. In the spring and summer of that year, vast numbers of the working classes, in all the large towns, were suddenly deprived of employment, and thrown upon their own feeble resources for the maintenance of their families. Their first resort would naturally be to their own reserved funds; and in examining the reports of the various savings banks in the manufacturing districts, it has been found, in Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, Sheffield, Stockport, Huddersfield, Blockburn, Bolton, and every other place to which the board have directed their inquires, that although the laboring classes form but a small proportion of the depositors, the amount of money drawn from these institutions in 1837 exceeded, considerably, the sums lodged with them during that year.

"The next and only resource of the working classes, when deprived of employment, is the parochial poor fund. But in directing inquiries into the amount of parish relief afforded in 1837, as compared with previous years, the board found that the adoption of the new poor law act, about that time, and the consequent organization of parishes into unions, prevented them from instituting such comparisons. In the report of the poor law commissioners, dated the 17th July, 1837, are, however, recorded some statements of facts, which exhibit in a strong light the nature of the evil.

"The Commissioners begin by stating that they were deterred from making an earlier report, because of the sudden change which took place in the manufacturing districts, by the cessation of the usual employment, which made them desirous of possessing such information as they might be able to collect as to the working of the system under the adverse circumstances to which it became so suddenly exposed.

"The report states, that in the greater part of the manfacturing counties of Stafford, Nottingham, and Leicester, a cessation in the demand for labor took place in 1837, more sudden in its approach, and more extensive in its operations, than has been known on any previous occasion. In many places, owing to the insufficiency of the workhouse accommodation, they were obliged to suspend the order prohibiting out-door relief to the able-bodied. In Nottingham, after providing for nearly 700 persons by the workhouse, a subscription of £4,000 was entered into by the principal inhabitants of the town, and the unemployed operatives were set to work in constructing a road through some property belonging to the corporation.

"The report contains similar accounts of the state of the working classes in Coventry, Foleshill, Nuneaton, Mansfield, and other places; there is also a report from Dr. Kay, upon the condition of the Spitalfields weavers, in which he states that, out of 4,000 looms one-third are altogether disused, and that certain of the remaining looms are only partially employed. And Mr. Muggeridge, the migration agent, in a similar report from Manchester, dated July, 1837, says that the entire trade of the district was all at once paralyzed, and distrust suspended for a season almost all commercial operations.

"The board have inspected the various reports of the charitable bodies of the time, for further facts illustrative of the effects of the panic upon the working classes.

"In Birmingham large subscriptions were raised to relieve the distresses of the almost unprecedented numbers of unemployed work people. Sheffield was divided into districts, and upwards of 15,000 persons were at one time supported by charity. The committee of the distress fund stated, in a public appeal, that in hundreds of families, children were crying for food to parents unable to give it; and in others, sickness, arising from the want of the necessaries of life, threatens, without a speedy relief, to bring the sufferings of the wretched individuals to a close. The eighth annual report of the Liverpool Visiting Society for the year 1839, states that during the four preceding years, the average number of cases relieved by the board was 2,892, at a cost in provisions of £557 4s. 2d; whereas during the last year, the number was 9,902, at the cost of £1,338 1s. 2d.; and by a table of the number of inmates of the Liverpool Asylum for the houseless poor, it has been found that 15,781 were admitted in 1837, whilst the highest number admitted in any one of the three preceding years, amounted only to 10,559.

"The Leeds Church of England Visiting Society, in their annual report to the first of October, 1837, begin with lamenting the commercial embarrassments, and consequent privations of the poorer classes.

"Scotland was the first, as usual, to feel the effects of a pecuniary crisis.

"A public meeting was held in Glasgow on the 19th of May, 1837, to raise a subscription for the relief of the distressed of the working classes. Upwards of eight thousand pounds was placed at the disposal of the committee. At one time about 18,500 persons were fed from the soup kitchen, of whom upwards of 3,800 were grown persons. Large bodies of laborers were at the same time thrown out of employment, and rendered destitute in Dundee and other large towns in Scotland. In Paisley, a public meeting was held on the 11th of April, 1837, to raise a subscription, and in June it was calculated that 20,000 persons were unemployed; and at Strathaven and other towns and villages in the west of Scotland, destitution and disease prevailed to an alarming degree."

"Nor did Ireland escape her share of the common calamity. The committee of the Dublin Mendicity Association, in their report for 1837, state, that 'they have struggled through a year of most unparalleled difficulties, and that, within the recollection of the oldest inhabitants, there has seldom, if ever, occurred a period when out door employment was so much restricted.' And the 27th report of the Belfast House of Industry, dated the 16th March, 1837, dwells upon the urgent and numerous claims of the poor, 'among whom the depression of trade, arising from a panic in the money market, has produced much distress."

"Similar consequences must always flow from a forced contraction of the currency.

"Even at this moment, the same process on the part of the Bank of England is again going on, and producing a repetition of all those evils which have been enumerated. In Leeds, Nottingham, Paisley, Glasgow, and other large manufacturing towns, multitudes of industrious work people are thrown out of employment, whose privations are again causing a lamentable increase of pauperism, crime, and disease."

If such are the fruits of this paper money, or bank note system, in England, we envy not her wealth, her glory, or her splendor. We boast not of such evidences of national greatness. But we may well indulge in a just pride, that, while we do not possess her power, her wealth, her splendor, we are at least free from the wretchedness and misery which pervade her dominions; and we may content ourselves with the reflection that there is no monument of national greatness so permanent, so honorable, so glorious, as a well fed, well clothed, well lodged, well educated, and happy PEOPLE. And I conclude, therefore, by adopting the language of the bard:

'What constitutes a State?
Not high wrought battlement, or labored mound,
Thick wall, or moated gate;
Not cities fair, with spires and turrets crown'd;
Not bays or broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride:
Not star'd and spangled courts,
Where low-bowed baseness wafts perfume to pride.
No. MEN—high-minded MEN—Men,
Who their duties know, but know their rights,
And, knowing, dare maintain:
These constitute a State."

REMARKS OF MR. MCKAY,

OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, April 22, 1840—On the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government.

Mr. McKAY said that he would not detain the committee long, as, in the course of the remarks he was about submitting to it, he would not follow the example of gentlemen who had introduced into the debate various topics, which it appeared to him were wholly irrelevant. Some had thought this a fit occasion to discuss the pretensions of the two opposing candidates for the Presidency. It was his opinion that this was neither the time or the place for such a discussion. For his part, though decidedly preferring the re-election of Mr. Van Buren, he was willing to leave to the people of the United States, with whom the Constitution had placed it, the election of that high officer, being prepared to acquiesee in any choice they may make. His main object in rising to address the committee, was to say something on a subject fairly connected with the bill under consideration—he meant the public expenditures. It had been charged here, and elsewhere, that they were unnecessarily large and extravagant, and that the present Administration, and the one which immediately preceded it, were responsible for that extravagance. With regard to the present President, Mr. McK. said that he did not think it necessary to say a single word, further than to call the attention of the committee to that part of the annual message communicated to Congress at the commencement of this session, in which he alludes to the subject of the public expenditures, and to rest his vindication entirely upon that.

In the message of December 2, 1839, he says:

"The whole revenue then accruing from the customs, and from the sales of public lands, if not more, will undoubtedly be wanted to defray the necessary expenses of the Government under the most prudent administration of its affairs. These are circumstances that impose the necessity of rigid economy, and require its prompt and constant exercise. With the Legislature rest the power and duty of so adjusting the public expenditure as to promote this end. By the provisions of the Constitution, it is only in consequence of appropriations made by law, that money can be drawn from the Treasury; no instance has occurred since the establishment of the Government in which the Executive, though a component part of the legis-hveat power, has interposed an objection to an appropriation bill on the sole ground of its extravagance. His duty in this respect has been considered fulfilled, by requesting such appropriations only as the public service may be reasonably expected to require. In the present earnest direction of the public mind to this subject, both the Executive and Legislature have evidence of the strict responsibility to which they will be held; and while I am conscious of my own anxious efforts to perform with fidelity this portion of my public functions, it is a satisfaction to me to be able to count on a cordial co-operation from you.

"At the time I entered upon my present duties, our ordinary disbursements—without including those of the public debt, the post office, and the trust funds in charge of the Government—had been largely increased by appropriations for the removal of the Indians, for repelling Indian hostilities, and for other less urgent expenses, which grew out of an overflowing Treasury. Independent of the redemption of the public debt and trusts, the gross expenditures of seventeen and eighteen millions, in 1834 and 1835, had, by these causes, swelled to twenty-nine millions, in 1836; and the appropriations for 1837, made previously to the fourth of March, caused the expenditure to rise to the very large amount of thirty-three millions. We were enabled, during the year 1838, notwithstanding the continuance of our Indian embarrassments, somewhat to reduce this amount; and that for the present year (1839) will not, in all probability, exceed twenty-six millions, or six millions less than it was last year. With a determination, so far as depends on me, to continue this reduction, I have directed the estimates for 1840 to be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and to be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service. They will be found less than the expenditures of 1839, by over five millions of dollars."

From this brief, though plain, statement of facts, it appeared that, owing to causes which are referred to, the gross expenditures in 1837, caused by appropriations made before the 4th of March of that year, had risen to the very large amount of $33,000,000; that, in 1838, they were somewhat reduced; and, in 1839, they would not, probably, exceed $26,000,000; and, as there was a disposition professed on all sides to consult economy at this time—as the state of the Treasury imperiously required it—and as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and means [Mr. JONES] had informed us that there was no increase in the various items of the bill beyond what was asked for by the Departments; on the contrary, that, in some instances, they were reduced—the probability was, that, at the close of this session, the appropriations would not exceed the estimates, which were about $21,000,000: and thus would be effected, in the space of three years, a reduction of $12,000,000 in the disbursements of the Government. Mr. McK. thought that this fact, connected with others, mentioned in that part of the message which he had read, would afford to the people of the country an assurance that the President would heartily co-operate in the practice of the most rigid economy, and that "the expenditures would be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service."

Having said thus much in defence of the President against the charge of extravagance, he would proceed to examine how far it could be sustained against his predecessor; and as, in doing this, it will be necessary to refer to facts and events common to both Administrations, whatever may be said in favor of Gen. Jackson will necessarily enure to the defence of the President. He trusted that all honorable men would see the propriety of this being done, because in the accusations against those high officers, the party which supported them were necessarily involved, and had to share, more or less, the opprobrium which the accusation implied. The form in which the charge was usually made, was by instituting a comparison between the aggregate annual expenditures of the last four years of Jackson's administration and those of the four years of Mr. Adams's term; and as the former were larger than the latter, to assume the excess as proof of extravagance. It would readily occur to the most casual observer, that this mode of treating the subject was exceedingly unfair to the Executive, without, at the same time, making allowances for a variety of circumstances to which he would hereafter allude. Without at all relying on the opinion which has been advanced here, on the contrary rather disclaiming it, that even in regard to old and well established Governments, their expenses would keep pace with the growth in population and wealth, it seemed to him that the case of the Federal Government was a peculiar one; that it extends over a territory, the area of which is constantly increasing, and a large portion of which is comparatively new, and on which every thing has to be created; that the number of sovereign States has been doubled within the last fifty years—from thirteen to twenty-six; that three Territories are now knocking at the door for admission into the Union; and that the population had gone on augmenting from 3,921,426 in the year 1790, to 7,230,903 in 1810; to 12,866,020 in 1830; and the census that is now in progress will likely show the number to be between fifteen and seventeen millions.

It would be as reasonable to expect that the clothes made for the boy of five years old, would fit him when he became the active and vigorous youth of twenty, as that our young and growing country should be confined to the same wants, and requiring a stated amount only of annual expenditure. It would be found, on recurring to our past history, that the expenditures have increased at all periods with that wonderful development of our resources, to which he had already briefly alluded. In document No. 10 of the present session, is a table showing, among other things, the aggregate amount of expenditures in periods of four years, exclusive of the public debt and trust funds. From that table he would quote the following:

1793 to 1796	- -	12,083,205 38
1797 to 1800	- -	21,338,351 19
1801 to 1804	- -	17,174,432 96
1805 to 1808	- -	23,927,245 50
1809 to 1812	- -	36,149,857 98
1813 to 1816	- -	108,537,106 88
1817 to 1820	- -	58,698,057 71
1821 to 1824	- -	45,665,421 92
1825 to 1828	- -	49,313,197 18
1829 to 1832	- -	56,249,878 08
1833 to 1836	- -	87,130,428 08

Now, take the second term, from 1793 to 1796, when the amount of the expenditure was 12,083,205 38; pass over the two intervening terms, during the first of which we had difficulties with France; and during the second, the retrenchments of Mr. Jefferson were operating, and come to the fifth term, from 1805 to 1808, a period of profound peace, and you will find that the amount had nearly doubled—that is, they were $23,927,245 50. Again: pass by the three next periods, when the expenditures were affected by the war with Great Britain, and the causes which either preceded or followed it, and come to 1821 to 1824, and you have the same result, that is, nearly doubled; and by pursuing the comparisons, you will find that the increase from 1824 to 1836 is not greater than it had been before. But why should the periods that he had passed by not be also brought into the comparison? Had not the late Administration had its difficulties, domestic and foreign? Had there not been what is familiarly called the Black Hawk war in 1832; the hostilities of the Creeks and Seminoles, commencing in 1835 and 1836; the disturbances among the Cherokees, and also among the tribes on the Western frontier in 1836, all calling for large and new appropriations of money, either for their suppression or prevention? Had not that Administration a controversy with Mexico, and also with France, which for some time seriously threatened the peace of the country, and made it necessary, by timely and efficient preparation, to provide for any emergency that might grow out of them? The same remark is applicable to the present Administration, as the Seminole war was left to it, and has been prosecuted at great expense, from causes into which he would not now inquire; and it is well known that additional appropriations have been rendered necessary by the adoption of precautionary measures, to preserve the peace of the country, menaced at one time by the disturbances on the Northern frontier, and the embarrassments growing out of the Northeastern boundary question.

And, with a view of showing that some increase was perhaps natural and unavoidable, he would refer to a few States, whose Governments were older than that of the Union, and whose public establishments might therefore be well supposed to have attained greater maturity. The following statement will exhibit the payments out of the respective treasuries in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina, on account of the ordinary expenses:

	New York.	Pennsylvania.	N. Carolina.
1832	$417,072 57	$228,803 75	$119,598 68
1833	405,991 65	212,940 95	138,869 46
1834	493,588 03	227,187 46	191,634 11
1835	483,772 74	235,128 03	171,686 67
1836	539,038 46	259,159 38	589,086 62
1837	749,895 42	273,687 97	218,827 52
1838	900,486 63	285,656 47	171,855 71
1839	889,380 56	403,147 01	*

The committee will recollect that this statement does not include disbursements on account of the public works in any of these States, the management of which must necessarily involve considerable annual expenditures, and to execute which New York has now a debt of more than $15,000,000, and Pennsylvania a debt of more than $30,000,000.

The committee will also observe that the increase in the expenses of these States took place at the same time that the increase in the expenditures of the General Government occurred, viz: in 1836, '37, and '38. He might, if it were necessary, go through with an examination of all the States, when the same results would appear; but he presumed that the instances mentioned would be sufficient. It would be as well to add here, as in connection with what he had just said, that eighteen States, including New York and Pennsylvania, had, according to the last accounts that he had seen, an aggregate debt of $174,382,808, contracted principally within the last few years, and in execution of their several plans of public policy.

And with a knowledge of all this, M. MCKAY said that he would appeal to the committee and ask them whether the mere increase in the amount of expenditures was any proof at all of extravagance, supposing that the money had been laid out on proper objects, to which point he would hereafter speak. With a view of showing that it was not, Mr. MCKAY referred to the Post Office Department, which supported itself with the exception of what was required for the payment of the salaries of the Postmaster General and his Assistants, and the Auditor, and the clerks employed under them. Here, according to the logic of the Opposition, was a clear case of extravagance, inasmuch as the expenditures of the Department have not only doubled, but have been nearly trebled within the periods selected for the comparison. But let us see how the matter stands. The following statement, prepared from the documents, will show the relative means, and some of the details in the administration of that Department, at the beginning and end of a term of four years; the means being the gross revenue of the Department and absorbed in its expenditures, in the form either of compensation to postmasters, cost of transportation, or incidental and miscellaneous purposes connected with the mail service.

Years.	Revenue.	Cost of transportation.	No. of officers.
1816	$961,782	$521,970	3,260
1820	1,111,927	782,425	4,500
1824	1,197,758	768,939	5,182
1828	1,664,759	1,086,312	7,651
1832	2,466,108	1,776,801	9,469
1836	3,398,455	1,638,651	11,091

And the revenue has continued to increase, with occasional checks, produced by the general derangement in the business of the country that has prevailed for the last two or three years; so that in the year 1839, the amount of it was $4,476,638: the cost of transportation was $3,285,622, and the number of the post offices was 12,780, and is now 13,376. The aggregate amount of revenue received by the Department, from 1789 to 1828, inclusive, was $25,560,335. The amount received from 1829 to 1836, inclusive, was $20,094,025; and adding to the latter sum the receipts of the years 1837, 1838, and 1839, you have a grand aggregate of $32,969,864, within the last eleven years, being much larger than the amount received within the first forty years of the Government. Here is a very large increase, and yet the rates of postage have remained the same as they were fixed some time after the close of the war. No new charges had been imposed on the correspondence and business of the country, to swell the revenues of the Department—and would any gentleman have the hardihood to rise in his place, and say that because this larger amount had been disbursed, that that circumstance alone was proof of extravagance; on the contrary, had not the accommodations to the public been increased with the rise in the expenditures? The official reports would show that the number of post roads in all parts of the Union—the extent of mail service throughout the country, and the number of post offices, had all increased at the same rate with the revenues; and yet, for all this, as he said before, the rates of postage were not altered.

* The statement respecting the expenditures for North Carolina was received after the delivery of the speech. It is proper to remark, that the expenditures for several years have been increased by the rebuilding of the capitol, but it is as proper to include the appropriations for that purpose in the aggregate of the State, as it is to include appropriations for similar objects, such as Treasury and other buildings by the General Government, in its aggregate.

He was not aware that any gentleman in the Opposition had urged the increase in the expenditures of the Department, as an evidence of extravagance against it; yet, according to the principle they had laid down, there could be no other conclusion. And it is proper to notice here, a circumstance, which had been the cause of much misrepresentation on this subject. It was this: Prior to 1836, the revenues of the Department were disbursed exclusively under the control of the Postmaster General, without any appropriation by Congress, as they were not paid into the Treasury. In that year an act was passed, reorganizing the Post Office Department, and among other provisions, requiring the payment of all moneys received by it, into the Treasury, and an appropriation of it by law. Hence it is that the aggregate of appropriations by Congress, within the last few years, has been increased to the amount of what was needed for the service of the Department; and thus afforded to the Opposition, one of the pretences, upon which to make the charge of extravagance against the Administration.

Mr. McKAY, by way of further illustration, referred to the farmers of the country. Suppose the case of one who has emigrated from the East to the West. He buys a tract of land upon one of those rich and beautiful prairies, which abound there, and for which he goes in debt to the amount of $2,000. He settles down upon it with his family, and commences its improvement. The first work which he does, is to build himself a house, (or, if you please, a log cabin, to which the gentlemen, living in their splendid mansions, have of late taken such a liking,) and clear a field around it. By industry and economy, he would, in a few years, pay off the whole of the debt, and, in the mean time, supply all the moderate and reasonable wants of his family, with about $250 per annum of his income. After the payment of the debt, however, his family having become more numerous, his fields having been enlarged, his stock of every kind increased, and his crops more productive, he chooses to improve his buildings, to convert the log cabin into a more stately edifice of brick or of wood, to add to his landed estate, to send his sons and daughters to school, and to incur other expenses amounting in all to $800 or $900 per annum; and all this is done without going beyond his income. In such a case, what gentleman would get up and argue that this increase of expenditure was proof of extravagance? Why, no one in his senses would attempt it; and yet the charge against the Administration had been made on no better ground. If the Government, while making these expenditures, had contracted a large public debt, then there might have been some cause of blame; but such was not the case during the whole of the administration of Jackson. It was true that the present Administration had found it necessary to apply to and obtain of Congress a temporary authority to issue Treasury notes, in consequence of indulgence given to certain banks and merchants in the payment of moneys due by them to the Government, and with this qualification—in no year had the expenditures exceeded the receipts. And this brings us to a more interesting view of the subject.

The Government, for many years past, has had two principal sources of revenue only; that is, the customs and the sales of the public lands. It was true that there were some other items of a miscellaneous character—such as postages, balances on account of the old direct taxes, and internal revenue and dividends on the stock of the Bank of the United States during the continuance of its charter, but they were small in amount, and some of them had actually ceased, and would not therefore affect the general rule. Here, then, as he said before, we have had no other revenue than that arising from customs—that is, duties on foreign merchandise imported into the country, and the sales of the public lands. By the Constitution of the United States, the power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, and to pay the debts and to provide for the common defence and general welfare, is given to Congress only. In the exercise of this power, no more money should be taken from the people than the public wants require; and it is equally the duty of the Representatives to see that, when this money is collected, it should be applied to constitutional and useful purposes. All that the President can do, is in the performance of a duty enjoined upon him by the Constitution, "to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." He can do nothing more than this. He has no authority to originate a bill either to lay new taxes or to repeal old ones—as he has already shown that power lies with Congress, and with Congress alone must rest the responsibility. Now, in relation to this point, what had been the course of the Executive? The first term of General Jackson, as President, commenced on the 4th of March, 1829. The last act imposing duties on imports had been passed on the 19th of May, 1828. In his first message to Congress, in December, 1829, he thus invited its attention to the subject:

"Looking forward to the period not far distant, when a sinking fund will be no longer required, the duties on those articles of importation which cannot come into competition with our own productions, are the first that should engage the attention of Congress in the modification of the the tariff. Of these, tea and coffee are the most prominent. They enter largely into the consumption of the country, and have become articles of necessity to all classes. A reduction, therefore, of the existing duties, will be felt as a common benefit, but like all other legislation connected with commerce, to be efficacious and not injurious, it should be gradual and certain."

Such was the recommendation of the President, and on the 20th of May, 1830, an act was passed to reduce the duties on coffee, tea, and cocoa. By the provisions of that act, not only were material reductions make in regard to teas and cocoa, but from and after the 31st of December, 1830, the duty on coffee was to be reduced from five to two cents per pound; and after the 31st December, 1831, to one cent per pound. By two other acts, approved 29th May, 1830, the duty on molasses was reduced from ten to five cents per gallon, and the duty on salt from 20 to 15 cents; after the 31st December, 1830, until the 31st December, 1831, and after that time, to ten cents per bushel, and no more. In his second message, December, 1830, after expressing his opinion on various points connected with the revenues and manufactures of the country, and particularly the principles upon which protection should be given to the latter, he says:

"That the present tariff taxes some of the comforts of life unnecessarily high; it undertakes to protect interests too local and minute to justify a general exaction; and it also attempts to force some kinds of manufactures for which the country is not ripe;" and that "while an abandonment of the policy is neither to be expected and desired, the people have a right to demand, and have demanded, that it be so modified as to correct abuses and obviate injustice."

In his third message, Dec. 1831, he says:

"The confidence with which the extinguishment of the public debt may be anticipated, presents an opportunity for carrying into effect more fully the policy in relation to impost duties, which has been recommended in my former messages. A modification of the tariff, which shall produce a reduction of our revenue to the wants of our Government, and an adjustment of the duties on imports with a view to do equal justice in relation to all our national interests, and to the counteraction of foreign policy, so far as it may be injurious to those interests, is deemed to be one of the principal objects which demand the consideration of the present Congress. Justice to the interests of the merchant, as well as the manufacturer, requires that material reductions in the import duties be prospective: and unless the present Congress shall dispose of the subject, the proposed reductions cannot properly be made to take effect at the period when the necessity for the revenue arising from present rates shall cease. It is therefore desirable that arrangements be adopted at your present session to relieve the people from unnecessary taxation after the extinguishment of the public debt. In the exercise of that spirit of concession and conciliation which has distinguished the friends of our Union in all great emergencies, it is believed that this object may be effected without injury to any national interest."

And on the 14th of July, 1832, an act was passed to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, by which it was supposed that a reduction of several millions in the receipts of the Government would have been effected. Mr. Adams, who was chairman of the committee by whom the bill was reported, estimated that the reduction would be from five to eight or ten millions of dollars annually. But as a portion of the people were dissatisfied with that act on various grounds, and, among others, that it did not reduce enough, the President again, in his message at the opening of the next session, invoked the attention of Congress to the subject. In his message of December 4, 1832, he says:

"I cannot too cordially congratulate Congress and my fellow-citizens on the near approach of that memorable and happy event, the extinction of the public debt of this great and free nation. Faithful to the wise and patriotic policy marked out by the legislation of the country for this object, the present Administration has devoted to it all the means which a flourishing commerce has supplied, and a prudent economy preserved for the public Treasury. Within the four years for which the people have confided the Executive power to my charge, fifty-eight millions of dollars will have been applied to the payment of the public debt. That this has been accomplished without stinting the expenditure for all other proper objects, will be seen by referring to the liberal provision made during the same period for the support and increase of our means of maritime and military defence, for internal improvements of a national character, for the removal and preservation of the Indians, and, lastly, for the gallant veterans of the Revolution.

"The final removal of this great burden from our resources, affords the means of further provision for all the objects of general welfare and public defence, which the Constitution authorizes, and presents the occasion for such further reduction in the revenue as may not be required for them. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen that, after the present year, such a reduction may be made to a considerable extent, and the subject is earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, in the hope that the combined wisdom of the Representatives of the people will devise such means of effecting that salutary object, as may remove those burdens which shall be found to fall unequally upon any, and as may promote all the great interests of the community.

"Long and patient reflection has strengthened the opinion I have heretofore expressed to Congress on this subject; and I deem it my duty, on the present occasion, again to urge them upon the attention of the Legislature. The soundest maxim of public policy, and the principles upon which our Republican institutions are founded, recommend a proper adaptation of the revenue to the expenditure; and they also require that the expenditure shall be limited to what, by an economical administration, shall be consistent with the simplicity of the Government, and necessary to an efficient public service. In effecting this adjustment, it is due, injustice, to the interest of the different States, and even to the preservation of the Union itself, that the protection afforded by existing laws to any branches of the national industry, should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war. If, upon investigation, it shall be found, as it is believed it will be, that the legislative protection granted to any particular interest is greater than is indispensably requisite for these objects, I recommend that it be gradually diminished, and that, as far as may be consistent with these objects, the whole scheme of duties be reduced to the revenue standard, as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government, and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry, will permit."

And on the second March, 1833, another act was passed, commonly called the compromise act, amendatory of that of the 14th of July, 1832. Now let us see what has been the effect of these several changes, bearing constantly in mind that the object of them all was either to reduce existing duties, or to repeal them altogether. By the following table, prepared by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen that there has been a large reduction in the amount of taxation imposed upon the people in the form of duties, effected by the several acts of Congress to which he had referred:

Year ending 31st Dec.	Actual accruing duties.	Estimated duties under the tariff act of 1833.*	Reduced duties under special acts, etc.	Payments into the Treasury.

*Estimated on the imports during the years ending on the 30th of September.

Now let us notice some of the results presented by this table. The whole amount of revenue received by the General Government from customs, from 1789 to 1838 inclusive, was $710,285,875 22, of which was received, from

1825 to 1828, Adams's term, $86,457,852 15
1829 to 1832, Jackson's first term, 97,294,606 31
1832 to 1836, Jackson's second term, 88,048,717 18
In the years 1837 and '38, the first two years of Van Buren's term, 27,328,090 75

It further appeared, from what he had read, that there was reduced, from 1830 to 1838, $170,539,329 29, of which $11,218,708 18 was reduced from 1830 to 1832, and $105,910,925 15 from 1833 to 1836; and notwithstanding this very large reduction, the receipts during the latter period were a million and a half larger than they were from 1825 to 1828. It further appears from this table, that under the operation of the various acts of Congress to which he had referred, regulating the tariff of duties, that the reductions continued to increase, as they amounted to $53,409,685 86 in the years 1837 and 1838, the first two of Mr. Van Buren's administration; and that there has been a considerable falling off in the receipts, as in these two years they amounted to $27,328,090 75 only; and that a large proportion of this reduction has fallen on articles which are the necessaries of life, and which we either drink or wear. By another table, also prepared under the direction of the Secretary, and more in detail, it appeared that, in the years 1834 to 1838 inclusive, the following amounts were reduced on the articles enumerated:

	Aggregate amount estimated under the tariff of 1828, from 1834 to 1838, inclusive.	Aggregate amount under the tariff of 1832, &c. for the same years.	Aggregate amount of reduced duties under various acts for same years.

Silks,	16,765,528 91	1,729,928 10	15,635,600 81
Linen,	7,950,469 44	332,139 85	7,618,329 59

Salt,	5,989,791 80	2,585,098 73	3,404,693 67

Now on these ten articles alone, either used in our families or on our plantations and farms, there has been an aggregate reduction, in the five years, of $96,604,721 14.

These are astonishing results, and yet they were produced by following the only safe rule which you can adopt in the investigation of this subject, and that is, to estimate the duties under the act of 1828, had it not been repealed or modified on the amount of the actual imports into the country. It is due, however, to candor, to state that, in his opinion, the importations would not have been as heavy as they have been, had the act of 1828 continued in force, as the high duties imposed by it upon some articles would have checked their consumption, and the yet higher duties upon others would, perhaps, have prohibited their importation altogether. Onerous and oppressive as some of the duties were under that act, they could not have kept down the energies of our people, and there would have been, under their operation, a gradual increase in the importations and the receipts from them. This is proved by our past history. Without going further back, let us see what was the effect of the act of 1828 upon the revenue, even while in full force. In 1827, the payments into the Treasury from customs were $19,712,283 29, somewhat less than they had been in the previous year, probably in some measure owing to the discussions concerning the tariff, and the doubts entertained by the commercial classes as to what action Congress would take upon it. In the next year, among other causes, there being a general expectation that the tariff would be modified, the importations were heavier than they had been, to avoid the higher duties which it was believed would be laid; and hence the payments rose to $23,205,523 64. In 1829 and '30, there was an inconsiderable falling off from the effects of the former stimulus, and the receipts of the latter year being slightly affected by the modification which the act of 1828 had undergone concerning coffee, cocoa, and molasses. In 1831 they recovered; and notwithstanding the large reductions made in that year and in 1832, they continued to improve, until, in 1833, they had swollen to $29,032,318 91. It would be easy to show that the same results had either preceded or followed the passage of the act of 1824, but it is deemed unnecessary. It will be vain for gentlemen to deny, that had not these reductions been made, the receipts would have been greater; and the expenditures, therefore, must necessarily have been many millions, annually, larger than they have actually been.

For what purpose were the duties on a number of articles increased by the act of 1828? The object avowed, to be sure, was a double one—to raise revenue, and to protect the domestic industry of the country. Whatever it may have been, the effect, so far as it respects the extent of the burdens which it imposed upon the people, was precisely the same, with the aggravation, that if the additional duties were levied exclusively for the benefit of manufactures, the difference would have enured to that interest, and not to the common Treasury of the country. In a speech delivered in the Senate by Mr. Clay, February 25th, 1837, with boldness which characterizes him, he says "that the great question so long agitated between different portions of the Union, has not been whether, in laying a bill for revenue, the Government may not levy a duty which gives incidental protection to the industry of our own citizens—for this none will deny—but whether such protection is in itself a proper and legitimate object for which taxes may be laid. The friends of the protective policy have always maintained the latter proposition." In taking off the duties, whether laid for the purpose of putting money into the Treasury or in the pockets of the manufacturers, the people must have been relieved. He would not pause to inquire whether the duties were paid by the producers of our exports, or the producers of the imports received in exchange for them, or the consumers of the latter. These, and various other questions of political economy connected with the tariff, he would pass by. It is sufficient for his purpose that they were taxes in some form, and paid by somebody. Mr. ADAMS, in his report from the Committee on Manufactures, on the 25th May, 1832, says:

"The payment of a large national debt is a novelty in the history of nations; a remission of a large amount of taxes for that cause, is equally unprecented."

Again:

"The Committee on Manufactures are aware that the remission of taxes must, in its nature, be a measure always acceptable to the people; nor are they, as servants of the people, insensible of the gratification with which every member of the present Congress may share in such a measure at this time. They feel the delight with which every one permitted to enjoy the luxuries of assenting to such a remission in the benevolence of his disposition, and they understand the power of an eloquent and animated appeal to the legislative authority to leave all moneys not absolutely indispensable for the public expenditure in the pockets of the people. The committee perceive also, upon so singular an occurrence as that which admits of the remission of taxes to a considerable amount, such as in the present case, the question arises to what extent the reduction shall be sanctioned; the desire of increasing that amount may be more intense in the mind of one member than in that of another. When all are to share in the credit of the remission, the distinctive merit to the aspirant for popular favor will belong to him who urges for a remission to the largest extent. The committee are of opinion that there may be danger of being led astray by this conception, as ten millions of money annually heretofore appropriated for the public debt will no longer be needed. The most natural conclusion to be drawn from this, would seem to be that ten millions is the amount which may and ought to receive remission. If the remission of a larger sum can be urged as expedient, it must arise not from that, but from another cause."

Mr. McK. said, to show that he was not singular in the view that he had taken of the reduction made by those various acts to which he had referred, he would quote the opinion of a distinguished Senator, expressed in his place in the Senate on the 21st of December, 1836. In that speech, Mr. CALHOUN, speaking of the compromise act, said:

"We of the South had derived incalculable advantage from that act, and, as one belonging to that section, he claimed all these advantages to the very last letter. That act had reduced the income of the Government greatly. Few, he believed, were aware of the extent to which it operated. It was a fact, which the documents would show, that the act of 1828 arrested at the custom-house one half in value of the amount of imports. The imports at that time, deducting reshipments, were about $65,000,000 in value, out of which the Government collected about $32,000,000 in the gross. The imports of the last year, deducting reshipments, amounted to $120,000,000, which, if the tariff of 1828 had not been reduced, would have given an income of $60,000,000 instead of upwards of $21,000,000. He claimed not the whole difference for the compromise, but upwards of $20,000,000 may be fairly carried to its credit. Under this great reduction, we of the South began to revive—our business began to thrive and look up. But the compromise act had not yet discharged its functions. Its operation would continue until the revenue should be brought down till no duty should exceed 20 per centum ad valorem, and the revenue be reduced to the actual wants of the Government."

Yes, sir, the Senator was right. Not only the South, but the North, East, and West, began to revive. The business, not of one section, but of the whole Union, began to thrive and look up. The people had been released from a great load of taxation, by the joint action of the compromise act, and those of the 14th of July, 1832, and of ——— May, 1830, and thenceforward a new impulse was given to their business and enterprise. In proof of this, let us again turn to the tables. The following statement will exhibit the value of the imports, deducting reshipments, and also of the domestic exports:

Value of Merchandise.

	IMPORTS.			EXPORTS.
Years.	Free of duty.	Payment of duty.	Total.

He begged gentlemen to observe in the years 1833 to 1836, inclusive, the value of merchandise free of duty, was $209,203,943 greater than the value of the same description of imports in the years 1825 to 1828, inclusive; and, notwithstanding this, the value of the merchandise paying duties, either specific or ad valorem, was $32,745,052 greater, during the former than the latter term of four years. It was probably true that some of this increase was owing to the sales of the State or corporation stocks, which had been negotiated abroad within the last few years, thus creating a debt against the country to the amount of the stock thus sold; yet it would not escape the attention of the committee, that there was a large increase in the value of the exports, and hence that at least a corresponding increase in the value of the imports was natural and unavoidable. There was another striking fact which he would ask gentlemen to notice, as illustrating the difference in the business of the country in the two periods which he had been considering. It will be found in the following statement of the imports and exports of gold and silver coin and bullion in a term of four years:

	Imports.	Exports.
1821 to 1824	$24,411,627	$34,675,778
1825 to 1828	28,672,605	29,433,126
1829 to 1832	28,773,025	21,774,064
1833 to 1836	51,514,328	15,400,570
1837 & 1838	28,263,530	9,484,395

The statement shows that the exports of coin and bullion were $10,524,672 more than the imports in the eight years, from 1821 to 1828, inclusive, thus diminishing the specie circulation in the country to that amount; and, further, that the imports were $43,112,719 more than the exports in eight years, from 1829 to 1836, inclusive, and that in the years 1837 and 1838, the imports were $18,779,135 more than the exports, thus making an aggregate in these ten years of $61,891,804, being an actual increase to that amount of the specie in the country—to which may be added the product of the gold mines in the South during the same period. It is well known that the late Executive earnestly desired to increase the specie in the United States; and, among other acts of his administration, to further that object, he caused to be brought home, in gold and silver coin, a large portion of the indemnities that had been reclaimed from foreign Governments.

It was not material to his purpose to express an opinion of the act of 1828, nor to inquire by what party it was supported; neither would he stop to discuss the merits of the compromise act, and that of the 14th of July, 1832, or the claims of individuals and parties to the credit of the passage of those measures. His purpose had been simply to trace the legislation of Congress, by which important changes had been made in the provisions of the act of 1828, and to point out the consequences that resulted from them; and, further, to show what had been the conduct of the Executive in relation thereto. But after all that had been done, the receipts into the Treasury from customs were large, and, including those from the public lands, were much larger than had been anticipated by any one. Who then is responsible for this superabundance in the Treasury? For our country has presented the extraordinary spectacle, within the last few years, of the people wrangling, not about the amount of receipts—not about the amount of money taken from their pockets by the Government, but the amount of expenditures after the money had been collected from them, with their consent. He had already referred to the several messages of the President to show the character of his recommendations on this subject. As some captious persons might insist that these messages merely dealt in generalities, and were all very good in themselves, yet nothing could be inferred as to what the Executive really desired or intended, he would endeavor to be more specific. The Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. M'Lane] in his annual report to Congress, in December, 1831, after stating that "independently of the charge of the public debt, the revenue for the expenditures of the Government, as at present authorized, need not, it is estimated, exceed annually the sum of $15,000,000;" and further specifying such new objects for which appropriations at the proper time ought to be provided for, says:—"For the foregoing purposes, together with the existing expenditure, and a moderate allowance for such objects of general improvement as shall be of acknowledged national character, within the limits, as admitted by the Executive, of the powers of Congress over the subject, an annual revenue of fifteen millions of dollars will be fully adequate." On the 27th of April, 1832, he makes a report to the House, in which he submits a bill, the basis of which was a total repeal of the act of the 19th of May, 1828, from and after the 3d of March, 1833, and a limitation of the revenue afterwards to be raised by a new system of duties, to the existing expenditures of the Government, and to such other necessary expenditures as the exigency of the public service may require, and Congress in its wisdom may authorize." And for these objects, he again estimates an annual revenue of fifteen millions of dollars as necessary, of which he says that three millions will be received from the public lands. The bill thus proposed by the Secretary, was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was the chairman, as he is now. On the 25th of May following he made an able and eloquent report, from which he would quote one or two passages only to show the influence under which that committee had acted: on page 24: "The draft of the bill presented by the Secretary of the Treasury was prepared in a spirit of compromise between the two great and seemingly conflicting interests, chiefly to be effected by the reduction of the revenue. In this purpose it was to be expected that it could not be altogether satisfactory to either; and its provisions have accordingly been considered of questionable policy by different members of the committee under the impression on the one part, that the reduction of the revenue anticipated by it, was too extensive, and on the other, not extensive enough. It proposes to reduce the revenue to be raised from duties on imports to $12,000,000, and thereby to remit, of the existing duties, upwards of ten millions. This reduction, in the view of the manufacturing interest—an interest closely and intimately connected with its internal improvement, and the interest specially represented in this House by this committee, is deemed to be excessive. It proposes a diminution of revenue of more than the sum liberated from its present appropriation for the payment of the national debt. The majority of this committee are of opinion, founded upon principles submitted to the consideration of the House in this report, that no reduction should be made, at least at the present time, equal to the whole amount of the annual appropriation thus liberated, that is, ten millions. Upon this opinion, however, they will not now further enlarge. The projet in the draft of the bill is considered by other members of the committee as exceptionable for opposite reasons—that the reduction, in their opinion, is not extensive enough. Under this variety of views, the committee have made several modifications in the bill proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and now report for the consideration of the House a bill, not such as would in its details be satisfactory to every member of the committee, but is that upon which they have been able to unite a majority of their own views." They then state the various modifications, add:

"In these deviations from the draft of a bill reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to the House, the majority of the committee have done full justice to the intentions of that officer. They have perceived in the draft a spirit and temper entirely congenial to their own, an earnest desire to conciliate and harmonize the adverse feelings and interests of the two divisions of the Union. Unable to concur with him in all the details of his drafted bill, they have felt it their duty to depart from them as seldom as possible, consistent with the obligations to the interest which it is their special charge to maintain."

The bill, thus prepared, became the act of the 14th July, 1832. He had already observed that it did not give satisfaction, and that, at the next session, the President again called the attention of Congress to the subject. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report of December, 1832, after stating that, from all sources, there would be an aggregate revenue of twenty-one millions in the year, and adds:

"In the last annual report on the state of the finances, the probable expenses for all objects other than the public debt were estimated at fifteen millions. This is still believed to be a fair estimate; and, if so, there will be an annual surplus of six millions. Still firmly convinced of the truth of the reasons then presented for a reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, I am again urged, by a sense of duty, to suggest that a further reduction of six millions be made, to take effect after the year 1833."

In pursuance of this suggestion, a bill was introduced into the House by Mr. Verplanck, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and then in the confidence of the Administration, and, after being discussed for a long time in the House, was finally superseded by what is commonly known as the Compromise bill. He did not affirm that Mr. Verplanck's bill could have passed, had it not been for the introduction of the substitute; yet it was understood to embody the views of the Secretary, and that the reduction under it would have been more rapid and considerable than under the compromise. It has been admitted by the two distinguished Senators who are supposed to have had a chief agency in the preparation of that bill, that they foresaw, at the time, that there would be, under its operation, a surplus in the Treasury. In the speech before referred to, Mr. Calhoun said:

"He stood, personally, without pledge or plighted faith, as far as that act was concerned. He clearly foresaw, at the time that bill passed, that there would be a surplus of revenue in the Treasury. He knew that result to be unavoidable, unless by a reduction so sudden as to overthrow our manufacturing establishments—a catastrophe which he sincerely desired to avoid. Whatever might be thought to the contrary, he had always been the friend of those establishments. He thought, at the time, that the reduction provided for in the bill had not been made to take place as fast as it might have been. But the terms of the bill formed the only ground on which the opposing interests could agree; and he, as in part representing one of the Southern States, accepted it."

And he proposed, as a remedy, an amendment of the Constitution, by which Congress might be temporarily authorized to make a distribution of the surplus among the States. Mr. Clay, on the same day, said:

"He had foreseen, at the period of the passage of the act, the probability of a large surplus, beyond the wants of the Government, economically administered; and he had endeavored, simultaneously with the passage of the act, to provide for it, by the introduction of the land bill."

And, on another occasion, he said:

"I thought I saw a course marked out, which must lead to the utter and entire destruction of the protective system. * * * I saw, in 1832, that a great crisis had arisen. I saw, on the one hand, that we were menaced with a speedy destruction of the entire protective system; while, on the other, I beheld one member of the Confederacy," &c.

And as having an important and intimate connection with this part of the subject, we must not forget the vetoes of the President to several bills, appropriating money for purposes of internal improvement. Commencing between the years 1808 and 1812, with the Cumberland road, the power had been slowly and constantly extending itself; until, in 1825 and 1828, it had embraced several works in different parts of the Union, and the expenditures for these purposes had risen from $165,670 56 in the former period, to $2,112,419 01 in the latter; and had it not been for this old man of "iron will," it would, at this time, have comprehended every object of internal improvement, either of a local or national character, in the Union, and have absorbed all the revenues of the Government. General Jackson, in his message (December 1st, 1834,) says:

"Yet we all know that, notwithstanding these grave objections, this dangerous doctrine was at one time apparently proceeding to its final establishment with fearful rapidity. The desire to embark the Federal Government in works of internal improvement prevailed, in the highest degree, during the first session of the first Congress that I had the honor to meet in my present situation. When the bill, authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States, for stock in the Maysville and Lexington Turnpike Company, passed the two Houses, there had been reported, by the Committees on Internal Improvements, bills containing appropriations for such objects, inclusive of those for the Cumberland road, and for harbors and light-houses, to the amount of about one hundred and six millions of dollars. In this amount was included authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for the stock of different companies to a great extent, and the residue was principally for the direct construction of roads by this Government. In addition to these projects, which had been presented to the two Houses under the sanction and recommendation of their respective Committees on Internal Improvements, there were then still pending before the committees, and in memorials presented, but not referred, different projects for works of a similar character, the expense of which cannot be estimated with certainty, but must have exceeded one hundred millions of dollars."

Now let us turn to the proofs of the firmness of this President in resisting the exercise of a power, which many patriotic men consider the most fruitful parent of profuse and profligate expenditure, and thus subversive of the purity and stability of our institutions. On the 27th May, 1830, he returns to the House, with his objections, a "bill authorizing a subscription of stock in the Maysville, Washington, Paris, and Lexington Turnpike Company," of 1,500 shares—(amount not stated.) On the 31st May, he returns to the Senate a "bill to authorize a subscription of stock in the Washington Turnpike Company," for 4,500 shares, equal to $90,000. On the 31st May, 1830, he returns a bill from the House, making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacons, and monuments, placing buoys, and for improving harbors, and directing surveys, amounting to $430,493; also an act to authorize a subscription of stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, for 1,000 shares, equal to $100,000. December 6, 1832, returns to the House "an act for the improvement of certain harbors, and the navigation of certain rivers, containing appropriations to the amount of $554,869. June 30, 1834, retains a bill from the Senate "to improve the navigation of the Wabash river, appropriating $20,000." And as further showing his determination by the use of his veto, to resist improvident appropriations, it may be remarked here, that, on the 6th Dec. 1832, he returned to the Senate "a bill providing for the final settlement of the claims of the States for interest on advances to the United States made during the last war." And though no amount is stated in the bill, it was well understood that its passage would involve an expenditure of upwards of a million. Senator Hill estimated at $1,300,000. Now it was not so much on account of the amount of appropriations in these bills for purposes of internal improvement, that the country approved of the vetoes of them: it was the limitation which was attempted to be placed on a most dangerous power; and though it has continued to be exercised, and the expenditures under it have been constant increasing, yet all candid persons will admit, whether agreeing with the President in his views of the constitutional limitation or not, that his vetoes gave a check at least to this class of appropriations. It is notorious that the party opposed to the then Administration had labored hard to divert the funds of the nation from the payment of the public debt, and apply them to purposes of internal improvement. Even after the power had been signally rebuked in the manner he had mentioned, its friends endeavored to maintain it, by forcing every work within the limits, admitted by the President for its exercise. It was under this influence, and perhaps a hope that the power would ultimately triumph, that the Committee on Manufactures, in the session of 1831 and 1832, would not consent to a larger reduction. Thus: "they ask that a portion of the common treasure should continue to be applied to great works of internal improvements." "This portion," they think, "should not only be unimpaired, but increased, in consequence of the removal of the burden of the public debt. Internal improvement is, itself, the most effective means of providing for the common defence—the defence common, not only to the whole people, our cotemporaries of the present age, but common to our posterity of numberless after generations." It must be obvious to all, who have at all attended to the history of our legislation, for the last twenty years, that the tariff and internal improvements were parts of the same system, and that one could not be supported without the othe. Hence the advocates of the former were disposed to favor the latter, by opposing, as far they dare to do, the remission of duties.

This is a brief history of what had been accomplished in the way of reduction of revenue during the administration of Jackson. He (Mr. M'K.) did not claim for Jackson and his friends the whole credit of it. What he insisted on as entirely just to them, was, that if they were held responsible for the increase in the amount of expenditures, they should receive at least some credit for the earnest, repeated, and often successful efforts which they made to relieve the people from unnecessary taxation. Though the President did not recommend, in his three next annual messages, any further changes in the tariff laws, as the effects of the reductions which were then in progress upon the revenue, could not be distinctly foreseen; yet he earnestly and respectfully pressed upon Congress the importance of abstaining from all appropriations which were no absolutely required for the public interests, and authorized by the powers clearly delegated to the United States. Thus, in his message of December 3, 1833, he said:

"We are beginning a new era in our Government. The national debt, which has so long been a burden on the Treasury, will be finally discharged in the course of the ensuing year. No more money will afterwards be needed than what may be necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. Now is the proper moment to fix our system of expenditures on firm and durable principles, and I cannot too strongly urge the necessity of a rigid economy, and an inflexible determination not to enlarge the income beyond the real necessities of the Government, and not to increase the wants of the Government by unnecessary and profuse expenditures. If a contrary course be pursued, it may happen that the revenue of 1834 will fall short of the demands upon it; and after reducing the tariff, to lightens the burdens of the people, and providing for a still further reduction, to take effect hereafter, it would be much to be deplored, if, at the end of another year, we shall find ourselves obliged to retrace our steps, and impose additional taxes to meet necessary expenditures."

And, in the same message, he also expressed the opinion that

"The rule as now fixed by law on the various articles, was adopted at the last session of Congress, as a matter of compromise, with unusual unanimity, and unless it is found to produce more than the necessities of the Government call for, there would seem to be no reason, at this time, to justify a change."

Such were his sentiments—a disposition to respect the compromise act, unless it was found to produce more than the wants of the Government, and, at the same time, not to increase those wants by profuse and unnecessary expenditures, until, in 1836, towards the close of his spendid civil career, when, finding that the revenue continued to accumulate, in a manner unexpected to every one, he, at the session which commenced in December of that year, again invited the attention of Congress to the subject. In his annual message of that year he says:

"Considering the intimate connection of the subject with the financial interests of the country, and its great importance, in whatever aspect it can be viewed, I have bestowed upon it the most anxious reflection, and feel it to be my duty to state to Congress such thoughts as have occurred to me, to aid their deliberations, in treating it in the manner best calculated to conduce to the common good.

"The experience of other nations admonished us to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt, but it will be in vain that we have congratulated each other upon the disappearance of this evil, if we do not guard against the equally great one of promoting the unnecessary accumulation of public revenue. No political maxim is better established than that which tells us that an improvident expenditure of money is the parent of profligacy, and that no people can hope to perpetuate their liberties who long acquiesce in a policy which taxes them for objects not necessary to the legitimate and real wants of their Government. Flattering as is the condition of our country at the present period, because of its unexampled advance in all the steps of social and political improvement, it cannot be disguised that there is a lurking danger already apparent in the neglect of this warning truth, and that the time has arrived when the representatives of the people should be employed in devising some more appropriate remedy than now exists, to avert it.

"Under our present revenue system, there is every probability that there will continue to be a surplus, beyond the wants of the Government; and it has become our duty to decide whether such a result be consistent with the true objects of our Government.

"Should a surplus be permitted to accumulate, beyond the appropriations, it must be retained in the Treasury, as it now is, or distributed among the people or the States.

"To retain it in the Treasury, unemployed in any way, is impracticable. It is, besides, against the genius of our free institions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation. To take from the people the right of bearing arms, and put their weapons of defence in the hands of a standing army, would be scarcely more dangerous to their liberties, than to permit the Government to accumulate immense amounts of treasure, beyond the supplies necessary to its legitimate wants. Such a treasure would doubtless be employed, at some time, as it has been in other countries, when opportunity tempted ambition.

"To collect it merely for distribution to the States, would seem to be highly impolitic, if not as dangerous as the proposition to retain it in the Treasury. The shortest reflection must satisfy every one, that to require the people to pay taxes to the Government merely that they may be paid back again, is sporting with the substantial interests of the country, and no system which produces such a result can be expected to receive the public countenance. Nothing could be gained by it, even if each individual, who contributed a portion of the tax, could receive back promptly the same portion. But it is apparent that no system of the kind can ever be enforced, which will not absorb a considerable portion of the money to be distributed in salaries and commissions to the agents employed in the process, and in the various losses and depreciations which arise from other causes; and the practical effect of such an attempt must ever be to burden the people with taxes, not for purposes beneficial to them, but to swell the profits of deposite banks, and support a band of useless public officers.

"The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned, is, to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government, and let the people keep the balance of their property in their own hands, to be used for their own profit. Each State will then support its own Government, and contribute its due share towards the support of the General Government. There would be no surplus to cramp and lessen the resources of individual wealth and enterprise, and the banks would be left to their ordinary means."

And a bill was brought into the Senate by its Committee of Finance, proposing a further reduction on about three millions; and it actually passed that body by nearly a party vote, the friends of the Administration voting for it, and its opponents against it. Thus much as to that portion of our revenue receivable from customs. He might proceed further, and allude to the resolutions moved by himself in the House, in the session of 1835 and '36; to the bill reported by Mr. Cambreleng, from the Committee of Ways and Means, and to which the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] informed us he was opposed, in the session of 1836 and '37, both proposing a reduction and both movements generally supported by the friends of the Administration; but he deemed it unnecessary. It may be safely affirmed that the President, and at least a majority of his friends in Congress, were in favor of bringing down that part of our revenue to the wants of the Government, economically administered.

As to Mr. Van Buren, there has been no occasion, since his election to the Presidency, that made it necessary or proper, in his communications to Congress, to recommend any reduction of the revenue from this source. The great revulsion that occurred in 1837, caused a great falling off in the receipts from the customs; so that in that year they amounted to $11,169,290; and in 1838, $16,158,800 36—somewhat more than in 1837.

Now in respect to the public lands. There have been no material changes made in the laws regulating them since 1820, the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, then fixed, not being altered; and notwithstanding this, the receipts from this source have been unusually large. It appears from the tables in one of the documents, that the whole amount received from 1789 to 1839, was $106,021,938 11, of which $75,075,404 97 was received from 1829 to 1839. This fact, showing the most extraordinary increase, should teach us caution in judging public events, or in expressing praise or censure on any of the measures of an Administration. No one had expected so large an increase. He had already shown that Mr. M'Lane, in 1832, did not estimate the receipts from this source higher than $3,000,000. Mr. Calhoun, in his patronage report, as late as 1835, estimated them at $3,500,000 only. Various causes, however, contributed to produce this increase. The extinguishment of the Indian titles to extensive tracts of valuable land in several of the States and Territories—the great number of foreigners, who have within the last few years emigrated to this country and settled in the West, and the spirit of speculation, fostered in some degree by our banking system, seized hold of the public domain, as a subject upon which to operate, and thus a greater quantity of it was was sold than was required for settlement. As soon as this latter operation became apparent—that the lands were passing into the hands of speculators in exchange for bank credits—the President took decided steps to arrest it. All will recollect the celebrated specie circular and the recommendation in his annual message in 1836, to confine the sales of the public lands to actual settlers. It is known that a bill did pass the Senate by a party vote, the friends of the Administration voting for it, providing for the latter object.

With regard to the former measure, he would not now discuss either its legality or policy, both of which have been so much questioned. He thought that he might safely assert, that the immediate effect of it was to check the sales—to prevent a further exchange of the rich and valuable lands of the Government, in the South and West, for depreciated, and perhaps worthless bank paper, and that it hastened the crisis in the monetary affairs of the country which soon after occurred; and that it also diminished the intensity of that crisis, by preventing the further extension of bank paper, which would otherwise have taken place. His regret was that it had not been issued earlier, for if it had been, a good deal of the pressure that was afterwards felt would have been avoided. It may also be observed here, that a considerable proportion, perhaps one-half, of the receipts from the sales of the public lands from 1830 to 1839, were from that part of them that had been acquired from the Indians within that period; so that in the years 1835, '6, and '7, when the sales were so heavy, the Government was only getting back the moneys that it had previously laid out in the purchase of the very lands it had thus sold.

Mr. McK. then insisted that these various acts, the history of which he had endeavored to trace, having failed to prevent an accumulation of a surplus in the Treasury, the existence of that surplus was one cause of the increase in the expenditure. If the money was collected, it must be spent. It would be ruinous to the best interests of the country to hoard its public revenues. A distinguished Senator has said:

"Experience has abundantly proved, that so long as there is a large surplus in the Treasury, the interests in favor of its expenditure will ever be stronger than that opposed to it; and that no prudential considerations, arising from the necessity of accumulating funds to meet future wants, or the hazard of enlarging Executive patronage, or the danger of corrupting the political and public morals of the country, by useless and profuse expenditure, or any other whatever, are sufficient to resist the temptation. If one unworthy object of appropriation is defeated, another, with no greater claims on the public bounty or justice, will ever stand ready to urge its claims, till the frugal and patriotic are wearied out with useless and incessant efforts to guard the Treasury."

If more money was collected than the proper wants of the Government required, he must repeat, what he had already said, that those who opposed the adoption of measures to prevent a surplus, were clearly responsible to the country. The President, who recommended, and the members of Congress who voted for, the several acts reducing reducing revenue, are certainly entitled to the credit of diminishing the expenditures, for it must be apparent to all, that, had the act of 1828 remained in force, without any alteration of its provisions, the receipts under it would have been much larger, and the expenditures would probably have ranged from forty to sixty millions annually.

Such, he believed, would have been the state of things, had not a check been put to what has been called the American system. In saying this much in defence of the party with which he usually acted, he did not wish to be understood as making any imputations at all upon the conduct or motives of those who had taken an opposite course. He was aware of the difficulties of the period through which we had passed, and would therefore be exceedingly circumspect in censuring any one for the part he had acted in it. He believed that there were many persons who looked upon the act of 2d, March, 1833, as a compromise of the great controversy respecting the tariff, which had so long agitated the country, and who would not, for that reason alone, support any proposition that might, in its tendency, if adopted, disturb the principles upon which that act was framed. After all, how ever, that had been done—after the people had been relieved from a large amount of taxation in the manner he had explained—there was still a large amount in the Treasury, and he would proceed to inquire how it had been disposed of, and to what purposes applied? It will be recollected that the Constitution expressly provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except by appropriations made by law. He had already shown that Congress alone can originate bills for raising or reducing revenue; so it equally belongs to that body to direct its expenditure after it has been received into the Treasury. Before he would proceed to examine into the purposes to which the moneys have been applied, he would make a few remarks upon one or two points that are properly connected with this part of the subject.

The first relates to the cost of collection, that is, the expense incurred by the Government, in taking the money from the pockets of the people and placing it in the common Treasury. It has been said that the cost has been unusually great during the present Administration, and that of General Jackson. In document No. 192, there is a table showing the rates per cent. calculated upon the basis of the amount of receipts into the Treasury, and also upon the value of imports. It will be seen that the rates of cost, calculated upon the latter basis, are not larger than the rates in previous years. In respect to the former, it is obvious that there is a large increase.

Without pretending to justify this increase, various causes can be assigned to account for it. 1st. The large augmentation in the quantity of articles of merchandise imported into the country, which rendered necessary the employment of additional officers for the prompt and faithful discharge of that branch of the public business. 2d. The building and equipping revenue cutters to supply the places of others, placed under the direction of the Navy and War Departments, to aid in suppressing the Indian disturbances in Florida, the construction and maintenance of revenue cutters being a charge on the accruing revenue. 3d. The disturbances on the Canada frontier during the last two years have also increased the custom-house expenses on that extended frontier. Besides this, the whole recent expense of making sets of weights and measures for each State, as well as each custom-house, is charged to the collection of the revenue.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, Tuesday, May 27, 1840.

BANKRUPT BILL—INCLUSION OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. BENTON addressed the CHAIR, and said, that the question now before the Senate was styled, in the convention of 1787, an extensive and a delicate question; and so, in fact, it is. It is the great question of debtor and creditor; a relation which pervades every ramification of society, and which, in all ages, and in all countries, has given the greatest labor to the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, and has often been productive of popular commotions, convulsions, bloodshed, and even civil wars. It is a great question, and a question of two sides, and of two parties, and one which cannot either justly or safely be treated in reference to one side or to one party only, be that side or that party which it may. The lawgiver must look at both sides, and must act justly and impartially in relation to each. It will not do to legislate for the creditor, without regard to the debtor; it will not do to legislate for the debtor, without regard to the creditor. Each has his rights, and these rights must be respected. No man becomes the debtor of another, except by getting from him his money or his property, his labor or his service, or enabling some other person to get these things, by the loan of his name and the intervention of his credit. He gets this money or property, labor or service, or enables another to get them, by promising to pay for them; and this promise, thus founded on a valuable consideration, becomes a sacred engagement, which the moral sense of the world has invested with a character of inviolable sanctity. The borrower is bound to return; the purchaser is bound to pay; the depositary is bound to restore; the security is bound to see his engagement fulfilled: and, while the performance of these obligations continues to be possible, the legislative power cannot interpose to set them aside. But, in the vicissitudes of human affairs—in the casualties of human arrangements—in the uncertainty of all human calculations, a compliance with these obligations often becomes impossible; and when that impossibility becomes manifest, the arm of the law interposes, not to violate an engagement, for that violation has already taken place; but to ascertain legally the fact—to bring the parties together upon the principle of a compromise—and to adjust the relations between them in view of this unexpected state of things, and upon the basis of an impossible compliance with the original contract. Release from further liability for a debt under such circumstances, and after a surrender of the debtor's effects has been granted by law, or obtained by compromise, or extorted by force, under all forms of Government, and in all ages and countries. But, in all these releases, where the voice of the law is heard at all, the voice of the creditor is also heard; and he still has a part to act—an essential and material part—in the conduct of proceedings which may end in the deprivation or extinction of his rights. He has a right to examine the conduct of his debtor—to trace his dealings and his mode of life—to ascertain whether his conduct has been innocent or fraudulent—whether his inability is the result of misfortune or misconduct—whether he is a proper subject for the favor, or for the rebuke of the law; and, above all, he has the power (by having the right to institute the bankrupt proceedings) to interfere before it is too late—to interfere while there is something to be saved—and to snatch something from the wreck of the debtor's estate before the work of fraud or destruction shall be complete. All these rights he has, wherever the law interferes to abrogate his contract; and, more than all these, he has the right to consent to the final result, by having the right to commence the proceedings which lead to it. All these rights belong to the creditor in every country, and in every case, where law, and not force, dissolves the connection between debtor and creditor. Thus there are, in the very nature of the bankrupt question, two sides, and two parties to it—two sides at the creation of the debt, and two at its abolition—and, as one or the other of these sides has been more or less favored by politicians and lawgivers, so has the abolition, or enforcement of debts, frequently given form and character to the political parties which have figured in all free countries, and which must continue to be found in all countries where freedom shall continue to exist. Relief to the debtors, or assistance to the creditors, has often been the touchstone, and the basis, of political parties in the great Republics of antiquity; and numerous have been the elections which have been carried, or lost—numerous the civil commotions which have been excited, or quelled—by propositions to abolish the obligation, or to enforce the collection, of existing debts. Political parties have been characterized, and have been held up to applause, or censure, in consequence of their conduct in relation to these propositions; and, without going back to ancient times, or abroad to foreign countries, to find examples of these party movements, familiar to the reading of every Senator, it is sufficient for the present occasion, and is pertinent to the present proceeding, and may be profitable to the issue of the present question, to remind the Senate and the country that the birth and origin of the two great political parties which, under whatsoever names, have existed so long, and must always exist in our country while its freedom lasts—the Federal and the Democratic—has been referred by one whose authority will not be disputed on the other side—by Chief Justice Marshall—to their respective conduct in relation to this precise question of debtor and creditor. That eminent man, in the most responsible of all his works—the Life of Washington—so refers the origin of these parties. In the fifth volume of that work, at page 85, he traces the rise and formation of the Federal and Democratic parties among us, making their respective characters to turn upon the conduct of each in relation to the sanctity of contracts, and the emissions of paper money. In this portrait of parties, he has given to the Federalists the honor of guarding the sanctity of contracts, and preserving a solid currency: to the Democracy is assigned the less creditable part of relaxing contracts, and emitting paper money. This is a point too essential to the historian himself—to the character of the two parties—and to their present actual positions in relation to the bills now before the Senate, involving as they do the exact questions referred to by the historian; it is a point too essential to all these parties, to be passed over with a reference and a paraphrase. It is too material to be mentioned without being cited. It is a case in which the historian should have the benefit of his own words. I owe it to him, and to the occasion, to read the paragraph entire; and here it is:

"The discontents and uneasiness, arising in a great measure from the embarrassments in which a considerable number of individuals were involved, continued to become more extensive. At length, two great parties were formed in every State, which were distinctly marked, and which pursued distinct objects, with systematic arrangement.

"The one struggled with unabated zeal for the exact observance of public and private engagements. By those belonging to it, the faith of a nation or of a private man was deemed a sacred pledge, the violation of which was equally forbidden by the principles of moral justice, and of sound policy. The distresses of individuals were, they thought, to be alleviated only by industry and frugality, not by a relaxation of the laws, or by a sacrifice of the rights of others. According to the stern principles laid down for their government, the imprudent and idle would not be protected by the Legislature from the consequences of their indiscretion; but should be restrained from involving themselves in difficulties, by the conviction that a rigid compliance with contracts would be enforced. They were consequently the uniform friends of a regular administration of justice, and of a vigorous course of taxation, which would enable the State to comply with its engagements. By a natural association of ideas, they were also, with very few exceptions, in favor of enlarging the powers of the Federal Government, and of enabling it to protect the dignity and character of the nation abroad, and its interests at home. The other party marked out for itself a more indulgent course. Viewing with extreme tenderness, the case of the debtor, their efforts were unceasingly directed to his relief. To exact a faithful compliance with contracts, was, in their opinion, a measure too harsh to be insisted on, and was one which the people would not bear. They were uniformly in favor of relaxing the administration of justice, of affording facilities for the payments of debts, or of suspending their collection, and of remitting taxes. The same course of opinion led them to resist every attempt to transfer from their own hands, into those of Congress, powers by which others were deemed essential to the preservation of the Union. In many of the States, the party last mentioned constituted a decided majority of the people; and in all of them it was very powerful. The emission of paper money, the delay of legal proceedings, and the suspension of the collection of taxes, were the fruits of their rule, wherever they were completely dominant. Even where they failed in carrying their measures, their strength was such as to encourage the hope of succeeding in a future attempt; and annual elections held forth to them the prospect of speedily repairing the loss of a favorite question.

"Throughout the Union, the contest between these parties was periodically revived; and the public mind was perpetually agitated with hopes and fears on subjects which essentially affected the fortunes of a considerable portion of the society."

I do not read this paragraph, (said Mr. B.) for the purpose of objecting to the character attributed to the Democratic party. I do not mean to defend them from what is here said. I am one of those who believe that every man, and every party, writes his own, and its own character—that they write it in their actions—and that it is in vain to impute, or to ascribe, characters which actions do not justify. It is not to defend the Democracy that I read this paragraph; in fact it is not for them that I read it at all. I read it for the gentlemen of the Federal party—for the purpose of holding up to those gentlemen a mirror which reflects for them an elevated character—for the purpose of exhorting them to act up to that high character, and not to exchange it for the inferior one imputed to the Democracy.

I now proceed, Mr. President, to examine the question before the Senate, and to apply to it the principles which, in my opinion, should govern a system of bankrupt laws.

Three members of the Judiciary Committee have reported one bill; two members have reported another; and these two bills emanate from the two political parties which, under whatsoever names, have existed in this country for fifty years. One of these bills proposes relief to existing debtors, and no more. It proposes to legislate for voluntary bankrupts alone, and for those debts alone which now exist; for the bill is limited to two years' duration, and cannot be expected to find many new cases to act upon in that short time, and in the present stagnation of business and paralysis of credit. It is, then, a partial and temporary act, retrospective, not prospective in its operation, and solely directed to the relief of debtors, without looking to the security of creditors. It is a one sided bill, for the abolition of debts—existing debts—at the will of the debtor, and no more.

The other is a general bill, looking to the rights of creditors as well as to the relief of debtors—intended for the future as well as the present and the past—applicable to corporations as well as to persons—embracing the compulsory as well as the voluntary feature—and making provisions for those who are not, as well as those who are, technically merchants and traders.

These are the two bills, and certainly no two things of the same name could be more dissimilar in their import and character. One is a system, the other a special act. One proposes a general rule for the regulation of all contracts—the other proposes an absolution of the existing debts. Both are styled systems in their enacting clause; but one only presents a system. The other proposes nothing but a relief law.

The majority of the committee has reported one; a minority has reported the other; and the question is, not which shall we pass (for we have not yet arrived at the question of passing) but which shall be preferred for consideration? which of the two we shall take up, discuss, consider, amend, perfect, and ripen, if we can, into a law? This is the question; and, in its decision, I have no hesitation. I prefer the general to the special bill: I prefer the bill of the minority; not that I agree to it as reported (for there is much in it to which I object;) but because it is general, not special—a system, and not a temporary, one sided law—because it is a bankrupt law, and not an insolvent law. It contains the leading features which a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies ought to contain; and is susceptible of the amendments which may render it acceptable.

This being my preference between the bills, I will proceed to state the reasons why I object to the one, and advocate the other.

I object to the bill of the majority because it is unconstitutional—because it is a bill wholly unwarranted by the clause in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. The first idea of such laws are, that they are to be prospective—that they are to look forward—that they are to operate upon future cases—and to furnish a rule of action for creditors and debtors to govern themselves by in time to come. Admitting that the law may take in existing cases, yet to limit it to such cases, as this bill of the majority virtually does, is to reduce it to the character of a mere insolvent law. It is to take in all existing cases, and it is only to continue in force two years. This may be time enough for existing debtors to avail themselves of its provisions; but it can have little or no operation on future cases: it can furnish no rule of action for the future government of the community; and the very nature and object of law, and especially of a system of law, and, above all, of a system to govern contracts, should be prospective in its operation; it should relate to the future, and should be known to the community, that they should be able to govern themselves by it. I do not object to the inclusion of present cases, but to the exclusion of future ones: I object to an act which is both temporary and retrospective—which excludes the future, and embraces only one side of the past. Such an act could not have come within the contemplation of the Constitution; and, if adopted, must set the example of a succession of these acts for the abolition of debts as often as the debtors become sufficiently numerous to make their power be felt.

I object to the act because it has no feature of a bankrupt law in it, and because I deny our constitutional power to pass an act, under the name of a bankrupt system, which has no feature of a bankrupt law in it—nothing which discriminates those laws from common insolvent, or relief laws. Without at all limiting the power of Congress to the adoption of the English statutes on this subject—without limiting ourselves to the adoption of something which may be found in the English legislation; without at all limiting our power to this narrow basis, I must still insist that there are certain essential characteristics of a bankrupt law, known to the world, and contemplated by our Constitution, and which it is not in the power of Congress to disregard. The most prominent of these features is the right of the creditor to save something, out of the estate of the debtor, before it is too late—his right to interfere, and stop waste or fraud, before it is too late. In every system of bankruptcy ever known, the creditor is an actor; he begins, or continues the proceeding; and he commences it at the time when his interest requires him to do so—when he sees fraud or waste going on; and by thus arresting the career of his debtor, and divesting him of his estate, he impliedly gives his consent to the final discharge in consideration of getting possession of all that the debtor owns. This is a feature in all bankrupt laws: it is an equitable provision; it is a fundamental principle; nor can I conceive of a law without it. I cannot conceive of a bankrupt law which does not embrace this feature; and the bill of the majority does not embrace it. Under this bill the creditor may see waste and fraud going on—he may see his debtor consuming, hiding, or alienating his estate—and yet, under this bill, he could do nothing to arrest such conduct. It is in vain to say that he may go to the State laws: the bankrupt system must be complete in itself, and must not look to the State laws for the one half of its operation. I object to a bankrupt act as unconstitutional, which leaves the remedy exclusively to the will of the debtor; and that is precisely what this bill proposes to do.

Sir, this is one of the most delicate powers which Congress can exercise, and one which it should be most careful not to transcend or mistake. It is an intervention between debtor and creditor. It goes, not merely to the alteration, but to the annihilation of contracts. The Constitution has forbid the States to do any thing to impair the obligation of contracts. It has granted Congress the power to make bankrupt laws; and these laws go to the extinction of the contract. But how? Not by passing acts, from time to time, for the abolition of debts at the will of the debtor, but by making the discharge of the debt the joint act of the creditor and debtor; the creditor instituting the proceeding, or being ruled into it by a majority in interest, and thereby assenting to it. I grant that the power of Congress is full over the subject of bankruptcies, but I deny that this power can be fairly exercised in the enactment of a temporary, one-sided, exclusively retrospective bill for the abolition of debts at the will of the debtor. I deny that it can be fairly exercised in the abolition of existing debts, under the mock name of a system of bankruptcy. It is a delicate power, denied to the States, granted to Congress, and which Congress must exercise according to the intent of the grant, and not wantonly according to the will and pleasure of a majority for the time being.

Objecting to the bill, as I do, upon constitutional grounds, I should still oppose it, even if our constitutional power to pass it was clear and undoubted. I object to the bill for its principle, and for its details, and for its effect upon the present age, and upon posterity. The principle of the bill is, that every person owing debts may, at his own will, and by going through a process which he himself commences, be absolved from all liability for his debts. This is the principle; and the details are such as to deprive the creditor of all effective agency in the conduct of a proceeding which is commenced without his consent. The present effect, as gentlemen say, is to release 500,000 debtors from future obligation to pay their debts; of course to deprive an equal number of rights and means on which they relied. Its future effect must be to se an example for the repetition of such laws as often as the debtor class becomes numerous and powerful; and to teach the rising generation a facile way to get rid of their obligations, after squandering the money and property which they had obtained upon the faith of paying for it. Nothing, in my opinion, could be more objectionable than the principle of the bill.

The details of the bill aggravate its principle, and go to deprive the creditor of all real or effective check over a proceeding which is commenced without his consent, and which may end in the annihilation of his rights. The details are these: any person whatsoever, owing debts, not less in amount than the sum of —— dollars, may go into the district court of the United States for the district in which he then resides, or into the superior court of the Territory in which he then resides, or in the superior court for the District of Columbia, if he then resides in this District, and file a declaration on oath, or affirmation, averring himself to be unable to pay his debts, and upon this declaration the court shall decree him to be a bankrupt. (Sec. 1.) The court is to be always open for the reception of these declarations, and the proceedings upon them are to be speedy and summary. (Sec. 6.) No record at large is to be kept, but only papers filed, and memorandums kept by the clerk. (Sec. 13. The property of the bankrupt is legally divested out of him, and vested in assignees, by a decree of the court, to which the creditor is not a party, and he becomes entitled to a full discharge on the surrender of his property, (Sec. 3 and 4,) but the certificate and discharge shall not be granted until —— days after the decree of bankruptcy, nor until after twenty days' notice in some newspaper, designated by the court, for the creditor to come in and contest the right to the discharge. (Sec 4.) On appearing, the creditor may prevent the discharge, by proving that the debtor has made alienations of his property or preferences, or payments among his creditors, in contemplation of taking the benefit of this act; (Sec. 2;) or has been guilty of fraud, or wilful concealment of his property, or has wilfully disobeyed the orders of the court, or has lost at gaming or betting, within one year before the decree of bankruptcy, at any one or more times, the sum of —— dollars. By proving any one of these things, (on a part of which the debtor may be interrogated under the direction of the court) the discharge may be prevented. The final discharge of the debt may be prevented; but the decree of bankruptcy is not reversed. It is not set aside. It stands; and the creditor's rights in relation to his debtor, and his property, are entirely changed. All his remedies and proceedings against him—all his suits depending against him, and not ripened into judgments—all his measures for securing himself, are suddenly arrested. The connection between himself and his debtor is dissolved. He has to arrange with a new party—assignees—to prove his debt for them to settle it, and to take his chance for a pro rata distribution with other creditors out of the surrendered effects—(Sec. 5.) If he does not do this—if he does not come in and prove his debts, (and it will be shown that he will have but little chance to do so,) he loses all right to any part of the bankrupt's estate, for the whole is to go to those who appear and prove their debts—(Secs. 3 and 5.)

These are the details; and now let us examine them, and see their practical operation and bearing, and ascertain how far they open the door to a general and rapid abolition of debts, and how far they go to give, or to deny to the creditor, any rights or powers in instituting or conducting a proceeding which may end in converting all the notes and bonds in his possession into so much waste paper.

1. The debtor chooses his time for instituting the proceedings and making the surrender of his property; and what time will he choose? Upon all the principles of human action, what time will he choose? He will certainly choose the time which will suit himself; and that will be after hope is extinguished, and after his property is exhausted. He will surrender his property when the surrender will be of no avail to his creditor. And here lies the great distinction between this act, which is nothing but an insolvent law, and a real bankrupt law, which always gives the creditor the right to choose the time for instituting proceedings and divesting the property. The creditor would choose the time when there was something to be saved; the debtor, when there was little or nothing. What will the creditors receive in the distribution of an estate so surrendered? Under the best circumstances, and where the creditor chooses his time, the expenses often swallow up the principal part of the surrendered effects. The assignee's expenses, and the court expenses, swallow up the principal part. So true is this, that it is proverbial; and when, in the discussion of the bankrupt bill in this chamber, a dozen years ago, Mr. Randolph compared a bankrupt's estate in the hands of assignees, to a lump of butter in a dog's mouth, the comparison, strong as it was, was considered to have as much of truth as sarcasm in it. Such being the case where the creditor chose the time when the surrender of effects should take place, what would it be when the debtor is to choose the time?

2. The place of instituting the proceedings gives another great advantage to the debtor. He chooses his place. He chooses out of the twenty-six States, the three Territories, and the District of Columbia. He has this choice; for the proceedings are to be had at the place where the debtor resides at the time of instituting them. He files his petition in the court of the district in which he resides at the time; and this gives the debtor great advantages over the creditor. The abrogation of the debt may take place far removed from the place where it was contracted, and far from the residence of the creditor. Persons meaning to take the benefit of the act, if so disposed, can go and establish a residence where they please, and proceed almost unmolested by their creditors. Iowa, Wiskonsin, Florida, Arkansas, Missouri, may become the places for trying cases, which originated in the Atlantic States. Creditors may be called such vast distances from home that they may choose to give up their claim, rather than pursue it at such a sacrifice of time and money.

3. The notice for bringing in the creditor is most inadequate and uncertain. It is not until after the debtor is decreed to be a bankrupt that the creditor is intended to know any thing of the proceeding. Up to that point it is expressly, and on purpose, an ex parte proceeding. It is only after the decree that he is intended to have notice; and he is then permitted to come in merely to contest the right to the final discharge. Then his right to know what is going on, and to become party to the final proceedings, accrues; and his chance for notice is a publication of twenty days in some newspaper designated by the court. This is the only chance which the creditor is to have, to find out what is going on; it may be at the distance of five hundred or a thousand miles from him; and, not merely to find it out, but to repair to the scene, and make head against the discharge. This is a most inadequate provision for notice. Creditors in full life, health, and activity, ready and able to attend to their affairs, would find it difficult to avail themselves of so short a notice; but what is to become of widows, orphans, absentees, the sick, and that long list of persons who may find it out of their power to attend? What is to become of those who do not take the paper which contain the notice, or who were prevented from receiving it, by a failure in the mail? To all these there is no notice at all. The twenty days roll on; they can do nothing; and, in the short space of two-thirds of a moon, their money is gone.

4. The courts for the trial of these cases are to be always open, and the proceedings are to be summary and expeditious. The usual legal forms are to be dispensed with; brevity and rapidity are to mark the steps of the judge. The district courts are to be converted into pie poudre tribunals—where decisions are to be made as fast as dust can be shaken from the foot; and this without being recorded at large, though the proceedings are to be matter of record. Such is the haste, the informality, the want of time for deliberation, which is to attend proceedings by which the fearful process of abolishing debts, at the will of the debtor, may be hurried on.

5. Two years is the time allowed for the act to run. It is to be an act for two years, and no more. I do not object to the shortness of time because it may not be sufficient for the purpose it proposes, namely, for an abolition of debts at the will of the debtor; but I point out this short duration of the act, as an evidence of its character—as a circumstance which shows it to be no system—which identifies it as a temporary, one sided, relief law, for the benefit of existing debtors.

6. After all, the bill is not to be applicable to all debtors—the relief is not to be for all persons owing debts. There is to be a line of division between the debtors—a horizontal line; those above the line are to have relief—those below it are denied it. This results from the amount which the debtor must owe in order to entitle himself to the benefit of its provisions. The bill provides for an amount, but leaves the sum in blank. Will the reporter of the bill, said Mr. B. (addressing himself to Mr. CLAYTON of Delaware,) name the amount which it is proposed to insert?

[Mr. CLAYTON said he had not been instructed to move a particular sum, but $500 had been mentioned in the committee.]

Mr. B. continued: Five hundred dollars. That was the sum mentioned in the committee, and no other sum is mentioned here. Five hundred dollars must be considered, then, as the amount necessary to be owed, to entitle a person to the relief of the act. Now, this is arbitrary and unequal: it cuts off the small dealers—the persons of little property—the laborers; it cuts them off from the benefit of the act, and operates as an encouragement to people to go largely in debt, as the large debtors are to be relieved, and the small ones not. It makes the act exclusive for large dealers, and this contrary to the principle of equality which is professed in the bill, and without any foundation in reason and justice. The weight of debt is relative, not absolute. It depends upon the amount of the debtor's property, and not upon the amount of the debt. To one man, a debt of one hundred dollars is as much as a hundred thousand, or a million, is to another. To one man, five hundred dollars is as much as five hundred thousand is to another; and, beyond question, the most numerous class of debtors in the United States are those who owe less than the minimum proposed in this bill. But these small debtors, numerous as they are, are disregarded and overlooked by the bill. They are to work out their debts in sorrow and in misery, carrying their endless load to the grave; while the dashers—the large debtors—clear out theirs by a declaration and a surrender.

Such are the details—a few of them—and evidently all contrived for the benefit of the debtor, and effectually calculated to insure his discharge. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the discharge will follow the petition as certainly, and almost as rapidly, as the bolt follows the flash, and will exhibit, perhaps, the largest abolition of debts which has ever been seen at any one time under a Government of law and order. The gentlemen who conduct the bill, and advocate its passage, present an imposing view of the number of debtors to be relieved by it, and the amount of their liabilities. They say, and that truly, that there has been no bankrupt law in our country for forty years. They say further that the number of persons now petitioning amount to 200,000, and they compute 300,000 more to be awaiting the passage of the bill, who have not petitioned. Without vouching for the correctness of these numbers, I still undertake to say that the bill contemplates the largest and most fearful abolition of debts that has ever been seen in a country of law and order.

If the creditor chances to hear of what is going on, and is fortunate enough to arrive at the court before the twenty days are out, what is he then to do to prevent the discharge of his debtor? He is to prove acts done in contemplation of taking the benefit of this law; he is limited to those acts; and is, consequently, cut off from all previous examination into his debtor's conduct. Now the act is retrospective: it is to operate upon all existing debts, no matter when contracted. The debts may be five, ten, twenty, (or, as gentlemen argue,) even forty years old; the party may have fraudulently conveyed away, or gambled off, or wasted, his estate in all that time; but no examination is to be had into it. Acts done in contemplation of applying for relief under this law, are all that can be examined; consequently the past conduct of the debtor becomes "a sealed book," which the creditor cannot open. Even the gambling, which may defeat the right to the discharge, degenerates into an illusory and mock prohibition. It is to be that which exceeds a given amount, not named, and which takes place one year before the decree of bankruptcy. Yes, one year before the decree! and, as the time of this decree depends entirely upon the will of the debtor, he has only to delay it for a year and a day, after he had sunk his estate at the gambling table; and then justice is ready to put him on a footing with the unfortunate and the innocent, whose property has been destroyed in the conflagration of a city, a storm at sea, or a tornado in the land. Better far to strike out such an illusory provision, than to retain it in its present mock shape!

No distinction is made in the bill for classes of debtors, essentially distinct in themselves. The depositary, who may have violated his trust—the assignee, who may have converted to his own use, the property put into his hands for the benefit of creditors—guardians, who may have plundered their wards—spendthrifts—gamblers—all are put on an equal footing with the unfortunate and the innocent. The bill shocks the moral sense, by confounding the eternal principles of right and wrong, and making no distinction between the unfortunate and the criminal.

These are the details, and their practical operation, and they make more objectionable that which was bad enough in its principle. Far from softening, they aggravate the evils of the principle. Up to the decree of bankruptcy, the proceedings are ex parte; after that, they are as good as ex parte. The creditor is lost sight of; he is expunged from the transaction—all depends upon the debtor. His power over the time, the place, the notice, and the mode of proceeding, resolves the whole into an ex parte affair for his own benefit. Any person owing above $500, that is to say, every person except the laboring and small dealing part of the community, may step into a court, and, on surrendering the wrecks of an estate, absolve himself from his debts as readily as he would divest himself of his hat and coat. A surrender of the property in hand—the wreck which may be left after a life either of misconduct, or of misfortune—discharges the contract, and absolves the connection between the debtor and creditor. A surrender of a fragment of property does it, although the debt might not have been contracted on the faith of property, but on the faith of character—capacity for business—expectations—profession—trade—salary—income. Property is far from being the sole, or even the most general foundation for credit among us: it is far from being the sole resource for the payment of debts. It is often to other resources that the creditor looked at the very time that he gave the credit; and surely it is an unjustifiable exercise of legislative power to cut him off from all these resources by a retrospective law, giving him no chance for an actual or implied consent to the proceeding. In every bankrupt law in the world, and even in every insolvent law, the creditor consents to the proceeding, either actually or impliedly, by commencing the process, or becoming a party to it, either of his own will, or upon the decision of other creditors. In all the countries of the earth, the bankrupt process is optional with the creditor, compulsory against the debtor, and calculated to save something, while there is something to be saved. There is no such thing as voluntary bankruptcy in the world, at the sole will and pleasure of the debtor. What is called voluntary bankruptcy in England, must be voluntary on both sides. The debtor begins, and admits the fact of bankruptcy; the creditor assents, and then the proceeding goes on. If the creditor does not assent, nothing is done. This is the way it is in England. In our own country, we once had a bankrupt law: it contained no such feature as that which is now proposed. In 1821 and 1827, attempts were made to establish a bankrupt system; but no such feature as that now introduced was ever thought of. The bill of 1827, in this chamber commonly called General Haynes's bill, did contain a voluntary clause; but it was confined to those who were not merchants and traders; and then it was voluntary on both sides. One began, and the other assented; otherwise, nothing was done.

The bill proposes nothing—literally nothing—for the creditor; and this the gentlemen who advocate it admit and defend. They admit it does nothing for the creditor, and they justify this omission upon the ground that the States have passed laws for their benefit—to enable them to sue—recover—prosecute to judgment—execution, &c. Surely this argument, if it will apply to one side, will apply to the other. The States have made as many laws for the debtor as for the creditor; they have passed laws both to discharge the person and the actions. They have done as much on one side as on the other; and if one side is to rely on State laws, why not the other? But the argument is wholly invalid. A bankrupt law must be complete in itself. It must be a system, and a system within itself. It cannot be helped out by extraneous legislation: it cannot be helped out by State laws: it cannot consist one-half of Federal, and the other half of State legislation. It cannot adopt the variant and changeable legislation of thirty States and Territories as part of its code; much less can it tell the judges to do so. At all events, it should give stability to this State legislation if it is to be relied upon. The adoption of it should be permanent; otherwise the States may alter it all; and then there would be nothing for the creditor. But I forbear: the objection is fatal, and gentlemen feel it to be so. By their answer, they admit the one-sided character of their bill, and they admit that it ought not to be one-sided. They admit that the creditor should have some rights over the conduct and property of his debtor; they admit this; but instead of securing these rights in their system of bankruptcy, they refer them all to State legislation!

What are to be the consequences of such a bill, supposing it to ripen into a law? What are to be its consequences, present and future—pecuniary and moral—at home and abroad? An immediate effect would be to make many poor, who are now considered independent! In relieving bankrupts, it would make bankrupts! In freeing many from their debts, it would deprive many of their future support! Widows, orphans, and men of every occupation, might suddenly be stripped of their inheritance or their earnings. The banks might look out for heavy losses. Upon the public morals the effect would doubtless be unfortunate. It would turn the mind in the wrong direction. Instead of looking to the ultimate discharge of obligations by gradual payments, and equitable compromises, (so rarely denied to the industrious, or to the unfortunate,) it would induce an immediate resort to the court to get rid of a disagreeable load. To cut, and not untie, the gordian knot, would be the process. To the rising generation it would present a contagious and pernicious example. Young men just entering into life, seeing half a million of their elders going forward to cancel their debts, at their own will, might be induced to think too lightly of debt, and rush into liabilities from which they saw a facile way of releasing themselves. Upon our credit abroad, the effect could not be otherwise than bad. The bill is to take in "all persons whatsoever" who owe above a certain amount ($500;) and, therefore, may release those whose creditors are in Europe, and who can know nothing of what is going on here. Even a fugitive from Europe, within a few days after touching our shores, and before his creditor could know where he had gone, might free himself from liability, and live in luxury upon a plundered estate.

I am astonished at the suddenness and impetuosity of this demand, not for a bankrupt system, for that is natural after the career which the paper system has been running in our country; but I am astonished at this sudden demand for a mere insolvent law, at the will of the debtor. It seems to have broken out all at once. We have had repeated applications for a bankrupt system, never before for an abolition of debts. All of a sudden this new demand is presented to us, and pressed upon us, and with every appearance of being a party movement. It seems to have commenced in this chamber. All the petitions ask for a general law: they use the word general: none ask for a special act. The idea of this special law seems to have originated here. Zeal and sympathy for the unfortunate debtor, which has slept so long—which was silent at the last session and the session before, and even the session before that; this zeal, and this sympathy, has now bursted forth in a torrent, and with irrepressible violence, from the other side of the chamber. Sir, is this accidental, or is it systematic? Is it chance, or is it part of a system which seeks periodically, at the last long session before each Presidential election, to agitate the public mind with some vast scheme addressed to the feelings, or to the interests of sections or classes? Since twenty years that I have sat in this chamber, I have witnessed, periodically, these seductive and agitating movements, so well calculated to influence votes in the coming contest. In 1824 and 1828, it was the tariff and internal improvement: in 1832, it was the national bank and the distribution of land revenue: in 1836, it was a distribution of forty millions of surplus revenue: now, in 1840, it is the abolition of debts under the simulated name of a bankrupt law. Each of these schemes, supposed to be irresistibly popular have been pressed by the same party, at the same relative point of time, with the same apparent objects—and, thus far, with the same results. The intelligence and patriotism of the people have sustained those who have disregarded apparent popularity when it comes in conflict with a conscientous discharge of public duty. Tariff—internal improvement—national bank—land revenue—surplus—all failed to control the Presidential elections on the eve of which they were brought forth. The tribunal of the public opinion condemned them all; and to that same tribunal we appeal again to condemn this scheme for an abolition of debts, stamped as it is with every feature which distinguished the propositions for abolition of debts, made in the latter days of the Roman Republic by the rival candidates for the consulship and for the tribune.

I do not think the present session the propitious one for beneficial action on this subject. Five hundred thousand voters, demanding the passage of a law, on the eve of an election, must have an influence upon the hopes and fears of the lawgiver, as well as upon his judgment and conscience. Since they have waited so long, I should have preferred the delay of a few months more. Still, the subject is before us, and we are here; and I am willing to act, and to do what I believe to be my duty. I am ready to assist in framing an act which shall be general in its provisions, and just in its application—which shall do justice to the creditor as well as to the debtor—which shall apply to trading and money dealing corporations, as well as to trading and money dealing individuals—which shall be compulsory with regard to traders and dealers, whether natural or artificial—which shall be optional with respect to other classes of the community—and which shall distinguish between misfortune and misconduct. A bill framed upon this general and equitable basis might pass; a bill framed upon the narrow basis of relieving debtors alone, it would seem to me, cannot pass. If those who are for including corporations, and those who are for relieving debtors, would act together, the 200,000 petitioners who have appeared here, and the 300,000 more which are said to be behind, might find the equitable relief which the debtors' own consciences would approve: if not, all may be lost. We offer to legislate on this broad and equitable basis. The bill of the minority furnishes the true basis for the enactment of a bankrupt system. We offer to provide for all; and it is for the gentlemen on the opposite side to say that all shall miscarry if they are not allowed to provide for one part, and one side, only.

Mr. BENTON went on to say that the inclusion of incorporations was the hinge upon which the passage of any bankrupt law depended. If included, all the rest would become matter of detail, easy to be adjusted; if excluded, many Senators, of whom he was one, would oppose any bill that could be framed. The question, then, is upon the inclusion of these corporations—I mean the money dealing and trading corporations—and, dropping all other views of the subject, I shall confine myself to this single point, and examine the reasons why these institutions should, or should not, be included in the provisions of a general bankrupt law.

I am of opinion that they ought to be so included, and that for numerous and cogent reasons.

First on account of their number. Vast is the number of these institutions, and constantly increasing, and already embracing such a large number of persons that, to exclude them from a bankrupt law, would be to exclude an immense proportion of the business part of the community. The banks alone amount to near one thousand; other trading corporations may be still more numerous; and if charters of incorporation are to be protections against the penalties of bankruptcy, all that are rich enough to buy them may go forward and do so. A bonus gets a charter—and a charter for any thing—for any species of business that the head or the hand of man can carry on. Great then as the number of these charters now are, and numerous as are the individuals embraced by them, the prospect is that of a vast increase; and, therefore, for their numbers alone, they should be included. The omission of so numerous a body would make too great a chasm in a code of law intended to apply to the inhabitants of a country of free and equal privileges. Therefore, and for their numbers, I would have them included.

Next for their wealth. Great is the wealth—vast the dealings of these institutions. They count by the million, the ten millions, and the hundred millions. Their capitals are large—their dealings three or four times larger. One of these institutions alone has a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars; its dealings, as shown in its published accounts, exceed an hundred million of dollars. This, certainly, is the largest; but many others are proportionately great; and the aggregate of the whole is enormous. In debts, property, and effects, these institutions are becoming the great property holders of the country. They are becoming what the churches and monasteries were in England, when they were computed to hold the one third part of the wealth of the kingdom, and when the public required the law of mort main to be applied to them. Sir, it is absurd, in our country, to think of subjecting the property of individuals to the bankrupt remedy, and to exempt from it the enormous wealth of the corporations.

The nature of their dealings is another reason for subjecting these institutions to this process. They deal in money and exchanges; they furnish currency and receive deposites; they force a credit from every body by putting notes into circulation which every person is forced to receive. They exact punctuality from others, and should be punctual themselves. Besides all the remedies of the law, they have pecular remedies of their own—that of the protest and stopping the credit. They protest a man, and stop his credit, besides suing, selling out his property, and incarcerating his person. They exact punctuality from the community, and should be punctual themselves. They deal in what concerns the whole community, and constitute themselves creditors to the whole community, whether the community will or not. They force themselves to become the creditors of all—the rich and the poor—the laborer and the employer—the children and servants even. They assume to supply a currency, convertible into specie at the will of the holder, and they refuse to pay it when they please. If dealings of this kind are not to be enforced under the penalties of bankruptcy—dealings in which punctuality is the essential ingredient—how can you visit with those penalties the current delinquencies of mere individuals?

This is the nature of one branch of their dealings—their appropriate and proper dealings; but banks of late have become merchants and traders, engaging in all manner of trade, from the great staples of cotton, tobacco, beef, pork, and flour, down to chickens, eggs, and butter. Instead of aiding merchants and traders, they have become their rivals—great, powerful, and monopolizing rivals; and, while making a bankrupt law to include small traders, even the smallest, with what justice can we exclude these corporation merchants, who fly from their proper sphere, and deal in millions, and become the rivals of those they were created to aid?

Their privileges. They possess great and extraordinary privileges; and I have no idea of adding to the number of these privileges by exempting them from the operation of a law directed against other debtors. They have the benefit of all the laws against debtors: if a bankrupt bill is passed, they will have the benefit of it, without being subject to it. They will be included in the list of creditors for a pro rata distribution of the bankrupt's effects, although no one can get a distribution of their effects. Their whole existence is made up of privileges, and why add to the number? Sir, it is not extension, but diminution of privileges for which these artificial bodies ought to look. They have enough now, and too many. Most of them pay no taxes; the property of the stockholder, as well as his person, is exempt from liability for their debts; they sue their debtors, and sell their property, and send their bodies to prison. They have the privilege of stamping bits of paper with figures and pictures, and forcing them upon the community for money: they have the privilege of usury; for they may lend, and that by law, three, four, or five paper dollars for each silver one they possess, and draw interest upon the whole. In addition to all this, they take the privilege of becoming bankrupt when they please. They place at defiance, when they please, the laws of the country and the principles of morality; they violate all their own promises, and compel others to violate theirs. Such are the privileges which they possess, and which they take; privileges already too great for the cause of morals, the good of the community, or the safety of Government; and, not contented with all this, are we still to add to the mass, and to invest these corporations with the high privilege of exemption from a bankrupt system?

Their strength is another reason for bringing the Federal arm to bear upon these institutions. They are too strong for the individual arm, or even for the State arm. We see this exemplified in their suspensions and resumptions at their own will, without regard to the laws of the States, or the threats of their creditors. They are above law and government; and in a country of law and government, no individuals and no institutions should claim that pre-eminence. Long and sad experience convinces us that these institutions are too powerful for the State Governments, and for the people: let us try, then, the strength of the Federal Government upon them. It is peculiarly proper that the Federal Government should measure strength with them. As the guardian of the constitutional currency, this Government is bound to exert its constitutional power to preserve that currency, and to restrain the conduct of those who would ruin it. It is the banks which ruin it; and the bankrupt process is the remedy for their conduct. As banks, Congress has no direct power over them; but as bankrupts, its authority is full and absolute.

Their structure and organization render them very fit for the bankrupt process. They are artificial beings, and are managed by trustees. To put them into the hands of assignees, is only to substitute one set of trustees for another, and that after the first set had shown themselves to be unfortunate or incapable. It is a mere change of managers; and why not change them? If the natural man may be divested of his property, and see it placed in the hands of assignees for his private debts, why not divest these artificial beings of property not their own, for the satisfaction of their public debts? Every bank is a public institution. It is created by law for public purposes; and it becomes indebted to the public at large by furnishing a public currency. In this public character, then, and in this artificial structure and organization, a bank becomes far more proper than an individual for the application of the bankrupt process.

The nature of their property presents these corporations as the most convenient subjects for the operation of laws which supersede the possessor by an assignee. Their property is money and debts. They have very little, except the debts which are due to them; and these debts can be transferred to other hands for collection, without trouble or expense. Not so with the property of a natural person, and especially of a farmer or planter. With them their property is of a kind not to be taken out of the owner's possession, without great loss and expense. It is growing crops—or crops just gathered—or going to market—or flocks, herds, and slaves—or lands and houses. These are things not to be transferred from the owner to an assignee, without great loss and expense; yet natural persons, with this property, may be superseded in the possession by assignees, while the effects of a bank, consisting of debts, cannot be transferred!

Another great reason for this inclusion of banks in the bankrupt law is, that it is the only way to make the real debtors of a bank pay up. These real debtors are usually the officers and stockholders of the institution; they are the great debtors, and they do not sue themselves, and protest themselves, and make themselves pay up. They can perform such operations on others, but as to themselves, it is more profitable to wait until the notes and stock are depreciated, and then buy in low, and pay off at par. This is known to be too often the case; and to prevent it—to prevent this depreciation—to prevent a depreciation which suits the interest of the principal debtors—these debtors should have their obligations placed in the hands of others for collection. It is absurd to suppose that the officers of a bank will make themselves pay. They never do it; and here is one of the greatest vices of the system. The largest debtors do not pay: these largest debtors are interested in depreciating the notes and the stock, and are able to do it. To supersede them by assignees, is the remedy for this evil.

Justice to the small creditors requires this remedy against the banks. When these institutions stop payment they owe a multitude of persons, and most of them in no condition to go and prosecute a suit for the amount of the notes they hold. Their only resource is to sell at a discount, or to lose all. Not so with the large creditors. They are in a condition to go and attend to their interest—to sue, or compromise, or make arrangements, or receive an assignment of the whole effects. Thus the weaker part of the community—the part least able to bear a loss—must bear it all! an injustice which can readily be prevented by the intervention of legal assignees to receive all the effects of the institution—to collect all its debts—and to pay all its creditors their rateable proportion. Suits against banks by their small creditors is an absurdity. Expenses, delays, appeals, render it absurd to sue them. They are actually independent of law, as they are of Government; and a new power must be found to contend with them.

The conduct of these institutions is another reason for depriving them of the conduct of their own affairs when they violate their engagements. Their conduct is to stop payment when they please, and to resume when they please—to refuse payment of the smallest sum when their coffers are full—and even to ship specie by the hundred thousand, and by the million of dollars, to foreign creditors, while refusing the smallest payment to those at home. This is the conduct of banks—not all, but some—and it is to correct such conduct as this that we demand the inclusion of these institutions in the provisions of the bankrupt code. It is notorious that the Bank of the United States, both in the suspension of 1837 and 1839, made it her business and her boast to ship millions of dollars to England while refusing to pay a shilling here. And why? Because a commission of bankruptcy would have been issued instanter against the Jaudon establishment in London for non-payment, while no such commission could issue against the mother institution in Philadelphia. Here is a complete proof of the benefit of a bankrupt law applicable to banks. The Jaudon establishment is a branch of the Bank of the United States: it is subject to the laws of England, and those laws subject to a commission of bankruptcy every bank except the Bank of England. Hence the creditors of the Bank of the United States are punctually paid in London, while repulsed with scorn and contempt in the United States.

These are reasons, numerous and cogent in themselves, though faintly stated, which justify the proposition which we make in relation to banks They are not merely fit and proper, but the pre-eminently fit and proper, subjects of a bankrupt law. Their great number—the vast amount of their dealings—the nature of their obligations to the country—their privileges—their artificial structure and organization—their strength—their contempt for their small creditors—their faculty to ruin the currency, and the duty of Congress to prevent them from ruining it—all combine to demand the remedy of the bankrupt process.

The benefits to result to the community from this exertion of Federal power over the trading and money dealing corporations, are great and striking. Besides the advantages implied in what has already been said, several great and peculiar benefits would result, which have only to be stated to command the general approbation. At the present time, a bankrupt law passed by Congress, and applicable to banks, would accomplish that purpose which is so ardently desired all over the Union: it would fix the day for the resumption of specie payments! The day fixed in the act—and that would of course be at some convenient time ahead—would be the day for resumption. All the good banks would conform to it: all the bad ones would be passed into the hands of assignees, and their affairs would be wound up. This is a consummation devoutly to be wished; and, while many are lamenting the want of a power adequate to this great result, we point to the bankrupt remedy vested in Congress by the Constitution, and show them the power which can coerce a general and simultaneous resumption at any time that the representatives of the people shall think proper to require it.

To prevent future suspensions, will just as naturally be the effect of such a law as will be the coercion of a general resumption. No suspension could afterwards take place. The phrase, and the fact, would disappear from our banking system. The bank which stopped payment would be wound up: those which followed her example would be wound up. They would all come under the category of insolvents, and would be treated accordingly. They would be taken into custody instanter—their directory changed—and their affairs put into the hands of assignees. The consequence would be, that none would stop payment but the really insolvent; and these would give no example for others to follow. The demoralizing spectacle of a bank doing business—making loans—sharing dividends—circulating paper, while refusing to redeem her notes, would no longer be seen. Justice would take possession of such an institution, and assign her a place which would make her an object to be shunned, instead of an example to be followed, and put an end to profits which resulted from violated laws and dishonored engagements.

The prevention of the circulation of all depreciated paper money would be another consequence of such a law. The instant a bank stopped, her notes would be called in. The holders must immediately forward them to the assignees, otherwise they lose all claim for pro rata payments. This would take all such notes out of circulation. It would send them all home for liquidation. The public would be free from the pestilence of depreciated paper, and the holders would receive what they were worth; and that without trouble or expense to themselves. Here, then, is an immense advantage to the public in keeping the circulation solid and convertible—in totally preventing the circulaiton of depreciated paper.

Preventing bad banks from governing the good would be another beneficial result of application of the bankrupt remedy to the delinquent institutions. At present the bad govern the good. The bad govern, both for suspension and resumption. A few stop payment, either from necessity, or for political or pecuniary objects; their conduct forces others to do the same; and thus an extensive suspension is brought on, the necessity for which is denied by nine-tenths of those which yield to it. The same of resumption. A few refuse to resume; the rest cannot, without great danger and inconvenience. Thus it was in 1837; thus it is now. The Bank of the United States made both suspensions; prevented the resumption of 1838 for a long time, and still prevents resumption at present. Pecuniary objects, political objects, and actual insolvency, all united in her to produce this conduct; and thus the misconduct of one single bad bank is the cause of the financial evils which we have suffered, and are now suffering. How quickly a bankrupt law would put an end to such a scandal!

All declaim against the misconduct of the local banks; all call for an authority which can extend its power to the whole of them—a national power, which can reach and regulate them all. This is the excuse for a National Bank—it is the foundation for the demand for the renewal of such an institution. The want of a regulator is so keenly felt by many, that they are willing to take one which is not named in the Constitution—which has proved itself to be inadequate to the task of regulating others, and to need itself more regulating than any other. To all such we present the true regulator, in the bankrupt law, which Congress can establish at any moment that it pleases. There is a regulator named in the Constitution, fully adequate to its object, and needing no regulation itself. A bankrupt law, applicable to trading and money dealing corporations, would regulate all the banks in the Union; and that without the infliction of a single evil which results from a National Bank. National Bank, and put an end to evils from which they expect political advantages. For these reasons they oppose it; and for these reasons the Democracy should demand it. A bankrupt law against banks should become the rallying point with Democracy. All good citizens who have thought a National Bank justifiable as a regulator, will perceive that the Constitution presents a real regulator, which it depends upon the people to adopt at any time.

These are the benefits—a few of them—which would result from the inclusion of banks in a bankrupt law. They are great and striking, and such It would be a constitutional, efficient, and innocent regulator. It would supersede the call for a National Bank, and therefore is opposed by all the friends of such a bank. It would remedy all the existing evils in the currency, and therefore is opposed by all those who wish those evils to continue until the present dominant political party is overthrown. As a party, the Federalists are opposed to the extension of the bankrupt process to banking corporations, and that for the precise reason that such a remedy would extinguish their call for a as must arrest public attention; and now what are the reasons against including them? Gentlemen will pardon me. I do not mean to undervalue their speeches, or to disparage their capacity. I do not mean to say that they cannot give reasons when reasons exist, though it is hard thing to give them when they do not exist. I have heard their objections, but not their reasons. I have heard them object to the inclusion of these corporations, because they were State institutions, and held charters from State authority. I have heard these objections, but no reasons to support them; and now it shall be my task to show that no reasons can be brought to sustain such objections.

Certainly nothing is more respectable—nothing more worthy of inviolate regard—than the rights of the States. But what are those rights? Are they capricious and unbounded? or are they limited to what is right in itself, and to what is not forbid in the Constitution of the United States? Certainly they are so limited; and at this point I meet the objection. I say the States have no right to do a thing which is morally wrong, or which is forbidden in the Constitution; and this is the precise point at which we find ourselves. Leaving out of view altogether the question of the right of the States to charter banks to issue circulating notes convertible into specie at the will of the holder—leaving that question entirely of view as having nothing to do with the present inquiry—we come to the point of circulating inconvertible and depreciated paper; and boldly affirm that no State has a right to do it, or to empower others to do it. The circulation of such paper is wrong in itself—it is morally wrong—and it is forbidden by the express words of the Federal Constitution. No State shall emit bills of credit: no State shall make any thing but gold and silver a tender in discharge of debts: no State shall make any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Such are the injunctions of the Constitution; and surely the circulation of depreciated bank notes, by State authority, is a clear and palpable violation of these clauses. A question has been raised whether a bank note itself was not a bill of credit; and it has only escaped condemnation on that point on the allegation of its convertibility into specie at the will of the holder. On this alleged character it has escaped condemnation. Convertibility alone has saved it. When it ceases to be convertible it degenerates at once, without question or dispute, into a bill of credit, and falls under the prohibition of the Constitution. It is to no purpose to say that people may receive them or not—that they are not by statute made a legal tender. It is to no purpose to allege this. Often it is not true. Often these notes are made an alternative tender: it is to take them, or get nothing for a long time. Every authorized suspension is an authorized tender of depreciated paper; and even without these legislative enactments these depreciated notes become a forced tender as often as the banks chose to stop payment, and force their paper upon the community. They then become a forced tender. No man can help himself. Specie is banished from circulation. It ceases to be a currency. Those who want it must purchase it in the market, and pay the price for it which the holders chose to demand. The currency of the Constitution is superseded by the currency of the banks. A confederacy of broken banks make their notes the forced tender in discharge of every debt, thereby impairing the obligation of contracts, and setting all law and all government at defiance. And this is to be called State rights! This is to be called a right of the States! Sir, I repeat: the States have rights—real and respectable rights—only to be parted from with their existence. They have these rights; and, far from being vindicated, they are disparaged and brought into disrepute by appealing to these rights to cover this conduct of the banks. The circulation of depreciated paper is immoral and unconstitutional, and it is a disgrace to State rights to call them in to cover and protect such unjustifiable conduct.

The charters of these institutions are also invoked to justify their conduct. They have charters, it is said, from the States; and these charters give them privileges which Congress cannot touch. Sir, without questioning the rights of the States to grant charters, I must say that there are limits to these rights—that no State has a right to grant charters exempting a portion of its citizens from the fundamental laws of society, and the eternal principles of justice. What is a charter? It is a bit of paper, purchased with money most usually, and authorizing a man, or a company of men, to carry on some trade, or business, with privileges and exemptions not granted to the rest of the community. This is a charter; and those who have money can buy them; and the more they are able to give, the more valuable and extensive will be the charter they obtain. Thus, the managers of the Bank of the United States gave Pennsylvania four millions of dollars for a charter of thirty years, and thirty-five millions of dollars, and, under the mask of this charter, have twice produced a suspension of specie payments, and inflicted the greatest evils on the whole country. The very institution which is now the Pandora's box of America, gave four millions of dollars for its privilege to scourge and plunder the country; and is the cry of charter to protect these crimes, and authorize this institution to go on trampling on all laws, human and divine, and filling the whole Union with distress and ruin? If it is, then we know what the value of money is in our country, and how far our principles of equality go. Those who have no money to pay a bonus, and to purchase chartered exemptions from the laws of the land, must submit to these laws: those who have money may buy themselves off from the operation of the laws. This is the effect of a charter according to the notions of those who would plead chartered privileges in favor of an exemption from the bankrupt laws. The Constitution gives Congress full power over all bankrupts; the banks are the greatest and the worst of the bankrupts; but Congress is not to touch them because they have purchased a bit of paper from the States, filled with privileges and exemptions from the law! Sir, the constitutional power of Congress cannot be nullified in this manner; and if it could, then all the rich would become exempt from our power, and leave none but the poor for the operation of our laws.

In England, all the banks, except the Bank of England itself, are subject to the bankrupt process; and it is within the bounds of moderation to say that five hundred commissions of bankruptcy have issued against banks in that kingdom within the last forty years. Nearly one hundred have been issued in a single season of financial revulsion; such as the paper system is subject to there, and wherever it exists. In the years 1814, 15, and 16, no less than ninety-two commissions of bankruptcy were issued against these establishments. The consequence was the immediate winding up of their affairs—the collection of the debts due from their officers—the equitable distribution of their effects among their creditors—and the complete protection of the community against the circulation of their depreciated paper. These banks were not incorporated; they did not hold charters; but they were banks legally established; existing under an act of Parliament, and many of them far transcending in amount of capital, and in the number of their stockholders, nine tenths of the banks of this country. Formerly the partners in all incorporated companies, were liable to the penalties of bankruptcy in England. They were liable under the statute of Elizabeth, and so continued until the profligate reign of Charles the Second. In that reign a commission of bankruptcy was issued against a member of the East India Company—a knight—Sir John Wolstenholme by name—and the issue of it was affirmed in the court of king's bench on appeal to that tribunal. A servile Parliament annulled the judgment by law, and passed another law to prevent such judgments from being given in future. Thus, the members of the most powerful corporations—even of the gigantic East India Company itself—were subject to this remedy until released from it by the interference of Parliament, and that during the reign of such a monarch as Charles the Second. This is a material point in our case, and the proof of it shall be made clear. I will read the two acts of Parliament to which I refer, and make good the positions which I have assumed. Here are copies of the two acts:

First act, to annul the judgment.

"Whereas, a verdict and judgment was had in the Easter Term of the King's Bench, whereby Sir John Wolstenholme, Knight, and adventurer in the East India Company, was found liable to a commission of bankrupt only for, and by reason of a share which he had in the joint stock of said company: Now, &c. be it enacted, that the said judgment be reversed, annulled vacated, and for nought held," &c.

Second act, to prevent similar judgments in future.

"Whereas divers noblemen, and gentlemen, and persons of quality, no ways bred up to trade, do often put in great stocks of money into the East India and Guinea Company: Be it en acted, that no persons, adventurers for putting in money or merchandise into the said companies, or for venturing or managing the fishing trade, called the royal fishing trade, shall be reputed, or taken to be a merchant or trader within any statutes for bankrupts."

Thus, sir, this important point is made clear. Under the great statute of Elizabeth, the members of all incorporated companies were liable to bankruptcy. They were exempted in the reign of Charles the Second; and for what reason? Because "divers noblemen and gentlemen, and persons of quality, no ways bred up to trade," had invested their money in these corporations, and because it suited the dissolute morals of that reign to exempt such persons from the laws which applied to the rest of the community. This was the origin of corporation exemption from the penalties of bankruptcy in England; and from this source we obtain the examples to exempt them in our America!

In all the bills proposed in the United States, and in the only one which ever ripened into law, bankers and brokers were included in the list of those subject to the bankrupt process. Bankers and brokers have always been included; and now why exclude banks? A banker keeps a bank, and he is liable. A company of bankers keep a bank, and they are liable. The want of a charter makes them liable; that is to say, the want of license of exemption from law purchaseable for money. This is a distinction without foundation in reason, and cannot be recognised. The same men, carrying on the same business, doing the same acts, shall or shall not be liable to a bankrupt law, according as they shall or shall not have this little talismanic bit of paper in their pocket, which they can purchase for money. The banker Girard was subject to a bankrupt law, but the Girard Bank is not subject to it! This is preposterous, and what no one can agree to; yet it is the conclusion to which we are driven by making the artificial being, fabricated by the Legislature for money, superior to the natural man, created by the Deity after his own image.

There is nothing in the objection: there are no reasons to support it: money dealing and trading corporations are not entitled to exemption from bankrupt laws: and it is no infraction of State rights to include them in such laws. Charters which would grant such exemptions are immoral and unconstitutional, and should be scouted by all authorities, legislative and judicial. The whole weight of the argument is in favor of their inclusion, and so is the weight of authority. The weight of names and opinions are in its favor—names of weight, and recorded opinions, second our proposition. Sir, this is not the first time that the proposition has been made to subject these corporations to the penalties of the bankrupt process. Mr. Dallas and Mr. Crawford, both eminent jurists, and Secretaries of the Treasury, proposed it in their time. They proposed it twenty-five years ago, when the conduct of the banks was as bad as it is now, and when it seemed impossible to compel them to resume specie payment. They both proposed the bankrupt process, and showed it to be a prompt, adequate, and constitutional remedy. They were overruled by Congress, (for the two Houses were well filled with bank owners,) and a national bank was substituted. The creation of a national bank, in 1816, was the substitute for the bankrupt remedy; and we have all seen how it has worked. The remedy was far worse than the disease! The bank which was to compel resumption in 1816, was only saved from suspension in 1818, by the use of all the public money; and has twice failed since when deprived of that money. The great regulator needed regulating more than those which it was created to control. That experiment has been tried, and woful has been its issue! Time and experience have proved that the Secretaries, Dallas and Crawford, were right in the preference which they give to the bankrupt remedy. In 1826 this question came up again. It came up in the Senate of the United States, and numerous and weighty were the names which declared for the bankrupt remedy. Twelve Senators declared for it; and, of eleven of those I am permitted to speak, and to say that the country will recognise among them the names of the wisest men, the fairest patriots, and steadiest State rights advocates which the history of our country has seen. Governor Branch, of North Carolina, then a member of the United States Senate, moved to include banks in the provisions of the bankrupt bill then depending before the Senate: his motion was supported by the recorded names of Messrs. Barton, Benton, Branch, Cobb, Dickerson, Hendricks, Macon, Noble, Randolph, Reed, Smith of South Carolina, and White of Tennessee. In this list are seen the names of many whose opinions will be heard with reverence by the friends of the country. In this list are to be seen the names of those who were the fathers of the Republican church, and the most steadfast supporters of the rights of the States. It never entered into their heads to suppose that they were violating those rights by subjecting corporations to the laws which apply to natural persons, and preventing the demoralization and plunder of the community by the circulation of broken bank paper. These sublimated conceptions of State rights have been reserved for a later and for a more erratic school. Since the Senatorial vote of 1826, two other names, both graced with the highest honors which the American people can confer, and both known as disciples of the old State Rights school, have added their authority to the list of opinions which think it competent and expedient for Congress to treat a bankrupt bank as they would a bankrupt man. General Jackson, in his late letter to the committee of the two Houses of the Ohio Legislature, and Mr. Van Buren, in his well known message of 1837, to the two Houses of Congress, have both recommended this great measure. They have done it under the sanction of their names, and under the pressure of circumstances, which impart the greatest weight to their opinions. And here let me do justice to the elevation of sentiment, and the magnanimity of spirit which dictated this message of President Van Buren. As a Senator in this body, in 1827, he had voted and spoken against the proposition of Mr. Branch. Subsequent reflection convinced him of his error; and, rising far above the petty ambition of preserving consistency by persevering in error, he came forth frankly, and in a responsible message, to recommend what he formerly opposed. This is honorable in him. It shows true greatness of mind; and it gives to his present opinion more weight and value than if it had been the same from the beginning. It is a revised and corrected opinion.

Such are the reasons for including banks in this bill: such the number and weight of names which sanction the proposition. And now we ask for the reasons against it. We call upon gentlemen who oppose the proposition to give us reasons—to enter into the argument, and prove to our understandings that what we ask is unreasonable and unjust. We profess ourselves to be rational men, and to be accessible to reasons. We invite our opponents to give us reasons. They pertinaciously refuse. Of the two wings of the opposition to this measure, neither will give us reasons. The gentlemen of the opposite political party have a reason, we know; and we know full well what it is. They want a national bank; and they are against a bankrupt law against banks, because it will expunge their argument in favor of that institution. This is their reason. The gentlemen of our political party confine themselves to stating objections, without sustaining those objections. They invoke State rights, and charters, without showing how State rights and charters extend to the protection of what is morally and constitutionally wrong.

The objection is invalid. The trading and money dealing corporations should be subject to the bankrupt law. It is the only thing which can prevent the bad from governing the good; it is the only thing which can save the good institutions from the destruction which the conduct of the bad is bringing upon the whole; it is the only thing which can save the community from the miseries of a depreciated paper currency; it is the only thing which the bad banks dread. I say, the bad ones: for, as far as I can hear, the really solvent and business institutions are in favor of our proposition.

Sir, when I speak of the banks, it is with a full knowledge that a difference of character is found among them, and with a conviction that a difference of language should be applied to them. I speak of them with discrimination, and not in mass. They are managed by men, and they take the character of the men who manage them. As men differ, so do they; and it would be as absurd to give the same character to all banks, as it would be to give the same character to all men.

We have two classes of banks among us, distinguished by characters not only essentially different, but entirely opposed: one class consisting of the commercial and business institutions, doing as well as they can under the evils of a vicious system—the other consisting of the political and gambling institutions, wholly intent upon politics and plunder. This distinction developed itself in the suspension of 1837, and became confirmed in that of 1839; and now exists as palpable and obvious, to the sense, as the noonday sun. Unhappily, in both instances, the political and the gambling institutions were strong enough, and dexterous enough, to force or seduce many into their system, which abhorred their conduct, and thus to spread over the country, far and wide, the mischiefs which they contrived and created. This latter class are the masters of the country, and must continue so without the remedies of a bankrupt law. It is for them that the remedy is wanted. Headed by the institution which usurps and disgraces the name of the United States, and wholly intent upon politics and plunder, their steady object is to scourge and pillage the country, and to excite the people against the Government, by charging upon it the mischiefs which they themselves create. Their notorious object is to enrich themselves, and to distress and injure the country. Mischief is their sport and their profit; and an unbridled paper system is their instrument and shield. To make expansions and contractions—to put up and to put down the prices of property and produce—to sink the wages of labor—to make money plenty and scarce—to stop payment when they please, and to force others to do so—to suppress the circulation of gold and silver, and to force upon every body the use of depreciated paper: these are their daily practices; and all the mischief which they create is promptly charged upon some act, no matter what, of the Democratic Administration. Their power over prices and over the currency, is absolute and uncontrollable; and they wield it as wickedly as powerfully. Of this it is sufficient to give two instances, the notoriety of which will supersede proofs, and the enormity of which will stand for an exemplification of all the rest. I speak of the flour speculations of 1836 '7, and the specie suppression of the present day. In the years 1836 and 1837, the price of flour rose to twelve and fourteen dollars a barrel: the cry of scarcity was raised, and immense importations of foreign grain took place. Several millions of dollars' worth were actually imported. The good people of the United States were taught to believe that all this high price, and all this vast importation of bread, was owing to a scarcity at home—to a failure in the domestic crop—to the neglect of our agriculture. This was what they were made to believe. For two years they had to believe it. Finally, the tables of the commerce and navigation of the United States for those years were published; and what did they show? Why, that there were full crops at home those very years, and that we were actually exporting more than we imported! This is what the custom-house books proved. The exportations of wheat and flour for the year ending the 30th of September, 1836, were $3,676,000; and the whole export of bread stuffs for that year, comprehending Indian corn and meal, rye meal, ship biscuit, rice, &c. was $7,431,199. For the year ending the 30th of September, 1837, the exports of wheat and flour were $3,000,000; and the whole export of bread stuffs was $6,820,542. And, to complete the picture, it must be added that the preceding, and the following years—those of '35 and '38—were equally abundant. The exports of wheat and flour for the year ending the 30th of September, 1835, were $4,454,000, and the whole value of exported breadstuffs was $8,383,997. For the year ending the 30th of September, 1838, the wheat and flour export was $3,612,000, and the whole export of breadstuffs was $6,764,664. These are facts which should be known to every citizen; and, being known, would enable every one to estimate the power of the vicious banks over the prices of property, and even over public opinion, and over our daily bread. For two years, the whole Union was mystified on the subject of bread. Deficiency at home—necessity for importations—and consequent enormous price, was what every one had to believe. Now it is seen that all was false—that there were ample home supplies during the whole time, and also before and after; and that in fact our exports were nearly the same for four years, covering the two years of importations; and that they have amounted in that time to nearly fifteen millions in wheat and flour, and nearly thirty millions in breadstuffs of all kinds. Yet, with this equable supply, the price of flour was put up in that time to twelve or fourteen dollars, and is now put down to three or four dollars! And how was this effected? By bank expansions—bank contractions—and bank monopolies! The banks made the rise, and now make the fall. And, as it was with flour, so it was with beef, pork, butter, eggs, and every thing else that was used by the people. All was the sport and spoil of the gambling, monopolizing, and political part of the banks; and the public was as much deceived and misled in its understanding, as it was pillaged and plundered in its property.

So much for the flour speculation; now for the suppression of specie. Over the one half of the Union at present a lamentable dearth of specie prevails. You may travel hundreds of miles, and hardly see a piece of silver in circulation as large as your thumb nail. Is this scarcity fictitious or real? Is it the result of misgovernment in the Administration, or the contrivance of misconduct on the part of part of the mischief making banks? The Federal party answer, misgovernment of the Administration; the Democracy answer, misconduct of the banks. Here, then, is a contradiction, and an issue; and, for its trial, let us appeal to facts. Let us appeal again to the custom-house reports, and see what has been the importation of specie for some years past; and let us look to our mines and our mints, to see what has been the domestic supply. Sir, we have a document on this subject, called for on my motion some months ago, and furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury in the early part of the session. It is number 290 of the Senate documents, and is both full and detailed in its statements upon this vital point. It shows that the importations of coin and bullion for the last twenty years, (and two-thirds of it in the last seven years,) amount, in round numbers, to one hundred and seventy millions of dollars. It shows that the product of our gold mines, during the same period, are near ten millions; and that our coinage, since the reformation of the gold standard, in 1834, and the legalized circulation of foreign silver at the same time, amounts to about fifteen millions in gold, and seventeen millions of silver. Excluding the coinage as not adding to the acquisitions, and it is seen that we have acquired by importing and mining, in the short space of twenty years, the large amount of one hundred and eighty millions in gold and silver. Add to that sum the amount of twenty millions previously in the country, and you have two hundred millions. Make a further allowance for the sums brought in by passengers in their own trunks, and not entered on the custom-house books—and there is no obligation on any one to make the entry—make an allowance of even half a million a year for the innumerable importations, small in the detail but enormous in the aggregate—and the total should be two hundred and ten millions of dollars. This is the answer which facts and documents give to the question—an acquisition of more specie, in the brief space of time that I have sat in this chamber, than the business of the country could employ or consume. And now, what has become of it? What has become of these two hundred and ten millions? Sir, I can tell you what has become of it. A large part has been melted up, to make magnificent services of plate for the presidents, cashiers, directors, and stockholders of insolvent and fraudulent banks; another large part has been shipped to Europe, to pay creditors there, while creditors at home are placed at defiance; another large part is now locked up in the vaults of three hundred and fifty suspended banks, which refuse a shilling for their dishonored notes; and, finally, another large part is in the hands of brokers, who discount, at their pleasure, the dishonored notes which the banks issue and refuse to pay. This is what has become of our two hundred and ten millions of specie, acquired in the last twenty years, and, two thirds of it, in the last seven. And now, sir, whose fault is it, that no specie is seen in circulation in the one half of this Union? Is the fault of the Government, or of the gambling and political part of the banks? Is it the fault of those who have made that vast acquisition of specie, or is it the fault of those who deprive the people of its use? Let the intelligence of any citizen answer the question, upon the view of the facts which I have presented, and the truth of which is incontestable. Let him answer, and he will say it is these banks which have done us this mischief, and which will continue to repeat it as often as it suits their interest and their policy to do so, unless a bankrupt law intervenes to check their career. Not content with merely depriving the country of the use of so much specie, they laugh at the impotency of the Government, and impudently proclaim that the specie experiment has failed.

Yes sir! Two hundred and ten millions of dollars may be computed to have been our specie acquisitions in the last twenty years, and two-thirds of that sum in the last seven years. This is a fact not to be lost upon the public mind—not to be repeated, and forgotten. It is a fact to arrest public attention—to excite public thought—to influence public judgment—and to lead to the most important conclusions. The capacity of the country to supply itself with any amount of gold and silver immediately becomes apparent. It is more than double the amount of all the bank notes, good and bad, which are now in circulation in the whole Union! it is nearly twenty times the amount of the average annual circulation of the Bank of the United States during the twenty years of its existence! it is fully equal, per head, for each inhabitant of the United States, to the mixed circulation of England, and the specie circulation of France, for their respective populations. England and France, each have a circulation of fourteen dollars per head for their entire population; that of England consisting of paper and specie; that of France consisting almost exclusively of specie. Two hundred and ten millions, to our fourteen millions of white population, would give give fourteen dollars and a quarter a head. Now, sir, this is a greater sum than the business of the United States could possibly employ. We could not use it all, if it was all here to-day. The amount of circulation which can be used in a country depends upon the amount of its business, and the nature of its business, and not upon the will of banks or law givers. Agricultural countries use less; manufacturing and commercial countries, more. Thus, while England and France, which are so eminently manufacturing and commercial, can employ fourteen dollars per head, Russia, which is so essentially agricultural, can use but four dollars per head. In the United States, where agriculture is the pursuit of the great majority of people, it is highly probable that ten or twelve dollars per head would be the maximum sum which the population could use. Barter and produce, make our great payments. The annual crops, and the annual product of different branches of industry, make our heavy payments. Money is only an auxiliary with us in the liquidation of debts. If we had our specie acquisitions of the last twenty years, we should have more than could be employed, or used in the country. Forty or fifty millions of it would be disposable, to be loaned out in foreign countries. Two hundred millions of specie would pay two thousand millions of annual debt, for it is computed, that each specie dollar changes hands ten times in the year. Two thousand millions far transcend that part of our debts which would require to be paid in money: it would leave us a surplus to loan abroad. We should be redundant in gold and silver, if we had been able to retain what we have received in a few years. Vicious and criminal banks have deprived us of it, and reduced half the Union to depreciated paper, and to miserable shinplasters. Is this to be endured? and are State rights to be invoked to shield such enormities?

What would be the condition of our country at this time if this 210,000,000 could have been kept in circulation, instead of being melted up, shipped away, and locked up, as it is? The effect would have been that business would be regular, stable, and flourishing. The price of produce and property would be at its natural and full amount. Wages would be good, and the money received for wages would be good also. The exchanges between the different parts of the Union would be the freight of gold and silver between those parts. Interest would be as low as it is in France and Holland, and we should be in a condition, not only to avoid loans from abroad, but actually to lend hard money to the paper money countries, (as Holland and France lend to England,) and to draw gold from them in annual interest, as well as upon annual exports of produce. These would be the effects; and upon one feature of this picture let me dwell an instant, and go into details: it is on the point of wages for labor. Wages are low now, and will be lower still before the Presidential election is over. But what would they be with the two hundred and ten millions of specie which we have acquired in the last twenty years, and which would afford a full circulation of gold and silver? Ask any one who has been to Cuba! He will tell you what the wages of labor are there—that it is one dollar and fifty cents a day for common labor—three dollars a day for journeymen mechanics—often six or eight dollars a day for job work—and all the rest in the same proportion. Sir, it is absurd to quote the examples of countries in the decaying parts of the old world, where industry languishes, and where a crowded population clamor for bread, and are content with bread alone. It is absurd to go to such countries for the effect of hard money on the prices of property, and the wages of labor, in the United States. They present no analogies to our condition. But here is a country just at our own door—part of the new world—an apposite example—where nothing but hard money circulates—and where wages are higher than in any paper money country in the world. This is the example to which we should look—this the standard by which we should estimate the wages of labor in our own country, at this day, if we had been fortunate enough to have preserved the two hundred and ten millions of hard dollars which have been acquired since I have been a member of this body.

Instead of all this—instead of active business, fair prices, plenty of specie, regular exchanges, and moderate interest—we have stagnation of business, reduced prices, specie unknown in half the Union, exchanges deranged, and interest enormous; and all this the effect of a plan among banks and politicians to make pressure and distress for the Presidential election of 1840. Sir, all the evils which we now experience, result from the vicious part of our banks—the political and gambling part—which make suspensions for their own benefit, and force or seduce others into them. The present suspension is for the present election, and as such I foresaw and foretold it a full year before it took place. It took place in October, 1839: in October, 1838, I foresaw and foretold it. In that month, and on the 25th day of it, I wrote thus to a committee of my fellow-citizens in St. Louis who had invited me to a public dinner:

"Since the veto session of 1832, the political part of the banks, and their confederates, have convulsed the country with alternate expansions and contractions of the paper currency, to make the people cry out for a national bank; and they are now preparing for another convulsion of the same kind. * * * The suspension of 1837 (which was a contrived piece of business, and one of the objects of the distribution law) was fully counted upon to restore the Federal party, and its tutelary deity, the Bank of the United States, to full power; but it was made at the wrong time. It was a master stroke, but wrong timed. It should have been made in the fourth, instead of the first, year of Mr. Van Buren's administration. It was premature. Its authors did their best to make it last until the next Presidential election; but the Democracy of the Union, and the New York banks, forced the resumption; and now there is no alternative but to make a new suspension for 1840. It is a bad chance; but it is the only chance. They are dead without it; and, accordingly, all the preparations are now in full progress for that catastrophe. The preliminary steps are already taken. An expansion of the paper currency has commenced, to be followed at the proper time by a sudden contraction, and the consequent stoppage of the banks, and the general derangement of the business of the country. * * * * But the next suspension may not be so easy a job as the last. The process of resumption has developed a division among the banks. We have seen a resumption and a non-resumption flag: in the next attempt to close the vaults, we shall see a suspension and a non-suspension flag. The business banks will resist the suspension; the political ones will force it, if they can; and, in this division among themselves, the community and the laws will find an auxiliary in the non-suspending banks, which may enable them to frustrate the machinations of the architects of mischief."

Sir, this is what I wrote, but not the whole of what I wrote, in the month of October, 1838; and the month of October, 1839, saw it verified to the letter. It saw the second suspension, and it saw the two flags—the suspension and the non-suspension flags. It saw the division among the banks, and the source of that division in the two cities of New York and Philadelphia. It saw the mistake in point of time corrected, and the distress transferred to the fourth year of Mr. Van Buren's administion, which had commenced prematurely in the first. All this it saw, precisely as I had written it down twelve months before. And now, here we are, on the eve of the Presidential election, with this suspension, and all its evils, bearing upon the country, and intended to bear upon it, until the election is over. Bad enough is the state of things now: worse they will be, before the month of November is over. Those who have done these things are able to continue them: those who have made money scarce, and the price of labor and produce low, are able to make money still scarcer, and prices still lower; and it will suit both their pecuniary and political interest to continue the process of scarcity and reduction until after the Presidential election is over. The country may look out for advertisements that so much will be given for produce, if the election goes one way, and so much (being the half of the other price) if it goes the other. Laborers may look out for similar advertisements with respect to their wages; and all that is threatened in the way of reduction, will be performed. Avarice and Federalism will rejoice in the double gratification of deluding the laborer and the farmer out of his vote, at the same time that he is plundered of half his pay. It will be a double enjoyment to rule him, and plunder him at the same time. This will be kept up until the election is over. Soon after that event, (and it is perfectly immaterial, for this purpose, which way it results,) the new expansion will begin. Prices of stocks, produce, and property will all be run up, in order that those who have purchased low may sell high. By the middle of the next Presidential term, the expansion may be carried high enough to begin again the business of contraction, and to be ready for another suspension, and for fresh distress for the Presidential election of 1844; and thus we are to go on, the country and its business, and the political rights of the people, a periodical prey to the political banks and their confederates, until a bankrupt law shall put an end to their nefarious and lawless practices.

It is the fundamental maxim of the moneyed power, all over the world, that the people must feel before they can see—that they must suffer before they can understand—that they are ignorant and capricious—and blind enough, and weak enough, to be at once the victims and the instruments—the dupes, and the agents—of those who abuse them, and use them. This is the fundamental maxim of the moneyed power; and upon it they have often acted in our country, and never more flagrantly and systematically than since the veto session of 1832. Since that time we have had a continued succession of panics, alarms, and distresses, all contrived for political and pecuniary effect, and charged by their authors upon the measures of the Democratic administrations. Partial and transient success has sometimes attended this parricidal conduct, but no lasting or general impression has been made. The people possess discernment with which they are not credited, and see through the veil which was intended to conceal the hidden operators. They have always seen the secret hand which was fabricating artificial distress for the country, and concocting humbug reasons to bamboozle the ignorant. They have seen, and despised all these tricks and devices, and so it will be again. They will see that the present pressure and distress is artificial and unnatural—that it is planned and contrived for the election of 1840, and is a regular result of the system of the moneyed power for ruling and governing, what they believed to be, the thoughtless and capricious people.

The contest at present is, for the destruction or preservation of the currency; and that involves the property and the labor of the country. To destroy the currency of the Constitution, and substitute for it the base issues of suspending banks, is the aim of one party; to preserve the true currency, and to suppress these base issues, is the aim of the other. No difficulty is found in bringing gold and silver into the country: it comes beyond our wants. The difficulty is to keep it after it comes.

Congress has many great and sacred duties to perform, and none greater and more sacred than that of guarding the currency of the Constitution. It is the duty of Congress to guard this currency, and to protect it from every violation. The States are forbid to coin gold and silver: they are not even allowed to make currency out of the precious metals. Uniformity of value in that which is the standard and measure of all values, was deemed so essential to the whole Union, that every State surrendered its right to the coining power: it gave up its right to stamp gold and silver. How absurd then to suppose that they can authorize a circulation of depreciated paper! that they can create corporations to emit base paper when they themselves cannot stamp pure gold! that they can authorize them to make this paper a forced tender in all cases when they themselves can make nothing but gold and silver a tender! that they can authorize them to annihilate all contracts when the States dare not impair one! I say nothing about the power to charter banks to issue notes convertible into specie at the will of the holder. I say nothing on that head, for it is not involved in the present question. I limit myself to what is before the Senate—the circulation of base, depreciated, inconvertible, and spurious paper—and deny the right of any State to circulate such trash, or to authorize any corporations, or individual, to do it. I join issue with those who plead State rights in defence of such conduct, and deny the authority of the State out and out. I deny the right, and affirm it to be the duty of Congress to arrest the proceeding. It is the duty of Congress to arrest a circulation which violates the Constitution, and annihilates the currency of which it is the guardian. The application of the bankrupt remedy to bankrupt banks, is the ready and easy way to effect it. A day fixed for such a law to take effect would be the day of resumption to all good banks, and the day of extinction to all bad ones. It would be the day on which we could count upon the commencement of an adequate specie currency, and the cessation of all the evils with which the gambling and political banks now afflict us.

The remedy is in the hands of the people. We have unveiled it to them, and it is for them to apply it. When wearied with the tyranny and oppression of the criminal and vicious part of the banks, they can apply the remedy, and terminate a tyranny more odious and irresponsible than any which history has revealed to our view. For the present, we have at least accomplished two great purposes. We have vindicated the Constitution from the supposition of incompetency; and we have annihilated the last remaining pretext for a national bank. We have shown that our Constitution is not incompetent to its high functions—that it is adequate to the preservation of the true currency—and that it has no occasion to resort to a monster bank to govern the banks of the States.

SPEECH OF MR. BROWN, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, May 19 and 20, 1840—On the bill introduced by Mr. BELL, to secure the freedom of elections, and to provide for the faithful administration of the Executive patronage.

Mr. BROWN having obtained the floor, said he had listened with profound attention to the arguments of both his colleagues [Mr. GENTRY and Mr. BELL] in favor of this bill. He had done so, because he was desirous to know on what new statement of facts, or by what new process of reasoning, this odious measure was now to be revived, and again pressed on the consideration of the public, after its signal failure in the other end of the Capitol, and after that deep and decided reprobation of it, which had been manifested in so many of the elections of this country. He was particularly anxious to discover whether misfortunes had not subdued, or at least chastened and softened down, some of those fierce and angry passions with which it was first advocated—misfortunes that have fallen with peculiar force on those gentlemen's own personal and political friends. One of them, [Mr. BELL,] a few weeks since, on the Cumberland road bill, gave us a most touching and eloquent description of those misfortunes. "He had seen, (said he,) during the last summer, one friend after another dropping around him," until that proud and exulting majority, by which he used to be surrounded on this floor, from his own State, was now sadly reduced to a solitary unit. Looking at the other end of the Capitol, he might have told us that this mortality amongst his friends had been still greater. There, nothing was to be met with but one entire and perfect scene of desolation and defeat. Sir, said Mr. B. I was anxious to observe that gentleman when he should walk forth amid the ruins which this very bill had so mainly contributed to spread around him. I sincerely hoped that a contemplation of them might induce him to pause and hesitate, and finally to abandon a measure which has heretofore produced such fatal results. But, sir, I am sorry to have to say, what many persons have observed before, that misfortunes, when they fail to reform, are almost sure to harden us, and that even the dispensations of Providence, when not rightly improved, often superadd to our desperation, and plunge us still deeper into those vices and follies which they were intended to reform.

I do not intend to apply such observations as these to the gentleman's course generally in this House. I have had frequent occasions, not only to approve, but even to applaud, his calm and dignified mode of argument, during the disorders and tumults of the session. But, sir, I do mean to say that, on this particular subject and its kindred ones, the gentleman never fails to lose his equanimity of temper, and to expose himself to the imputation of being governed more by the suggestions of passion than guided by the dictates of reason, or the honest convictions of opinion.

In much of that argument to which I wish now to reply, the gentleman seemed determined to have no compeer in bold denunciation, in reckless invective, in wild and furious declamation. He seemed to imagine that he had driven Democracy into its last fortress, and that he was then making a bold and heroic charge, that was to demolish it forever; or, to use his more sanguinary mode of expression, "he was striking a deadly blow at the life-blood of the party—that vile, corrupt, and infamous party which had so long ruled the destinies of this country." But, sir, the Democratic party of this country was not let off, with even such denunciations as these. The gentleman [Mr. BELL] became so far transported as to compare it to that fabled monster, the Parisian vampire, that subsisted "by sucking the blood from the warm and beating arteries of sleeping innocence." He described the end and destruction of that unnatural monster, and declared that he could see in that end the writhing and expiring contortions of the putrid and bloated carcass of Democracy. Sir, I allude to these extravagances in the speech of my honorable colleague, in order to assure him, that in my humble judgment, great as are his powers of description and commarison, no one but himself could see the slightest resemblance in this imaginary picture. No: if you wish to see a resemblance of that Parisian monster, go find it in that proud and bloated aristocracy that has so long fed and fattened on the people of this country—go find it in that system of associated wealth and exclusive privilege, in all its odious forms and varieties, which has been so long consuming our substance, and which is now beginning to crumble beneath its own magnitude, and to expire in the midst of its own rottenness and corruption.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to content myself with making general observations like these, against the present bill. It was introduced originally about three years ago, notoriously with the view of breaking down the Democratic party of the Union. But more especially was it intended to break down the Jackson or Democratic party in the State of Tennessee. It is now revived evidently for the same purpose, and was pressed upon this House in a tone of exultation and defiance which seemed, at the time, like it was intended to provoke and challenge a reply. Sir, I do not feel specially called on to repel attacks made against the Democratic party generally; I have no connection with that party sufficiently notorious to justify me in presuming to become her champion. In my own State, however, that connection is not quite so obscure and unknown. Although never aspiring to be one of her leaders, I have been for twenty years enrolled amongst her most zealous and faithful private soldiers. If I seem now for the moment to step out from her lines, and to take position above that of a mere private, it is only because those who used to bear her banner, high and proudly amid the ranks of her enemies, have now not only surrendered that banner into the hands of her enemies, but are foremost in the onslaught, and loudest in the battle-cry against her!

Let us now turn our attention to the provisions of this bill, the end and aim of which are avowed to be the destruction of the present Democratic party of the United States—that party which the gentleman was pleased to denounce, in his speech on the Cumberland Road bill, to be "a standing fraud and imposition on this country."

I begin, sir, with its caption: "A bill to secure the freedom of elections!" the elections of the people of the United States—all the elections, State and Federal—in all the States. The freedom of the elections of the United States! Sir, you have but to state the proposition in any company, in any State or county in this Union, to raise the smile of derision at its absurdity. What! our elections not free enough in this country? where every man goes forward to the polls, of his own accord, and casts his vote for whom he pleases; goes in his own unquestioned and unquestionable majesty; asking no man's permission, and submitting to no limitation or restriction on his rights whatsoever? How can you secure more freedom to us in elections than we now enjoy? How can you better secure, by law, that freedom, which has been for more than fifty years secured to us by the Constitution? Sir, it is like substituting statutory freedom for constitutional freedom. It is a good deal like what the advocates of this bill call "the purity of the elective franchise." Not that purity which is felt and preserved in the hearts of the honest citizens of this country; not that virtue which, emanating from the heart, controls and governs the conduct of the people in administering their own Government, in their own way, and for their own advantage and prosperity, but a sort of pretended legal purity—a sort of hypocritical statutory virtue, which would yield to all sorts of political prostitutions, on the first seducing bribe that might be laid in its way. Away with these forms and shadows; if the people have not purity and virtue enough (as the high toned Federalists have always said they had not) to govern themselves, you can never infuse those qualities into them, by any process of the law. So much for the caption of this bill. I call your attention now to the preamble, or recitals of it. The first one of these recitals is the following:

"Whereas, complaints are made, that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices or employments under the authority of the same, other than the heads of the chief Executive Departments, or such officers as stand in the relation of constitutional advisers of the President, have been removed from office, or dismissed from their employment, upon political grounds, or for opinion's sake; and whereas, such a practice is manifestly a violation of the freedom of elections, an attack upon the public liberty, and a high misdemeanor."

Here, sir, is a preamble, for which there is no proposed enactment. It alleges certain conduct to be a high misdemeanor, yet proposes no penalty or punishment for the crime. Why, then, is it intruded here on this paper? Sir, I take it to be a perfect anomaly a ,thing unknown before in the history of legislation. I again demand to know, why it is put down in the preamble, but not inserted in the enacting clause of the bill? I can draw but one conclusion from this strange fact; and that is, that the doctrine will do to profess, but not to practice—to show off a speech upon, in order to excite popular feelings, but not to be established as one of the laws of the land, which it is known would have to be repealed, so soon as its operation was seen and understood. I mean to examine this dangling supernumerary presently, to show that the arguments in its favor are all fallacious, and the facts on which it purports to be based, have no existence. I pass on to the second clause of the preamble, in the following words:

"Whereas complaints are also made that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices or employments under the authority of the same, are in the habit of intermeddling in elections, both State and Federal, otherwise than by giving their votes: And whereas such a practice is a violation of the freedom of elections, and a gross abuse, which ought to be discountenanced by the appointing power, and prohibited by law,

"Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the first day of July next, no officer, agent, or contractor, or other person, holding an office or employment of trust or profit under the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall, by the contribution of money or other valuable thing, or by the use of the franking privilege, or the abuse of any other official privilege of function, or by threats or menaces, or in any other manner intermeddle with the election of any member or members of either House of Congress or of the President or Vice President of the United States, or of the Governor or other officer of any State, or of any member or members of the Legislature of any State; and every such officer or other person offending therein, shall be held to be guilty of a high misdemeanor; and on conviction in any court of the United States, having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars."

This is the first section of the bill. According to its provisions it will be seen that every grade of office, and every variety of employment under the United States is included; also that every thing, and any thing said or done by them (except simply giving in their own votes) is to be taken as an intermeddling in the election, and therefore to be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000. Now, sir, the application of this law to my own State is what I desire to bring before the House. There, sir, we have but few public officers of any grade, except our postmasters. We have some half dozen of these on an average in each county. Those at our county towns commonly receive some two or three hundred dollars, rarely so much as five hundred. At the lesser villages and country stores, and at the neighborhood post offices, it is quite frequent that the compensation does not amount to fifty or one hundred dollars. The office is in fact taken as an incumbrance, submitted to for neighborhood convenience. Now, sir, all these postmasters, besides being officers of the United States, are citizens of the United States, and of the State of Tennessee. They are deeply interested as citizens in the elections, both State and Federal, in the county elections of sheriffs, clerks, registers, &c. In the military elections of those officers, under whom they may have to serve in times of war. Yet, sir, it is proposed that a little fifty dollar appointment as postmaster is to weigh down all his other interests as a citizen, and if he dare open his mouth in favor of one candidate or the other, he is to be instantly fined one thousand dollars. If called on to state a fact in his own knowledge, and perhaps in the knowledge of no body else, which it is of the highest consequence to the country should be known; a fact which became known to him long before he was a postmaster—he must conceal that fact. He must suppress and hide the truth from his countrymen, or pay down the penalty of one thousand dollars. Sir, is this my colleague's notions of the liberty, freedom, and purity of our elections? To speak out will affect the elections, just as far as truth and character will and ought to affect them—to seal up his lips and suppress the truth, will also affect the election and put men into office, who have no honesty in civil affairs, nor courage nor skill for the defence of the country in military appointments. Now, sir, there are, on an average, for each county in Tennessee, a half dozen of our fellow-citizens—who have the common rights of citizens—they have the liberty of speech, under all the gurantees of the Constitution—they have, however, undertaken to perform the duties of postmasters for their respective villages and neighborhoods; and for this they are to be disfranchised, deprived of the liberty of speech, and compelled to stand silent and gagged in the midst of their fellow-citizens. Sir, is this the freedom after which my colleague has been seeking under this bill? If it is, God forbid that he should ever find it. For one, I repudiate and scorn such distinctions in a free country. I repudiate and scorn a principle that sets one neighbor as a spy over another, and which enables one man to propagate the vilest falsehood on another, because his exposure can only be made by a postmaster, whose lips are hermetically sealed under the enormous penalty of one thousand dollars. Sir, this bill should be rather called a bill offering a premium to falsehood and defamation; a bill to enslave a large portion of American freemen, becaus ethey are willing to undertake the performance of high and necessary public duties; a bill to establish slavery in all our elections, by depriving one portion of the community of those rights and privileges allowed to all the rest. Sir, I shall show you presently that those illustrious sages and patriots, who lived in the earlier and purer days of the Republic, rejected with scorn the very provisions of the bill now under consideration. Before I present their opinions on this branch of the subject, let me advert to the arguments and doctrines of my honorable colleague in relation to the appointing and removing power of the Executive; remember that the argument of the gentleman was made on the preamble of his bill, for which there was no corresponding prohibitory or penal enactment. The argument, then, like the preamble, might therefore be regarded as a mere abstraction, calculated to do no particular good nor harm any way. But I know my honorable colleague too well not to understand that all the labor he has bestowed in ascertaining the opinions of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and other illustrious individuals, is not intended to be lost as a mere abstraction, accidentally brought up in the course of this discussion. No, sir, that portion of the gentleman's argument will, no doubt, in due season, make its appearance in the Whig papers of our State, in blazing capitals. Well, sir, and what were the opinions of those illustrious men on the question of appointments to office, which necessarily includes also their opinions in relation to removals, wherever the right to remove has been conceded.

I begin with General Washington. In his letter to Mr. Pickering, dated September, 1795, he uses the following emphatic language:

"I shall not, while I have the honor to administer the Government, bring a man into any office of consequence, knowingly whose political tenets are adverse to the measures which the General Government are pursuing; for this, in my opinion, would be a sort of political suicide: that it would embarrass its movements, is most certain. But of two men equally well affected to the true interests of their country, of equal abilities, it is the part of prudence to give the preference to him against whom the least clamor can be excited."

Observe, sir, that, in this opinion of General Washington, he makes no reference to monarchists, or to persons opposed to that Revolution which secured to us our national independence. He goes beyond all this, and speaks of political tenets adverse to the measures of the General Government. This preamble recites that removals on political grounds are high misdemeanors. General Washington declares that a difference in political tenents is sufficient ground for refusing appointments. This preamble recites that removals upon political grounds is an attack on public liberty. General Washington declares that all appointments to office of such as hold political tenets adverse to the principles of his administration of the Government, would be a sort of political suicide. Sir, this brief parallel between this recital in the bill and the opinions of General Washington, directly on the point, ought forever to seal the fate of this proposition, so far as his distinguished authority is concerned.

Immediately after the retirement of General Washington, a contest sprung up for the succession between the elder Adams and Mr. Jefferson. The elements of party, before that time, had taken no definite form, or shape; they were "rudis indigestaque moles." In that contest, however, they became settled and distinct. The Federalists adhered to Mr. Adams; the Republicans to Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Adams succeeded, and, under him, the Federalists took possession of nearly every office of his administration. In support of this fact, I refer to the 3d volume of Mr. Jefferson's works, page 476. In his celebrated New Haven letter he remarks:

"It would have been to me a circumstance of great relief, had I found a moderate participation of office in the hands of the majority; I would gladly have left to time and accident to raise them to their just share; but their total exclusion calls for prompter corrections."

In his letter to Levi Lincoln, 3d volume, p. 477, he remarks:

"I had foreseen, years ago, that the first Republican President who should come into office after all the places in the Government had become exclusively occupied by Federalists, would have a dreadful operation to perform; that the Republicans would consent to a continuation of every thing in Federal hands was not to be expected, because neither just nor politic. On him was then to devolve the office of an executioner—that of lopping off."

I read these extracts now, only to establish the fact of a total exclusion from office of the Republicans under the elder Adams's administration. Mr. Jefferson succeeded Mr. Adams. He was elected by the Republican party, and was its great apostle and founder. The lapse of years has only thrown a holier reverence around his name, and the political researches of the age have only given a brighter lustre to the principles of simplicity, economy, and equality, which he inculcated on his followers. Sir, it is that hallowed reverence for his name and his principles, which is yet cherished by a large proportion of the American people, that my colleague attempts now to make subservient to the destruction of his true friends and followers, and to strengthen the reviving energies of that old Federal party which he so signally vanquished in 1801. Yes, sir, strange as it may seem, the watchword of "Jefferson and liberty," is now being stolen by that very Federal party into whose ranks it once carried dismay and terror and destruction. What has any party to do with that watchword that holds in its ranks and hugs to its bosom every anti-war Federalist on this floor, save one whose reformation dates back for twenty years, and whose devotion to Republican principles during all that time, gives double assurance of the sincerity and thoroughness of his reformation? What, I repeat, has an Essex junto man and an anti-war Federalist to do with the watchword of "Jefferson and liberty?" It should blister the tongue that repeats it, and crimson with shame all who concur in the profanation. Sir, I have reached the point where I mean to give battle to my honorable colleague; "war to the knife," if he may choose to have it so. He maintains that Gen. Jackson's administration, and that of Mr. Van Buren, was not, and is not, Jeffersonian in its character; or, in other words, that Gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren are not "Democrats of the Jeffersonian school," because they have both outraged the principles of Mr. Jefferson in making appointments and removals from office. That they have proscribed men for opinion's sake, and ejected them from office against all the principles and practices of that great apostle of liberty. I not only deny these assertions, but I here undertake to disprove them altogether.

Sir, I repeat, for greater perspicuity, that I now here undertake to show that both Gen. Jackson's and Mr. Van Buren's administrations have been far less proscriptive than Mr. Jefferson's was. That great man's principles and practices, on the subject of appointments and removals, have been extensively misunderstood, because they have been misrepresented. I now refer to his own letters for proof of his true doctrine.

He came into office the 4th of March, 1801. All the offices of the Government were in the hands of the Federalists. That whole party, with a furious desperation, then, if not yet, unequalled in the annals of political warfare, resisted his election. The Republicans, however, taunted as they were as "greasy Democrats," derided then, as now, with being but as the rabble of the nation, bore him onward, until they placed him in the highest office in the gift of a free people. Installed into office, the question instantly arose, what course he would pursue in making appointments and removals from office. The whole Federal party had denounced him, would he now denounce them? The question was soon solved. He prew a distinction between Federalists. 1. The Federalist proper. 2. Those who were called Federalist, but, in fact, were Republicans in principle, but who had been deceived and so made to act with the Federalists, while at heart, they were sound Republicans. The first class or Federalist proper, he rejected on all occasions, turning them out, without exception and without ceremony. They were monarchist in principle, and were, therefore, not proper agents under him, to carry out and perpetuate our Republican institutions. The second class (the Federal sect of Republicans, as he termed them,) he permitted to participate in the offices, to a certain degree. To show that I have stated Mr. Jefferson's principles, with entire and perfect accuracy, I will read from his letter to Mr. Lincoln, dated July 11, 1801:

"DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 15th came to hand on the 25th June, and conveyed a great deal of that information which I am anxious to receive. The consolidation of our fellow-citizens in general, is the great object we ought to keep in view; and that being once obtained, while we associate with us in affairs to a certain degree, the Federal sect of Republicans, we must strip of all the means of influence, the Essex Junto and their associate monarchists in every part of the Union. The former differ from us only in the shades of power to be given to the Executive, being with us attached to Republican government. The latter wish to sap the republic by fraud, if they cannot destroy it by force, and to erect an English monarchy in its place; some of them (as Mr. Adams) thinking its corrupt parts should be cleansed away, others (as Mr. Hamilton) thinking that would make it an impracticable machine. We are proceeding gradually in the regeneration of offices and introducing Republicans to some share in them. I do not know that it will be pushed farther than was settled before you went away, except as to Essex men. I must ask you to make out a list of those in office in yours, and the neigboring States, and to furnish me with it. There is a little of this spirit south of the Hudson. I understand that J is a very determined one, though in private life amiable and honorable; but amiable monarchists are not safe subjects of Republican confidence. * * * Our gradual reformations seem to produce good effects every where except in Connecticut. Their late session of the Legislature has been more intolerant than all others. We must meet them with equal intolerance. When they will give a share in the State offices, they shall be replaced in a share of the general offices. Till then we must follow their example."

To what degree of participation in the offices, Mr. Jefferson admitted the second class of Federalists, may be seen in his letter of the 11th September, 1804, to Mr. Adams, in which he states, that they were admitted in fair proportion to their number throughout the United States Sir, I have now spread out before you, as on a map, the opinion and practices of Mr. Jefferson. They admit of no cavil and no misunderstanding. Now I demand to know when and where—in what year of his administration or in what State of this Union—was General Jackson more intolerant than Mr. Jefferson? When did he say "we must meet them with equal intolerance?" When did he say to those States who were most opposed to him, and who proscribed all his friends from office, "until you will give a share in the State offices, we will follow your example?" Never, never! In my own State, there never was a day or an hour, during his administration, that General Jackson did not retain a greater number of his enemies in office than they would have borne to the number of anti-Jackson men in that State; and yet, sir, we are told that General Jackson exceeded Mr. Jefferson in intolerance toward his enemies.

How does the same question how stand under the present Administration? Throughout the United States I do verily believe that a majority of the office-holders have been and still are opposed to Mr. Van Buren. The very best estimates that have been made show the fact satisfactorily to every impartial mind. Does this look like proscription for opinion's sake? In my own State, the fact has never been denied. In my own district, three out of the five postmasters of the county towns which I represent are thorough going Whigs, active, zealous partisans. Some of them made heavy bets against the candidates of the Administration in the last elections. They attended public assemblies out of their respective neighborhoods, and exerted all the influence they possessed in the election. Sir, let me assure my honorable colleague, that, if his bill had passed before the last Tennessee elections, it would have cut right and left among his Whig friends in that State. Instead of dealing a deadly blow "on the life-blood of the party there," it would have rebounded on the head of his own friends.

But it is often said, while Mr. Van Buren may have retained an equal number of his enemies in office, it has only been in the inferior ones, such as postmasters. Sir, a postmaster is very far from being an inferior appointment, so far as political results are to be attained. It is, in my judgment, to precisely such officers that General Washington alluded when he declared he would appoint no person to any office of consequence, who was opposed to the principles of his administration of the Government. It is through the post offices that the press exerts its mighty power on the public mind. Every postmaster has it in his power, more or less, to paralyze its exertion, by suppressing public documents; or, if he dare not go so far as that, by laying them away upon some dusty shelf, and not handing them out to the people, until regularly and distinctly demanded. On the contrary, a willing postmaster, favorable to the views of one party, may hail his fellow-citizens as they pass, and notify them that letters and packages have arrived at the office, addressed to them, and thus give them a wide and instantaneous circulation. If any man desires to be convinced of all this, let him but examine and inquire at the post offices after the adjournment of the present session, and see, at some of them, what heaps of letters and documents will remain piled up and undisturbed for weeks and perhaps months after their arrival. I mean to look into this practice on my return, and no instance of partiality, such as I am commenting upon, shall go unrebuked. I assure my honorable colleague that even the biography of General Harrison, and the speeches of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] with which he has been deluging my district, shall be faithfully and impartially distributed. So far, therefore, as political results are concerned, your postmaster is an officer of the highest consequence; and it is, therefore, the best proof of liberality and toleration, that Mr. Van Buren and General Jackson could have given, to have let in their enemies into an equal, if not greater, participation in them. A liberality greater than Washington's, or Jefferson's, or any other President's, unless it may be that of Mr. Monroe.

Sir, I have not yet said any thing in relation to the opinions of Mr. Madison. My honorable colleague was pleased to hold him up as a most perfect model of a great statesman, whose opinions should make a deep and lasting impression on his countrymen. I concur with him in his high eulogy on that illustrious patriot. Reared in Virginia, that mother of so many Presidents, I was early taught, next to that of Washington, to revere the names of Madison and of Jefferson. Then, as now, I paid no homage to the opinions of one which was not paid equally to those of the other. Then, as now, I regarded them as two bright but equal luminaries, by whose light it will be safe, at all times, for their countrymen to walk. I now invite my honorable colleague to test his bill by the lights of Mr. Madison's opinions. My honorable colleague has, no doubt, often consoled himself with the belief that he stood foremost of all others, in discovering this favorite remedy for preserving the purity, and securing the freedom of election! But what will be his surprise when I inform him that this same gag remedy was discovered and proposed almost fifty years ago; actually discoved and proposed almost fifty years ago! Yes, sir, there were "Surgeon Crittendens" then as well as now! But they were then, as now, pronounced mere empirics; and their quack remedies, rejected and condemned as they now are; rejected and condemned by Mr. Madison himself, that favorite authority to which the gentleman referred, and on which he so confidently relied. Dropping all figures of speech, I will now give you the recorded opinions of Mr. Madison, I read from Dunlap's Daily Advertier of January 22, 1791.

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 22, 1791.—Excise bill was under discussion; Mr. Jackson, (I think of Georgia,) moved to amend the bill by inserting the following:

"And be it further enacted, That if any inspector or other officer, or person concerned in the collection of the revenue to be raised by this act, shall, by any message or writing, or in any other manner, persuade, or endeavor to persuade, any elector to give, or dissuade, or endeavor to dissuade, any from giving his vote in the choice of any person to be a member of the House of Representatives, member of the Senate, or President of the United States, such inspector, or other person so offending, shall be forever disabled from holding an office under this act, and shall be subject to a penalty of —— dollars."

The vote was taken by ayes and noes—ayes 21, noes 37: Mr. Madison and the celebrated Republican, Wm. B. Giles, voting in the negative. Sir, here was the first gag bill ever offered in America. It was confined to those officers concerned in the collection of the revenue, and prohibited an interference only in the election of certain officers in the Federal Government, and yet it was rejected by a majority of nearly two to one, and by the votes of both Mr. Madison and Mr. Giles, two of the soundest Republicans that lived in this country. Where now, let me ask, is the boasted authority of Mr. Madison in favor of this bill? It stands recorded against it, on a bill much less objectionable than the one now proposed by my honorable colleague.

[Mr. BELL here rose and said that he wished it to be understood by the gentleman and the House, that he would have voted against that amendment himself.]

Mr. BROWN replied, then he apprehended he need not spend so much time against the gentleman's bill, since he began to suspect that when it might come to the test he did not mean to vote for it himself. But how can the authority of Mr. Madison be invoked in favor of this bill, when it is known that it was his giant arm that dealt the blows that terminated the existence of the alien and sedition laws? The great principle that pervaded the sedition law is the same as in this bill. That bill punished all those who should utter or publish any thing defamatory against our rulers; this punishes all who shall intermeddle in elections, either for or against our rulers; not those only who are, but those who desire and offer to become our rulers; not in a few of the higher departments, but in all of them, both State and Federal, civil and military. That punished all offending citizens, this only such as have superadded to the duties of citizenship those of official station. That was, indeed, less odious than the present bill. There the truth could be given in evidence in order to shield the citizen from punishment; here truth has no advocate, and innocence finds no protection; true or false, one single word, uttered in an election more favorable to one party than the other, shall subject the citizen to the enormous fine of one thousand dollars. He may have expressed an opinion unfavorable to his own party; he may have only insisted on the superior qualifications of one candidate over those of another; or he may have only urged some gallant achievement in war, or some noble self-denying deed in time of peace, as a consideration which entitled one party to the gratitude of the country over his competitor and rival. But I need not compare the relative merits of the present bill and the sedition law. The same spirit animates them both—a spirit that seeks to prostrate the dearest rights and privileges of the people—a spirit that alike destroys the freedom of the press and the liberty of speech—a spirit which Mr. Madison, more than any other man then living, contributed to subdue and to extirpate. Sir, I challenge casuistry itself to draw any sensible and clear distinction between the sedition law, Mr. CRITTENDEN's bill, and the bill of my honorable colleague. They all contain the same principle, and that principle stands at open war with those great provisions of the Constitution which secure to the people the freedom of the press and the liberty of speech.

From 1791 to 1837, with the exception of the alien and sedition laws, no attempt was made to force such legislation as this on the country. During that long period, the people were contented that every citizen, whether a public officer or not, should enjoy his constitutional rights. That the assumption of office was but the assumption of new duties and liabilities for the public good, and should, therefore, be attended with no sacrifice or destruction of his personal rights as a free citizen of this great Republic. During all this time, I maintain that our elections, all of them, both State and Federal, were eminently free—free as they could be—free as the air we breathe, and the water we drink. Every where through this wide country on our election days, every American citizen walked forth to the ballot box in his own personal majesty, paying no homage, save to himself and the laws and the Constitution. I appeal to the history of our elections in the great contest between the elder Adams and Mr. Jefferson—to the no less excited canvass between the second Adams and General Jackson—to the contest between Mr. Clay, the now "great discarded," and General Jackson—in fine, to every one of our elections, to show that all of them, every where, have been as free as our glorious Constitution, and the proud, indomitable spirit of our countrymen could make them.

What occasion, then, was there for the revival of this twice-repudiated doctrine of abridging the privileges of the people—repudiated by the wisest and best men that ever lived in any age or in any country. The first reason given, and the one most relied upon, is, that the President in office may use his patronage so as to give him an undue advantage over all competitors. This patronage consists in the power of making appointments, under the express, or implied understanding, that the appointed shall use his influence to promote the election of the President. Now, if all this were conceded, does not my colleague perceive that the appropriate remedy would have to be found, not in a gag bill, but in the amendment of the Constitution, changing the appointing power into other hands, or limiting the period of Presidential service to a single term of four or six years? By the last amendment, no contest ever could take place between the ins and the outs. It would then be, in every instance, not who should be put out, but who should be put into the Presidential seat. Then, sir, there could be no selfish motive prompting to an abuse of executive patronage; nor any adequate one for charging corruption and ambition on any man who was faithfully endeavoring honestly to administer the Government. It was under these views that I have already submitted a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, in a way that will, in my opinion, be the true and proper remedy for all complaints, real and pretended, against Executive patronage and dictation. I shall call in up in a few days, and see what course the gentleman and his friends will take on this subject. But, sir, in the meantime, I hesitate not to say that this patronage is greatly overrated, as to its influence on elections. On an average, the President cannot make more than a dozen or two important appointments in each State; these could not produce even a ripple on the broad and mighty surface of its population; beside this, an over-active zeal never fails to weaken the cause it espouses.

The influence of office holders is more than counterbalanced by that of office seekers. Let us examine it, first as to the personal exertions of the parties themselves. Mr. Van Buren, since March, 1837, has been in. Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, and General Harrison, have all wanted to get in by putting Mr. Van Buren out. Mr. Webster makes his electioneering tour through the Northwest, Mr. Clay moves out upon the North, and arrogantly traverses Mr. Van Buren's own country. General Harrison takes charge of the mighty West, keeping up a brisk correspondence, remodelling his old political opinions, and putting himself in as acceptable a position as possible between the contending parties of the day. Sir, do you not see at once that, on the score of personal exertions, it is precisely three to one in favor of the outs? But it is said that the President in office has so much patronage, so many offices to bestow, that it gives him an overwhelming advantage over all competitors. Well, let us pause and examine the weight of this objection. He can appoint one Secretary of State, and that one will have to work against three Secretaries expectant without—that is, against Mr. Clay's Secretary, Mr. Webster's Secretary, and General Harrison's Secretary—three to one again—and so of the Secretary of War, and all the other Secretaries; and, in fact, of all the other officers and agents of the Government, great and small. I have always doubted whether this power of conferring office was much calculated to advance the popularity of a President. Many are always expecting to be called, while but few can actually be chosen. The disappointed often fall back into a state of indifference as to the future success of the President, and sometimes find revenge for his supposed neglect and ingratitude in the open abandonment and denunciation of him. Sir, I do not pause in the line of this argument to give you instances of this sort during the period of General Jackson's administration; they abounded to an extent which few have suspected; they have no doubt abounded more or less in the history of every Administration.

Mr. Speaker, I have already stated, that, for nearly half a century, the people of the United States were contented and satisfied with the unbounded and unquestioned freedom of their elections. What occasion was there, then, for the revival of this twice rejected proposition? twice rejected, at the time of introduction, by my honorable colleague, in 1837. Sir, I remembered well the pretext then offered for its revival. It was the alleged dictation of General Jackson—his dictation in writing his Gwinn and Shelbyville letters, and expressing himself freely and fully on the public men and the public measures of the day. These, sir, were the pretexts for all this cry of dictation and of bringing Executive patronage to bear on the freedom of elections. And yet, sir, now that the occasion has gone by—now that the smoke of party contest has cleared up, so far as General Jackson is concerned, no man can be found who can lay his finger on a single line or sentence, ever written by General Jackson about those times, that has the slightest resemblance to dictation to his countrymen. To dictate, is to suggest, to point out with authority, and is nearly synonymous with command. It is something much stronger than mere counsel or advice, and yet is a shade lower than an imperative order. In the light of this definition, I defy any man living to show me a single expression in the Gwinn letter which evinces the slightest wish on the part of General Jackson to dictate—to order or command his countrymen what course to pursue in the selection of his successor. General Jackson was the acknowledged head of the Republican party; he saw the dangers which surrounded it; he knew well the numerous and powerful enemies that were engaged to overthrow and destroy it; he knew well its strength and power and invincibility, so long as it should remain undivided

When Judge White was brought forward, he instantly perceived the dangers of division, and wrote his Gwinn letter of counsel and advice, but not of dictation; a letter expressive of no preference of Mr. Van Buren over Judge White; a letter exhorting only to unanimity, and pointing out, in his judgment, the best means of attaining it. Yet, for doing this, he was denounced by my colleague and his party as a tyrant, a despot, and dictator. Yes, sir, for writing such a letter as this, that man, whose whole life had been one continued scene of noble and gallant daring in defence of his country, was denounced as a Roman dictator—ready and resolved to overturn those very liberties which he would have died to maintain. Sir, the advice and counsel of General Jackson on that occasion might by many have been considered injudicious, or even indelicate, according to the taste and fancy of individuals. But I maintain, before my countrymen and the world, that the charge of dictation, so loudly and repeatedly made by my colleague and his party, is no where sustained by that letter.

But this unfounded charge of dictation is sometimes attempted to be sustained by a reference to his Shelbyville letter; a letter written in reply to an invitation to partake of a public dinner proposed to be given to him by the noble-hearted Democracy of Bedford county. He declined attending; alluded to the recent and frequent political tergiversations which had occurred, but prophesied boldly that the people of Tennessee, in spite of them, would stand true and steadfast to their ancient Republican principles. Time has now subjected to its unerring scrutiny the truth or falsehood of every statement made in that letter. The banner of Mr. CLAY under which my two colleagues [Mr. GENTRY and Mr. BELL] and their whole party, fought the battles of the last Tennessee campaign, was at once the evidence of their change, and the signal of their defeat. If further proof should be required to tear away every shred of doubt, which might yet hang around this question of imputed change, let it be found in the nomination of the Harrisburg convention. No, not in that convention, for Tennessee was not there; her late leaders had not the face to ask her to be there. They knew that, on direct proposal, Tennessee would shrink from the adjustment of rival pretensions between three individuals, every one of whom she had rejected on former occasions. No, not in that convention, but in that confirmation of its proceedings, which took place in this city; a confirmaton in which both of my honorable colleagues participated, and which has since received the sanction and approval of nearly their whole party in Tennessee.

This Shelbyville letter was the first warning given by Gen. Jackson, that a deep laid scheme had been formed to throw Tennessee out of the Republican ranks, and to place her among the Opposition or Federal States of the Union. The improbability of success in so daring an attempt, encouraged the boldest and most unequivocal denials of the charge, denials so bold and so unequivocal that the known sagacity of General Jackson and his deep and holy devotion to the Republican institutions of his country, could scarcely save him from the imputation of having slandered and traduced the alleged authors of the attempt. But time, I repeat, has dissipated every doubt on the subject. Those who were designated in that letter as new-born Whigs (to indicate that they were not of that ancient and immortal band who so justly and so proudly bore the name) now no longer attempt to conceal their purposes; but boldly and publicly Tennessee to be an Opposition State; trained, during the last summer, under the banner of Mr. Clay, but to be enlisted permanently, in the next, under that of General Harrison. Sir, I thank God that General Jackson lived long enough to see the refluent wave of the popular will in the last elections, to hear the coming murmurs of an indignant and deceived people; but I sincerely pray that he may live to see (and, living, he will see) how proudly that noble and gallant State will resume her position among the Republican States, faithful and devoted as she was at the moment when her most illustrious citizen retired from the toils and labors of public life to repose beneath the shade of her majestic forests. Sir, I but glance at these things. I refer to and comment on the Gwinn and the Shelbyville letters, because they constitute a part of the history of this bill, the original pretext for its introduction. I have no disposition to revive them unnecessarily in the public remembrance, but a reference to them is indispensable to show that the original pretext was as groundless as the present necessity for it, under this Administration, is notoriously insufficient.

Mr. Speaker, I desire now to reply to some of the complaints made by one of my colleagues [Mr. BELL] against the Democratic party of our State, in his speech on the Cumberland road bill. On that bill, scarcely noticing the merits of the question, its constitutionality or expediency, he took occasion to denounce the past and present Administrations "as a standing fraud on the country." A standing fraud in having professed to be opposed to internal improvements; when, in truth, and in fact, it only pretended and feigned such an opposition just before an election. By means of this fraud the Democratic party of his own State had been imposed upon, and had read him out of the church as a heretic and unbeliever. I might take issue with him on all these points. I might demand the proofs of these bold assertions; but they are stale charges which have been often refuted, and would lead me off from the alleged imposition on the Democracy of Tennessee. Sir, from the day of the veto message of President Jackson on the Maysville road bill, the people of our State have understood that subject well. In her primary assemblies, in her Legislature, and in her convention of 1835, Tennessee approved that message. All her public men, with no remembered exception, then paid homage to its principles and doctrines. I not understand my honorable colleague as now questioning its propriety, but as resting his complaints on the ground that he has been excommunicated, not for any vote given, or speech made here in favor of internal improvements, but because his political associations in this House were with those who were opposed to that message. I fear that the gentleman has in some degree mistaken the grounds of his excommunication. It was because, professing to be opposed to the whole scheme of internal improvements himself, he enlisted under the banner, and became the warm and zealous advocate of those who were in favor of them; exerting his great talents and influence to transfer the power of this Government to hands which he knew would engage in these wasteful and extravagant expenditures. There, sir, was the true point of his offending. He became the advocate of the father of the whole system, and it will surely lend nothing to his restoration to his old political church, that he is now ranged under the banner of General Harrison, who stands committed, by his votes, his speeches, and his letters, to carry out the same policy. Of what avail was it, then, that the gentleman took his pilgrimage over the Ohio, ranging about in search of some Democrat whose peculiar opinions and position in reference to the Cumberland road, would seem to save him from the imputation of evil associations? In that pilgrimage he happened to come across my excellent friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOWARD,] and instantly exclaimed, "Behold what good Democratic society I am in!" Sir, it is not from one or two associations that we judge men; it is from their general intercourse, their common walk and conversation, that we judge them. If the gentleman had never taken up Mr. Clay; if he will now surrender General Harrison; if he will come out from among the ancient and bitter enemies of General Jackson and his doctrines; "if he will come out from among them as not being of them," then he may expect forgiveness and restoration to his ancient church. I repeat, to his ancient church. I remember when, twenty years ago, we were both youthful and zealous members of the same church; admiring the same men, and advocating the same doctrines of Democracy. Soon after we commenced our career, the gentleman passed by me, as in merit he should have done, and rose upward and higher in public observance and approbation, until the Democracy of Tennessee claimed him as one of her proudest and noblest sons. She had no treasures which she did not open to him, and no honors which she did not gladly confer. In this early and high career, the gentleman had no rival in the esteem, and confidence, and admiration of the people of Tennessee—no rival save one. Not that one whose fame and achievements had made him the common property of the nation; (and when I except him, none can be at a loss to know to whom I allude.) I know that the actions and especially the motives of public men are often subjected to unjust misrepresentation and censure. I will not, therefore, even allude to those that have been so often attributed to the gentleman, further than to say, that from the period of his last unsuccessful competition here for the honors which you now enjoy, suspicion followed suspicion like the shadows of the passing cloud, until the Democracy of Tennessee was forced into the reluctant belief that the ardor of the gentleman had greatly abated, if his affections were not totally estranged from her. His separation was the work of time—not accomplished at once by any sudden and overt act of defection. But though gradual, it was nevertheless complete, thorough, undeniable, and final. It was, on that very account, the more prejudicial. There never was an hour when the Democracy of our State could not have given up the gentleman and half a score of others like him, and still have moved onward unchecked and unharmed by the loss. But, by this slow and gradual process, he carried off with him hundreds and thousands of confiding friends, who would have sacrificed any thing sooner than suspect his devotion to the true and genuine principles of Democracy.

Here may be found the true cause of those dreadful disasters and defeats which the gentleman and his friends sustained in the last summer's election. A generous and confiding people had followed the gentleman into the support of Judge White for the Presidency; they had returned members to the General Assembly to help out in the accomplishment of that object; they had sent here almost an entire representation favorable to his wishes. So ingenious and artful was the gentleman's withdrawal from the Republican ranks, that before the people were aware of it they were enlisted in their primary assemblies, in their Legislature, in the halls of Congress, in fact every where, in accomplishing the political purposes of the gentleman and his friends.

But, sir, all these precautions and preparations would not do. In spite of them, Judge White's pretensions weakened as the election approached. When it was over, the failure was so great, the discomfiture so complete, that the people of Tennessee began seriously to inquire why and how it was they had been so much deceived. They had voted for Judge White as a Republican or Democrat—as a Jackson man—a better Jackson man than Mr. Van Buren. In giving that vote, she stood undaunted at the polls, ready to deny, in the face of the whole world, that she intended either to desert her principles, or to separate herself from the other Democratic States of the Union. Proud in the consciousness of these truths, when that vote was afterwards challenged, she looked to those leaders who had instigated her to the act to stand forth and vindicate her before the world. But, sir, what was her surprise, her deep mortification, when those leaders refused to do so—when those very leaders proclaimed that she had changed—that she had left Jackson and his doctrines—that she had separated herself from the other Democratic States of the Union. When they went even farther than this—when they called on her not to recede; that she had gone too far; that retreat was impossible, and that henceforward she must range herself under the banner, the so often rejected banner, of Henry Clay of Kentucky! Sir, the annunciation was astounding. What had only been suspected, was now openly avowed! What was at first only hinted at, in obscure and misty prophecy, now stood forth in full and undoubted fulfilment!

[Here Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS rose and denied that Judge White had ever changed his opinions on any important political principles, and called on his colleague to point them out, if he meant to impute them to that distinguished individual, now no more.

Mr. BROWN replied, he was not then discussing the political opinions of Judge White, but endeavoring to explain and adjust certain charges of his other colleague [Mr. BELL] against the Democracy of Tennessee; his business was, therefore, with the living, and not with the dead. Beside this, Mr. BROWN said he did not mean to allow this debate to take any direction which would enable that gentleman to raise a false issue in the case, and represent him as disturbing the repose and invading the sanctity of the grave. He hoped he was too well acquainted with his business to be taken in that way.]

From the hour when the gentleman, [Mr. BELL,] about five miles south of Nashville, at a dinner occasion, admitted that he was in favor of Mr. Clay, the people of Tennessee began to take the alarm. Many of them, like my honorable college from the Bedford district, began to suspect that they had been betrayed; betrayed by men, too, in whose political and personal fidelity they would have entrusted their lives. My colleague [Mr. WATTERSON] first came into public life when he was scarcely eligible to its honors, and when the excitement in our State in favor of Judge White was at its highest pitch. Young, ardent, and confiding, he never permitted himself to distrust the assurances given by the friends of Judge White, that he and Mr. Van Buren were of the same political party, that they were both of the Jackson party; and that all that was stable in principle, or honorable and consistent in character, must be lost, before either could join the Opposition. Under these assurances, he united himself to the White party, and it was not until he saw the flag of Mr. Clay "floating aloft in the breeze," and borne lustily by those very men on whose assurances he had relied, that he abandoned that party, and returned to his position in the Jackson ranks. Under the explanation which he has just given, the rebuke of my colleague [Mr. GENTRY] fell harmless at his feet.

The same explanation belongs to hundreds and thousands of others in Tennessee, who, like him, refused to leave the Jackson party, and to go over to the arms of the Opposition; an Opposition then headed by John Quincy Adams, Daniel Webster, and Henry Clay; I say then, not now. These great leaders of the Opposition no longer bear about them the insignia of command. They have fallen back as mere subalterns in the ranks of Federalism, giving up the command to what they know to be feebler, but hope may prove more available hands. This, I believe, is conformable to what was at one period the Roman practice—not to select their ablest generals to command their armies, but rather to choose those who had proved themselves most fortunate. But, sir, it is not my purpose to complain of this strange selection of a commander-in-chief for the Opposition; but to inform my honorable colleague that it was the discovery that Tennessee was to be transferred to that Opposition, whoever might be its commander-in-chief, that sacrificed so many of his friends in the last election. It was this that made them drop one by one by his side, reducing to a bare majority of one, that proud and faithful band of friends that used to surround him on this floor. The gentleman portrayed these losses in most touching and eloquent lamentation, but seemed wholly at a loss how to account for them.

Mr. Speaker, I have not done with the associations of my colleague yet, nor with his charge against the Democracy of Tennessee, for having excommunicated him on account of these associations. It is the theme of reiterated complaint, that during the last summer he was denounced throughout the State as a Federalist, and that he was doomed to see his friends falling in all directions around him, under the same charge. While I do not become his accuser in this particular, I am sorry to say that I have witnessed nothing in his associations during the present session, at all calculated to relieve him from such a charge. What were those associations in the election of Speaker? I saw him of Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] I saw another, [Mr. SALTONSTALL,] whose connection with the Hartford Convention is now notorious; and yet another, [Mr. REED,] an avowed Federalist, I believe, during the war, and ever since, all supporting the gentleman for that important office. So also, I believe, did, every other Federalist on this floor. They all came flocking to his standard. These were ugly associations for Republican Tennessee to witness. Mark, sir, I do not say that all who voted for him were Federalists; far from it; but I do mean to say that as far as I have learned the politics of gentlemen here, every Federalist on this floor voted for him. There never was such a party in this or perhaps in any other country like the Federal party. Though often subdued and conquered, it never disbands. In the darkest hour of its peril, existing in secret and mysterious organization, it will suddenly reappear, and uniting itself to one of two nearly balanced competitors, decide the victory in his favor, claiming the future control of his actions as the reward of its services. Insatiate in its demands for power, when rendered odious by its usurpations, it often assumes some sacred form or some consecrated name, and by the very impudence of the assumption, again recommends itself to public favor. I feel sorry that my colleague should have been ever charged with having united himself with any any such party; but I must regard it as omnious that, at the moment of his withdrawal from the Democratic ranks, he should have found so many of that party ready to receive him with open arms, and to help him onward to one of the highest offices of the Republic. I trust that I make this allusion to my colleague's having been run as the Whig candinate for Speaker, and to his having been supported by the Federal portion of that party, without personal indelicacy; I advert to it only as part of the history of parties in this House. The office of Speaker is worthy the ambition of any man, and I do not call in question his qualifications to discharge its duties. But I will not dwell further on this point; I come to another that has opened a gulf between him and the Democracy of Tennessee, deep and wide as ever separated Dives from Lazarus. I mean the gentleman's course in relation to Abolition petitions. Sir, not only have the people of Tennessee, but of the South generally, looked upon that course with infinite pain and mortification. It was a course new and unexpected to them; a course not sanctioned by any thing in his former conduct, and only to be accounted for by his anxiety to place himself in a proper attitude or condition to support the Harrisburg nominotion. I do not make the point now that the nominee of that convention is an Abolitionist, but it is notorious and undeniable that his nomination over Mr. Clay was affected by Abolition influence. The exulting and fanatic shout was instantly raised "that another President shall never come from a slaveholding State." I allude to this nomination in order that I may account for the unexpected position now taken by my honorable colleague in favor of receiving, referring, and reporting on these petitions.

[After Mr. BROWN had gone into an examination of the former course of Mr. BELL on this subject (not here inserted,) he was called to order by Mr COOPER and MR. BANKS. The SPEAKER decided that Mr. BROWN was, giving the debate too wide a range to be relevant to the bill under discussion.]

Mr. BROWN said, he would conform with pleasure to the suggestion of the Speaker, and conclude what he had to say by desiring the House not to give this bill the go by, but now that it had been fully discussed and examined, to pronounce a solemn and deliberate judgment either for or against it.

The vote was then taken,

"Shall the bill be rejected?"—ayes 108, noes 53.

So the bill was rejected, by the following vote:

SPEECH OF MR. LEET,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, June 2, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS of Virginia in the chair,) on the bill "to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue."

Mr. LEET, who was entitled to the floor, rose, and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The question immediately before the committee, if I understand it, is the motion of the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING]—whose place, by his courtesy, I now occupy—to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. Having submitted this motion, it was entirely proper that the debate should have been led off, as it was, by that gentleman; because, by the very act of making such a motion, he undertook to prove that the bill ought not to pass. The motion to strike out the enacting clause is equivalent to a motion that the bill do not pass; and an affirmative vote on that proposition is in effect the same thing as a negative vote on the question, "Shall the bill pass?" The true question before the committee, then, and to which we must respond, is the question, "Shall this bill pass?" Now, without arrogating to myself any thing of the spirit of prophecy—for I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet—I will hazard the opinion that the bill will pass; and I will, at the same time, express the honest conviction that forces itself upon my mind, that it ought to pass.

I desire, with the permission of the committee, to state, as briefly as possible, some of the reasons which influence me in the vote I intend to give on this measure; and I desire that, through the committee, those reasons should go to my constituents and the country. This is a plain, simple, constitutional measure; and, by the stability which it professes to impart to the currency of the country, it will, in my humble estimation, promote the real interests of the people, whilst it accords with the true spirit of our Republican institutions. It is the part of wisdom for those who are in power to adapt their measures, so far as it may be possible, to the peculiar circumstances of the country; and if this is not the very best measure which can be brought forward, I beg to inquire what the other and better measure is that has been propcsed? Has any other been suggested? Where is the measure of the Opposition? Echo answers, where? We have heard it said that the body politic, like a suffering patient, is sick; but what remedy has been suggested? We have heard the present distinguished incumbent of the Presidential chair reproached for not advising a better remedy; we have heard him denounced, on various occasions, in eloquent and glowing language, since this matter has attracted public attention. The people have been depicted as being in a suffering condition, as laboring under a debilitating disease, which would prostrate and destroy them, unless the proper medicines were prescribed and administered. My honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] in the course of his able and statesmanlike speech, referred delicately to a gentleman who is now the favorite Presidential candidate of the Opposition party; and by virtue of his high office, as one of the representatives of the nobility of the country—I mean the people—conferred upon his candidate the degree of doctor. He did not, to be sure, inform us whether he was doctor of laws, or of medicine, or of theology, but I presume the honorable member meant that he was doctor of politics and fiscal affairs. And in further speaking of the evils under which he claimed the country was laboring, and of the suffering of an intelligent people, the honorable gentleman said he did not believe the disease would be cured until Doctor Harrison came in. Now, Mr. Chairman, Doctor Harrison, we are told, is a patriotic, a benevolent, and a humane man; and if he possesses all the other excellent qualities which have been attributed to him—if he be a doctor so deeply skilled in the political and fiscal affairs of this nation, why does he not prescribe a remedy for all these evils, that we might embrace it? Allowing as much patriotism to the friends of this bill as we allow to him, if he would suggest a better measure than is here proposed; if he would prescribe a remedy which would cure this desperate disease under which the body politic is said to be suffering, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] say that the people would not avail themselves of it? Surely, sir, they would. I ask, again, then, where is the remedy of the Opposition, that is better than this? Shall we look to this Dr. Harrison? Shall we look to the Senate of the United States? Or shall we rather look to the House of Representatives, in the person of my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. POPE,] who has suggested a plan, not in any distinctive form, but who has given us the outline of a plan, which, if carried out and perfected, would probably be that which Dr. Harrison would present to us. The honorable gentleman has proposed a Bank of the United States. But more of that hereafter.

This National Independent Treasury bill was first brought before Congress in September, 1837. The message of the President of the United States, transmitted to both Houses of Congress in that year, recommended a separation of Bank and State, or, as it has been familiarly called, a divorce of Bank and State. What were the circumstances under which that recommendation was made? It was made after every other plan which ingenuity could devise for the purpose of taking care of the public moneys, and having them at all times ready for public use, had, to all appearances at least, signally failed. The United States Bank had been tried; the State bank deposite system had been tried; and this measure was first brought forward when the country found itself in the peculiar condition, brought about, in my humble opinion, not by the action of the Government, as honorable and learned gentlemen of the Opposition party would have the people believe, but by the action of these banks, these State corporations, which were too closely allied to, and connected with, the affairs of this Government. Congress was convened under extraordinary circumstances. The crisis was an interesting one, and full of consequence to the country. The whole nation had been convulsed, and business of all kinds disturbed and deranged, by the sudden and universal suspension of specie payments by the banks; but the President nobly and manfully looked danger in the face, and discharged his duty in a mild, yet firm and decided manner.

At that time and under such circumstances, what other measure but this, let me ask, could the President have recommended? The charter of the United States Bank had expired by its own limitation, and had been, on two previous occasions, repudiated by the people; and the next resort to which the country betook itself, the State bank deposite system, had failed. I ask again, then, what else could the President have done? In his message of that date, after setting forth, in a very clear and lucid manner, the causes which, in his view, had led to the unfortunate and disturbed condition of the affairs of the country then existing, the President, in the paragraph next to the last in the message, says:

"It is under such circumstances a high gratification to know, by long experience, that we act for a people, to whom the truth, however unpromising, can always be spoken with safety, for the trial of whose patriotism no emergency is too severe, and who are sure never to desert a public functionary, honestly laboring for the public good."

Now (continued Mr. L.) in that sentiment, containing, as it does, so just a compliment to the intelligence and the discernment of the American people, will any man pretend to say that the President is mistaken? No, sir. He had an unpleasant duty to perform—a duty which required probably as much moral firmness and political integrity as could have been demanded from even the highest public functionary—the duty of telling the people, in those excited times when the public mind from North to South and from East to West was agitated by the events which had but recently transpired—the plain and honest truth as he believed it to be. Believing that this Independent Treasury plan was the best which could be suggested, he came forward and met the crisis in the firm and dignified manner which became him as a gentleman—which we all admit him to be—and as the Chief Magistrate of one of the greatest and most glorious Republics on earth. But, sir, the plan encountered great opposition; and my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] in the course of his remarks, to a few only of which I shall advert, because his argument has been ably responded to by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LOWELL,] and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] observed, speaking of this bill, that it is the distinctive, and the only distinctive measure of the Administration. I agree with him, that it is a distinctive measure, but it is not the only one. I apprehend that there are other measures, not so immediately interesting just now, which may be considered as distinctive. The paternity of this, however, will not be disputed by the Administration, or any of its friends; and I think when it ripens into maturity, as I trust it soon will, that neither the Administration nor the country will have cause to be ashamed of it.

But gentlemen say that the bill is defective; that it is imperfect. It may be so; no doubt it is; but what else could be expected? Would any man seriously expect that a measure thus important, thus complex in its operations and details, would spring from the brain of Congress perfect at once—like Minerva, the goddess of war, wisdom, and the arts, is said to have come from the brain of Jupiter, perfect in form and symmetry. No. I have heard the same objection made in Pennsylvania, against one of the most glorious and benevolent systems, that was ever adopted by man. I mean the system of common schools—and those who were unfriendly to it, who opposed it, said that it was imperfect. The objection, however, did not avail; the system now is in full and successful operation. I can look around me here, and see some of my colleagues, who co-operated with me to bring that system into existence, and who know that, under its benign influences, the boys and girls of the Keystone State are now receiving the benefits and blessings of early education. I say, then, that these general objections of imperfection constitute no argument; and that, even if such imperfections exist, they can readily be removed. No measure, ever offered by any Administration since the days of Washington, has encountered so much, and such bitter opposition, as this. I say no measure, since the days of our own Washington—a name which I pronounce with reverence—a name which I delight to mention on all occasions, when I can do so, because there is associated with it an enthusiasm, a true greatness and brilliancy, which cause the bosom of every man who is an American citizen to swell with emotions of pride, which cause him to rejoice that he is an American citizen, and that he lives in the enjoyment of all those blessings which the talent, the wisdom, and the bravery of that great and incomparable patriot left as a legacy to this country.

But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all this opposition; notwithstanding the political press, as if actuated by one common impulse, from Maine to Georgia, from East to West, has joined in anathemas against this bill; notwithstanding that, in some parts of the country, (and I mean no particular allusion to gentlemen on this floor,) it has been opposed without examination, and condemned without argument, simply because of the source from whence it emanated, simply because it was a Van Buren measure, and not because of any demerits of its own; yet when subjected to the "sober second thought," when it underwent the proper scrutiny which ought to be bestowed upon every public measure by an intelligent people like ours, it gained friends; and the result is, that in this, now the people's House, whether the measure be a good one or a bad one, it so happens, I believe, that it has more friends and advocates than opponents.

But, sir, what is the bill? I wish to be as practical as possible in my remarks. What is the measure, and what are its provisions? Let us inquire whether there is any thing about them so frightful and disastrous as some gentlemen wish the country to believe.

In the first place, it is provided by the first section of the bill, that the public moneys shall be kept in safe and secure fire-proof vaults and safes, in a building to be erected in this city to be called the Treasury of the United States; and that the money which goes into the hands of the Treasurer according to law, can only be taken out according to law; this money, when it goes into the Treasury, is to be secured not only by these fire-proof vaults, which all banks use for purposes of security, but is to be surrounded by all those checks and guards of a moral nature, so to speak, which the framers of the bill could devise; and if additional checks can be suggested, even by the Opposition, no doubt they will be embraced.

The second, third, and fourth sections of the bill provide for the keeping of the public money at different points, namely, at Philadelphia, New Orleans, New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis. These are the six prominent commercial points of the Union. Now, in connection with this subject, and before I go further into detail, allow me to say that it has been ascertained, as the report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows, that this method of having the public money kept by public agents—by individuals acting as fiscal agents of the Government, has nothing novel in it, because the same custom has obtained, in many other countries, for years past; and, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury which I have before mentioned, in twenty-two out of twenty-seven foreign Governments, the public moneys are kept in the charge of public officers. That is a fact stated by the President in his message, and has been ascertained, as the President says, to his entire satisfaction, by the different officers connected with the Treasury Department. I mention this as a remarkable fact, that, notwithstanding the force which may be attached to the argument of my friend from Massachusetts in saying that any illustration drawn from foreign monarchies or despotisms—those Governments being dissimilar to ours—could not apply here; I say, notwithstanding this, it is still most remarkable that, as regards the single isolated fact of keeping the public moneys, the sinews of war, and upon which depend the successful and independent operations of every Government, whether free or not; in twenty-two out of twenty-seven Governments, the public moneys are kept by public officers, and not by the agency of banks or of corporations. The second, third, and fourth sections of the bill are, in my judgment, very judicious, because they select, as the places of deposite of the public money, the great commercial points of the country. They are the points which must, in a greater or less degree, affect every other part of the country in all monetary matters; they are the points at or near to which most of the people who are to receive, in the largest sums, the public moneys, reside. This selection must, in a great measure, take away the force of the argument, which is urged in regard to the difficulty of the transfer of the public money by carrying gold and silver from one point to the other.

The fifth section of the bill provides for the appointment of four receivers general, for the term of four years, unless sooner removed. They are to be stationed at New York, Boston, Charleston, South Carolina, and St. Louis. They are to give bonds with approved security, for the faithful discharge of their duties. So are the collectors, &c. and so, I may say, are all the fiscal agents who may be employed under this bill. So that, if gentlemen will institute a comparison between the security given for the public money as it is proposed to be kept by this bill, and the security of the public money as kept by banks, they will see that there is required in the former case every security that is ever given in the latter. Cashiers of banks. The cashiers of banks give bonds for the faithful execution of their duty. The officers employed under this bill are required to do the same thing. And there is this remarkable difference: cashiers of banks are accustomed often to retain their situations during their whole lives, and it seldom happens that their bonds are renewed unless some very great change takes place. In many instances, we know that they continue to do the same duties under the same bonds for almost scores of years; and in many instances, where resort is had to suits at law, it often turns out that neither the cashiers nor the securities are worth any thing. This bill requires that the officers shall be appointed for four years; and I take it for granted that the bonds must be renewed every four years; and, if the old securities are not regarded as sufficient, the President will require new securities to be given. So far, then, as security is concerned, this system has the advantage over the other. We have also every other means that can be devised to prevent the forcible abstraction of the public money by thieves or robbers, as they are sometimes called, though probably the latter appellation may not be technically correct.

We are told, however, that the banks have their stocks, and that there an additional security is to be found. It is true they have their stocks, and the stockholders, in a suit at law, might probably be held liable to the amount of their stock, and even beyond that. But in order to make the matter safe even to this degree, the personal liability of stockholders should be provided for by statute. This is a matter to which I may perhaps recur hereafter.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the sixth section of the bill, which is a very important one. And here permit me to say, that the very title of this bill furnishes a true index of the principles of the bill itself. What is the title? It is "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public revenue." It is essentially unlike the title of a certain other bill, which, in the year 1836, was reported to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and was entitled "A bill to repeal the State tax, to continue and extend the improvements of the State by railroads and canals, and for other purposes." The United States Bank of Pennsylvania, with all its immense capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, held by the identical stockholders of the late Bank of the United States, as chartered by the General Government, was continued in its corporate existence by a bill which made its first appearance in the world under the title I have just named. And this charter was ushered into existence under the comprehensive words, "and for other purposes." It is true that, after the bill passed, its friends thought it would be best to christen it over again, and they added the words, to charter a State bank to be called the United States Bank." Now, so far as the bill before the committee is concerned, the most fastidious gentlemen, in or out of Congress, cannot find fault with its title. By reading the title, gentlemen will see what the bill purports to be; and by reading the sections, and examining them impartially, gentlemen will find that there is a strict correspondence between the provisions of the bill and its title.

But this United States Bank coming into existence as it did, under the remarkable title "and for other purposes," was carried through the Legislature—how? By a system which, in Pennsylvania, we call the log rolling system; that is to say, appropriations were put into the bill, and subscriptions to the stocks of railroads, turnpikes, bridge companies, and every thing of that kind, so as to reach every section of the entire State of Pennsylvania; and so as to place members in the awkward position—that they must either appear to vote against the immediate local interests of their constituents, or they must go in for the whole, and embrace the very objectionable measure of a United States Bank, re chartered as a State institution. And thus the bill passed. This is a system very similar to the one now in vogue, to which, I suppose, it will not be in order to refer. This log-rolling system addressed itself, not to the understandings, but to the prejudices and interests of men; and thus they were compelled to vote for that bill, even though it incorporated foreign lords and nabobs as the stockholders of an American bank, whom the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POPE] would now exclude; and I here assert that all the difficulties which we have had in Pennsylvania, in relation to our improvements, and almost every thing else, may be attributed to the passage of that bill. It aroused a spirit of prodigality and speculation amongst us, and men almost went mad in regard to appropriations. Gentlemen could scarcely talk of any thing less than millions. And now we are reaping the fruits of such legislation; we find that we have got no good, but evil altogether. I say, therefore, that there is a marked difference between the plain and open title of this bill, and the secret and insidious title of the other. This is addressed to the understandings of men; they are invited to look at it, to read and examine it for themselves, and when they do so, they will find that the title indicates truly what the bill itself really is.

This sixth section repudiates the idea of loaning the public money; it expressly prohibits the loaning or the using of the public money. This is a wise provision, and one calculated to be eminently useful to the country. It was the loaning of the public money by the banks which in reality created the civil war between General Jackson's administration and the Bank of the United States; because the act which incorporated that Bank provided for the deposite of the public money in its vaults, and because, as a matter of favor from the people, that institution, and its foreign stockholders, who had no sympathy with us or our institutions, enjoyed the exclusive privilege of the public money for years. When the deposites were removed, their interests were affected, and the business of the country was affected, as I shall not attempt to deny, because the change would necessarily compel them to modify their business, at all events to some extent. They had enjoyed the use of the public money so long that they seemed to regard themselves as entitled to it forever; they seemed to consider that neither the Government nor the people had a right to say that the public money should not hereafter be loaned out, but that it should be kept in a particular way for the uses of the Government, and that we would not longer run the risk of being connected with any bank, however fairly or honorably its affairs might be conducted. And because the people avowed themselves determined to act upon the principle that they had a right to do what they pleased with their own money; that they had a right to have it in such a condition as that they might be able to command it when war, or any sudden emergency, or a due regard to the interests of the country, required it; for this reason, I say, the Bank of the United States took offence, and avowedly entered the political arena, as it was claimed upon the principle (and I would not do injustice even to that institution) of self-defence. I will not stop to inquire whether the interference of that institution with our political affairs was, or was not, caused by the principle of self-defence—or whether it originated in the desire and thirst of power, principles which we know are identified with the very nature of institutions of that kind, especially when they are overgrown and possessed of large capitals, and more especially when they are controlled, as that institution, was by foreigners, by rich men abroad, not citizens of our own country, and not feeling the same interest in our institutions that we ourselves feel.

The late President of the Bank of the United States, Mr. Biddle, a gentleman whom I have the honor to know, and whose talents and learning I hold in much respect, says some where "that the constant tendency of banks is to lend too much, and put too many notes in circulation;" and the President of the United States says, "that the proneness to excessive issues has ever been the vice of the banking system."

Here, then, for once, Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Biddle agree in opinion. Whether they ever did so before or not, I need not inquire; but they do agree in this particular; and, so far as my fiscal vision goes, I cannot see how a difference of opinion could possibly exist between them on that point. I say that so many words never expressed more cogent truth than is contained in the two passages I have quoted. Banks, with all the restrictions and limitations usually thrown around them, will excite speculation and overtrading. It is in their nature to do so. We all know that when people come forward, either in the Legislatures of the States or in Congress, to ask for the charter of a bank, they put it on the grounds of public good or public convenience, and that charters generally are granted on that professed principle—therefore, numerous checks and guards are inserted, and most generally the power of revocation is retained. But such was not the fact in relation to the United States Bank of Pennsylvania; for the majority who passed the bill refused to insert such a clause, a motion to that effect having been made by my honorable friend and colleague, who sits on my right [Mr. MCCULLOUGH.] But I say that, with all the checks and guards usually thrown around these institutions, they will vie and struggle one against the other, and excite overtrading and speculation, and they will induce people who would otherwise be content with moderate profits to run into excesses, which lead finally to disaster and ruin. The very same principle has made many men, who were once affluent, now poor. They have been overwhelmed by the consequences of their own folly, and by the thirst of gain which always characterizes these soulless institutions. These banks, it is true, are composed of men who, in their private characters, may be honest and upright, yet when they come to be invested with a corporate capacity, they seem to forget the principles by which, as individuals, they are directed and governed—so true is the maxim of the old common law, that corporations are soulless. They have no sympathies. The first principle of their nature is universal self-interest. The more money they can make, the better financiers they are; and they act upon the principle of taking care of themselves, and letting every body else do likewise. Upon this point, I ask the Clerk to read some observations which I consider very judicious, and which I intend to incorporate into my printed remarks.

The Clerk then read as follows:

From an article on "Banking and Currency," in the Dublin University Magazine for February, 1840.

"The effects of rival banks of issue on the fluctuations of trade, may be thus briefly described. When trade is prosperous, and prices are high, the currency of the country will bear some addition to be made to it without being thereby depreciated. Each bank will struggle that this addition shall proceed from its own issues; and for this purpose will discount more paper upon more liberal terms than before. From this conduct of the banks, trade will receive an additional, an unnatural, but a temporary impetus. Manufacturers and merchants will make and import a larger quantity of goods, for which they anticipate a speedy sale upon credit, at the same time purchasers are more ready to give bills, as they are confident that, when the bills come to maturity, they can easily procure money to pay them from the banks. While this state of things continues, all is prosperous, and the banks in particular make large profits from the quantity of bills which they discount. The circulation is full to overflowing; but the exchanges gradually turn and become adverse; the stock of gold in the banker's hands rapidly diminishes. Every bank is obliged to contract its discounts often very abruptly, and is happy, if by such a course it can avert the impending ruin. But this conduct, although it may save the banks, is necessarily followed by a paralysis of trade, and general public distress. Those who expected with confidence to fulfil their engagements by getting their bills discounted, are disappointed, and are either reduced to insolvency, or obliged, at great loss, to force an immediate sale of their goods, in a dull and overstocked market. The public, scarcely able to fulfil their existing engagements, are unwilling to enter upon new ones. Most people then discover that, during the excitement, they purchased a greater quantity of goods than they can either dispose of, or afford to keep on hand. Money becomes every day more scarce, and goods fall in value with still greater rapidity. The depression of trade makes that amount of currency redundant, which, in ordinary times, would not be more than sufficient to conduct the exchanges of the community. The demand for gold, therefore, continues for exportation; some of the worst conducted banks are unable to withstand the pressure; they stop payment, then a public panic arises, and gold is demanded for hoarding as well as exportation. To this latter demand there is no limit. The demand for gold for exportation ceases as soon as the currency is sufficiently contracted, for the exchanges must then turn; but the demand for gold, for hoarding, proceeds with augmented rapidity. It is like an epidemic. One man runs to the bank for gold, because he sees his neighbor do the same, and this demand may continue as long as a bank note remains in the hands of the public. It is like the plague, or any other infectious disease, which may cease of itself, although no human power can arrest its progress. In this general calamity the poorest are overwhelmed; the wealthy alone survive the shock. After a few months, trade recommences, and is conducted for some time with considerable caution: confidence gradually survives; the banks increase their issues; trade becomes more lively; and then the former events occur in the same order as before; and as long as rival banks are permitted to make paper money, there will be a perpetual vicissitude of trade in nearly the following order:

Caution, Confidence, Liveliness, Overtrading, Great apparent Prosperity, Sudden Cessation, Paralysis, Distrust, Panic, Bankruptcies."

Mr. L. continued. In bringing forward these opinions, I do not desire to be understood as contending that the banks ought not to issue notes. I do not intend to say that they ought to exist only as banks of deposite; but I think that their notes should be of a larger denomination than those which, up to this time, have been permitted by the laws of the country to be issued.

[Mr. MORGAN rose to inquire what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LEET] thought should be the lowest denomination.]

Mr. LEET. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that, at present, I would prevent any bank from issuing a note under ten dollars; and, when I had the honor of a seat in the Senate of my own State, I offered a proposition of that kind. But, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] will do me the favor to listen to what I have to say, he will see that, whenever a certain state of things can be brought about—not by a sudden movement, but by a regular, progressive improvement in the condition of these institutions—I would go higher than the sum of ten dollars. My idea is this—and I may as well depart a little from the order of my argument, and express my opinions here—I would have these institutions chartered as commercial institutions. I would not allow any great number of them to be established, (we have now, I believe, about one thousand banks in the United States.) I would have them issue no small notes—threes, twos, ones, and even notes of a less amount, as they now do. I would sanction no such thing; but I would confine them to commercial operations: and in that respect I am of opinion that they would be eminently useful to the country. If the subject of banks and banking were a new question, now first propounded—if we were now about to establish a system—I would be in favor of one essentially different from that which at present prevails—different even from the system as it is gleaned from the acts of incorporation themselves, and which we know are more perfect in the theory than the system itself is in practice. I would be in favor of a thorough reform. I would reform all the abuses and excesses into which they run, and which are not authorized by their charters. I would reform them by law, by the force of public opinion, and in every manner in which the object could be attained. But I would not destroy the banks; I would not injure credit, for I believe it must, and always will, exist in such a country as this; but I say that, whenever it can be done, the system ought to be reformed; and it can only be done by progressive steps. But the credit system must be so regulated as to be useful to the people, and not to the stockholders of banking institutions alone.

If, then, the banks will, as I think I have shown, without the aid of the public treasure, vie with each other in the struggle for customers and business, will excite speculation and overtrading, and for that purpose will expand their issues, and afterwards be under the necessity of contracting them, thereby affecting the value of produce, and of all articles of trade; if, I say, such is the case, and if this state of things grows out of the very nature of these institutions, how much less will it be the case if you adopt the principle of this sixth section, and refuse to loan the public treasure at all? It is this very principle of refusing to loan the public treasure, which is to save you and the country from all this feverish excitement, and speculation for money's sake, which we see resulting from these institutions. And in this connection I have another remark to make. This is an independent Government; so intended to be by the framers of the Constitution. It has limited powers, and all the powers which are not given to it by the Constitution, are reserved to the people of the States. And although the word currency is not used in the Constitution, as a grant, yet the words "gold and silver" are used; and they are made the tender in payment of debts, so that your Government could not pay a debt in any other medium, if your creditors chose to demand it. I say, then, that the Constitution, and the venerable men who framed it, designed this Government, so far as the power existed to make it so by that instrument, to be independent, and to carry on its operations without the slightest dependence upon, or connection with, the States, directly or indirectly. But if you repudiate this principle, if you take this exploded system of State deposite banks, what is the consequence? You see that these banks are dependent on the Legislatures of the States—that they are the creatures of State legislation; and when they get into difficulties, you see them going up and imploring their Legislatures to be merciful towards them. These banks, be it remembered, have a great deal of power, far too much, and too often accomplish their purposes; and if you adopt that system, it is manifest that you make this Government dependent on the States, because the banks themselves are dependent on the Legislatures of the States.

In this situation of affairs, you would have a great and splendid Government, with twenty-six growing and prosperous States, connected with (and bound to support it, to be sure, when necessary) in a condition of dependence, however, altogether different from that intended by the terms of the Constitution. Need I refer to the fact, that, in the year 1814, the State banks suspended? Need I refer to the disastrous and deplorable condition of things which followed that suspension? I will leave it to those who hear and may read me, to take a retrospective view of those gloomy times. Need I refer to the year 1819, when they suspended specie payments? Or, sir, need I advert to the year 1837, when a similar event took place? Need I refer especially to the year 1837, when the banks suspended in New York, in Philadelphia, in Baltimore, and all through the South and West, when the explosions of these corporations came upon the people like successive claps of thunder? Need I refer to the partial suspension in the year 1838? Pennsylvania, and the banks South and West of her, suspended; and it is a remarkable thing that they suspended in Pennsylvania the very day after the election. Why they held out so long, I shall not inquire. Now, we need not, for the purpose of the argument, claim that these suspensions were brought about wilfully by these corporations; but allow, if you please, that the suspensions were, in a great measure, the results of the laws of trade and commerce, over which they could have no control. Still, in every aspect, I say that it is unnecessary, inexpedient, and improper, in a Government like this, to trust its money, without which it cannot perform its functions, to these institutions, liable as they are, from different causes, to be rendered unable to pay. The better plan is that here suggested, to keep the public money always safe, and ready for use.

There is another very excellent feature in this bill, to which I will advert for a moment. The eleventh section requires the money to be deposited, not in the name of the collectors, as heretofore, but in the name of the Treasurer, no matter who he may be—A, B, or C. He is an officer known to the law and the Constitution. You will, then, after this bill shall have passed, not see in your great city of New York and other places, millions of money held in the name of an individual, and over which he has control, and upon which he can draw and check as he pleases; but it will be deposited in the name of the Treasurer of the United States.

Again: Examinations of the books of accounts are to be made, and of the moneys on hand; and special agents are to be appointed for that purpose. This examination may be monthly, or weekly, or daily. It may be just as often as the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under the advice and upon the suggestion of those connected with the Government may require. Is not this a great improvement? The United States Bank of Pennsylvania is required by law to make monthy returns to the Auditor General of the State. That is, to be sure, a great improvement on the old system; but, under this bill, the depositaries of the public money are obliged to submit their accounts, and even the money itself, to be overlooked and counted by these special agents, as often as the agents, or the Secretary of the Treasury himself, may think proper. This, I say, is a great improvement. How is the fact with the banks? There the money is counted, probably once in three or six months. A committee appointed by the board repair to the cashier's room and count the money, and see what amount is there; or, as is more generally the case, they take the word of the tellers and cashier. It may be said, on the same principle, that the special agents will take the word of these officers. It may be so; if it is, it will be because they have especial confidence in the officers. But I take it that, in view of the requisitions of this bill, the head of the Treasury Department will feel it incumbent upon him to require a careful inspection and examination of the money itself, so as to see whether the hard dollars are there or not.

Another very good feature of the bill is that contained in the 17th section, by which it is declared that the using, investing, or loaning the public money, shall be deemed a FELONY, and that any officer or agent, of the United States, and all persons advising or participating in such act, being convicted thereof before any court of the United States, of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not less than six months, nor more than five years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled. Now, though it may appear to convey an imputation of frailty upon human nature, that a law of this kind should be required in relation to men who are to be trusted with duties so high, yet no honest man can object to it; and if a dishonest man should happen to get into office, this is the very law which is wanted for him. It is a principle, as old as civilization itself, that punishment for the violation of law, or for neglect of duty—for crime, either of commission or omission—has a great, controlling, moral influence. It is certain that, by a provision of this kind, men are more likely to be prevented from yielding to temptation. If men of dishonest principles should chance to be elevated to these offices, will they not be deterred from indulging their propensities by this provision? What is the fact now? This thing of using the public money for personal purposes is a mere breach of trust, and subjects a man simply to a civil action, which he can come forward and defend; and in reference to which he may declare every thing that any honest man might, according to the rules and practice of courts, do, if suit were brought against him for a sum of money which he might not be able to pay, or which ought not to be paid. He may have all the advantages and facilities of a civil suit, and there is nothing like odium or reproach attaching itself to him. In this view of the case, this is a very important provision in the bill.

I come now to the nineteenth section, which of all others, is probably the most important, because, so far as the business of the country, which has been so much talked of, is concerned, this section it is alleged will likely exercise more influence than any other in the bill. It will, I think, have a beneficial, not an injurious effect.

This section proposes that the revenue or income of the Government shall, in the course of a certain period of time, be collected in legal currency, in gold and silver. It does not propose that the revenue shall be collected at once; but it provides that, after the 30th day of June, 1840, one fourth part of the revenue shall be collected in gold and silver; that after the 30th day of June, 1841, one other fourth shall be so collected; that after the 30th day of June, 1842, one other fourth shall be so collected; and that after the 30th day of June, 1843, the whole of the revenue shall be paid in gold and silver. So that it will be perceived, the receipts of the notes of sound specie paying banks, will not be done away with entirely, until the last of June, 1843. Now, this section has been most strenuously objected to—and, in some parts of the country, it has been represented and discussed in such a way as greatly to confuse and delude the public mind.

The President, in his last annual message, says: "From the best estimates, we may safely fix the amount of specie in the country at eighty-five millions of dollars, and the portion of that which would be employed at any one time, in the receipts and disbursements of the Government, if the proposed change were made at once, would not, it is now, after fuller investigation, believed, exceed four or five millions."

Now the President says, that the highest amount of specie in the country will be $85,000,000. Well, even upon the suppostion that the system proposed by this bill would go into operation this very day, only four or five millions of this amount would be required to carry out its purposes. But it is not proposed, as I have shown, that the bill shall go into full operation at once. It is proposed that only one-fourth of the amount of the revenue shall in the first instance be collected in gold and silver, and be placed in deposite. The change is to be gradual; and if injury should be found to result from it, Congress, which, with a spirit of patriotism, is at all times looking to the interests of the people, will amend the bill in any particular in which amendment may be required. If the change were sudden, and not gradual, gentlemen might probably with much force and propriety object to the bill; but, being gradual, the effect on the currency will be mild and salutary. It may be said that the business of the country, as it increases, year after year, will continue to require more and more specie for the collection of the revenue. Will not the gold and silver of the country also augment? Look at Mexico. Look at the provinces of New Spain, with which we are intimately associated. Look at the gold and silver coined there every year. According to evidence, they made in their mints silver coin in every year to the amount of fifty millions, and gold to the amount of fourteen millions of dollars; being a total of sixty-four millions of dollars. This was some time ago, and no doubt they make more now. Of this gold and silver, large amounts are imported here. Is it probable that we shall not always have the means of being in possession of as much gold and silver as the country requires—and that the increase of the precious metals will not go, pari passu, with the amount required for the business of the country?

But my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING] in speaking of this measure, and what he supposed would be its effect on the banks, used the strong and emphatic language, that it "would unbank the banks." I should like to have heard that honorable gentleman explain how it was, that the use of four or five millions of dollars of specie, in the collection of the public revenue, was to "unbank the banks." There are in the country about one thousand banks; some of them are sound, some unsound. So far as the unsound or rotten banks are concerned—so far as banks, whose stockholders would not agree to be liable for the debts of the institution, but who have been willing to speculate upon the country, and make all the money they could—so far, I say, as banks of such a description may be affected, the operation of this section will be, either to restrain them within proper limits, or to compel them to wind up. But, so far as the sound banks are concerned—banks whose affairs are managed in accordance with the principles of their charters—which have not let out too much paper, and have always kept on hand a fair proportion of specie, the operation of this section must necessarily be mild and salutary. Its only operation would be to restrain them from the issue of an improper amount of paper. Every man knows that the perpetual tendency of these institutions is to issue too much paper. In my own State I have known a bank chartered with an amount of capital paid in of, say, one hundred thousand dollars, which had near four hundred thousand dollars in circulation. It lived upon the mere breath of credit; and if a word of doubt, as to the soundness of its credit, had been uttered in any respectable quarter, it must necessarily have fallen. I say, then, that this mode of collecting the public revenue, even after the provisions of the nineteenth section shall have gone completely into operation, will not affect the honest banks in any manner so injuriously as to prevent them from making fully as much as they ought to make.

I might enter into other illustrations to prove the superior relative advantages which this Independent Treasury system possesses over the State Bank deposite system. It appears from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the losses sustained in the collection of the revenue, from customs and public lands, in consequence of the defalcations of public officers and receivers, are much less in amount than the losses sustained by the banks. From the year 1789 to the year 1837, the amounts received by collectors and held under their control, from duties, were $946,000,000, and the amounts received by receivers of pulic land offices, were $107,000,000; making a total of one billion and fifty-three millions of dollars. From the year 1789 then, it has been the practice of the Government to trust their public money in the hands of public agents. Afterwards, to be sure, this money was transferred at one time to the State banks, and, at another time, to the Bank of the United States, and always, down to the year 1837, either to the one or the other. But I refer to these facts, merely for the purpose of showing that in this principle of trusting the public money to the hands of public agents, there is nothing novel. In the year 1837, when a universal suspension of specie payments took place, the State banks had in their vaults $32,000,000 of the public money; and such was the condition into which their affairs were thrown by that suspension, that the Government was obliged to pay its creditors with this bank paper at a discount of at least ten per cent. thereby producing a loss to the States and to the public creditors of something like two and a half millions of dollars. I say to the States, because, under the deposite act of 1836, the States received this money from the banks. And I well recollect that, when the State of Pennsylvania came to receive her portion of the public plunder, or, as it was commonly called, the surplus, there was a contest among the banks who should have it on deposite. The Legislature was entreated to put it in one place and in another; and the then deposite banks could not have it removed because it was alleged it would destroy the business of that portion of the country in which they were located; and that every thing would go wrong. The surplus was withdrawn from the banks, in pursuance of the law, and no doubt it had a great effect upon stock. I will not, however, enter into any further comparison between this independent Treasury and the State bank system; but I will inquire whether a United States Bank would answer the necessary purposes? And here I call the attention of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. POPE.] He offered, on the 9th of March last, in his place here, a resolution, to which I have before incidentally adverted, suggesting a plan which, if carried out into the form of a bill, would, no doubt, amount to a scheme, antagonistical to that of the Independent Treasury, and be the real favorite scheme of the Opposition party. This resolution provides: "That it is necessary and proper to establish a National Bank, with a capital of seventy millions of dollars, to aid the fiscal operations of the Government."

He sets out with the principle that it is necessary and proper to establish a National Bank; and he then goes on to define the purposes for which it shall be established.

Mr. L. proceeded to read the resolution, and observed that, among the most prominent objects of this great National Bank, as indicated in the honorable gentleman's resolve, is this: "It is to reform the existing disorder in the currency, and to secure to the nation a stable and uniform standard of value, by excluding a spurious and ruinous paper currency from circulation, and to prepare, in part, the pecuniary means of war." Now, sir, what has past experience shown in regard to the capacity of such an institution, to accomplish these objects? Did the country find the late Bank of the United States to answer any such ends? Has the present United States Bank of Pennsylvania attained any such purposes? Has it secured to the nation an uniform standard of value, and prevented the circulation of a miserable and useless paper currency? No, it has not. Has it maintained itself in a condition to afford the country "the pecuniary means of war?" Could it have aided the Government, in the event we had had war with England, on account of the Maine border question? No, Mr. Chairman, no. We behold that institution, with all its capital, and all its boasted jingle of hard dollars in its vaults, a suspended bank, refusing to redeem its promises to pay, and even issuing post notes.

He proposes that ten millions of the capital shall be reserved for the United States, that at least one-half of the residue of the capital shall be allotted to the States, and divided among them, according to their representation in Congress; and that the balance of the capital shall be taken by American corporations and citizens, under proper rules and restrictions. I am pleased, at all events, to find that my friend has excluded foreigners, and that he confines the stock to American citizens. But look at this proposition for a moment. It is certainly the most extraordinary one, for a fiscal agent of the United States, that I have yet seen. In saying this, I mean no disrespect to my friend. But here is a proposition for an immense bank, with a capital double the amount of that of the late United States Bank, connecting this General Government, which is to be one stockholder, with all the States, which are also to be stockholders; and thus you convert the Government, so far as its fiscal agencies are concerned, into one grand United States Bank. Suffer this scheme to be carried out, where would be the power of the people to resist such a vast combination? Let such a bank, with its seventy millions of capital, and shortly, perhaps, with double that amount, having its agencies and branches located in different parts of the country, and its friends scattered all over the earth—I say, let such a bank ever be established, and men may then indeed talk of the power and influence of corporations; because such a concentration of money power would be truly dangerous, and in the lapse of time utterly irresistible.

The gentleman proposes, farther, that after five years, notes shall not be issued of a less denomination than ten dollars; and after ten years, not of a less denomination than twenty dollars. So far as that provision goes, it is well enough. Now if this is intended by him as an antagonistical scheme to the Independent Treasury bill, and if we are to look to the former as the better and wiser, and more beneficial measure, I must beg to say that it is not a measure to which I could yield my assent. I should consider it obnoxious to all the objections that ever existed against the United States Bank. I should consider it as virtually incorporating into your Constitution a principle that banks should give to the Goverment its currency.

I wish now, Mr. Chairman, briefly to notice one or two objections which have been urged against this bill.

It has been objected to it, that it will have the tendency to introduce an exclusively metalic currency, and to destroy the credit of the banks. Now for my own part, I do not believe that such will be the results, nor do I believe that the friends of the measure desire that such should be the results. I look upon this as an argument made rather for effect than any thing else. To my recollection, I have never heard it used by any gentlemen on this floor, nor do I suppose I shall; but still we know that this objection has been raised elsewhere. It certainly is not the design of those who support this bill that such results should follow. In the year 1838, when the party in Pennsylvania, (if I may use the phrase,) met by their representatives in convention at Harrisburg, they took especial care to disclaim any such notion, and they treated with a becoming feeling of indignation any effort that might be made to impute to them the advocacy of such a doctrine as that of the introduction of a currency exclusively metallic. Let me say that the pecuniary business of your Government; the receipts and disbursements of the public revenue, constitute only a small portion of the money received and paid out through this country. Look at your commerce—look at your merchandise scattered over the country—look at your importing and exporting trade—look at your manufactures of various sorts, and you will find that the amount required for the operations of the Government will be a small sum in comparison with the millions and tens of millions paid out and received in the business operations of the country The convention to which I have referred, issued an address, from which I will take the liberty to read a few brief extracts. It says:

"The aristocracy are well aware, that they cannot successfully contend, in a fair and honorable warfare, with a party which is essentially popular, and which must be eventually predominant. For this reason, they apply to the Democracy, epithets which honorable men despise, and impute to them principles never entertained by the party, and which every Democrat disavows. An impression is attempted to be made upon the public mind, that it is the intention of the Democratic party to destroy the credit system—to destroy all the banks—and to impose an exclusive metallic currency upon the people—SUCH INTENTIONS, THE DEMOCRACY UTTERLY DISCLAIM. They recognise no principle which tends to interfere with the public prosperity and enterprise of the people, the rights of property, or the public faith. It is not the object or design of the Democratic party, to destroy any institutions, legally and honestly established for the general good, but to foster and protect them—NOT TO AGGRAVATE THE ONEROUS BURDENS OF THE PEOPLE, BY SWEEPING FROM EXISTENCE THE BANKING INSTITUTIONS, BUT TO EFFECT THAT SALUTARY REFORM, NOW IMPERIOUSLY DEMANDED BY THE INTERESTS AS WELL OF THE BANKS AS THE PEOPLE. If the Democratic party were the destroyers, the agrarians and levellers, as their opponents affect to believe them to be, Pennsylvania could not now boast of the dense population, the immense wealth, the magnificent improvements, and the boundless resources, which have been nursed into maturity under Democratic Administrations for the last thirty years. During that time, the same principles were entertained by the Democratic party, that now are—the same doctrines advocated and the same policy pursued, and Pennsylvania, UNDER THE BENIGN INFLUENCE OF THESE PRINCIPLES, DOCTRINES, AND POLICY, has arisen to such eminence and importance among her sisters of the Union, as to be justly entitled to the distinguished appellation of "The Keystone State."

This (continued Mr. L.) is the true doctrine of the Democratic party, so far as I have any knowledge on the subject.

I beg leave also to read an extract from an address issued by a committee of members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, in July, 1838, which says:

"It is alleged that this measure is part of a scheme to force on the country a currency purely metallic. This is unfounded. A specie currency for the ordinary daily transactions of life, and such a specie basis for paper as will always ensure its convertibility into specie, when required by the holders, is what is contended for, and such is the only tendency and real design of the measure proposed, so far as the banks are concerned. A purely metallic currency is no part of the Independent Treasury plan, as proposed by the Administration, and supported by its friends. In fine, with the exception of a very small number, who are in favor of depositing the public money specially in banks, the question at issue between us, and those who favor a deposite in the banks, may be stated thus: THEY wish to have the public money deposited in banks, not to be kept by them, but to be lent out for private uses. WE are opposed to lending out the public money for private uses; and, effectually to prevent it, are in favor of having it kept by public officers, under heavy bonds and securities not to use it, or suffer it to be used for any private purpose whatsoever, and to pay it out only in pursuance of appropriations made by law, as prescribed in the Constitution."

Mr. L. continued: It will be recollected that these banks are under the influence of their own States, and it is not the design of this measure to interfere injuriously with them. But if it is to have any effect at all, it is to induce the banks to discount and issue paper upon the real basis on which they profess to issue it; that is to say, gold and silver; and in this connection I beg to read a passage from the message of the President:"

"In a country so commercial as ours, banks in some form will probably always exist; but this serves only to render it the more incumbent on us, notwithstanding the discouragements of the past, to strive in our respective stations to mitigate the evils they produce—to take from them, as rapidly as the obligations of public faith, and a careful consideration of the immediate interests of the community will permit, the unjust character of monopolies; to check, so far as may be practicable by prudent legislation, those temptations of interest, and those opportunities for their dangerous indulgence, which beset them on every side, and to confine them strictly to the performance of their paramount duty, that of aiding the operations of commerce, rather than consulting their own exclusive advantage.

Mr. L. continued: Another objection raised against this bill is, that it contemplates one currency for the people and another for the Government. I would not have referred to this objection if it had not been introduced into a very able report made by my colleague [Mr. SERGEANT] in the year 1838, and which was sent forth together with another report on the same subject made in behalf of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means by its then chairman [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] It may be dullness on my part, but I cannot see wherein the force of this objection lies. One currency for the Government and another for the people! How is this? How can you separate the Government from the people? How can you separate the currency, which you use for your public business, in receiving and paying out the public revenue, from the business affairs of the people? Members of Congress receive their money in gold and silver. Do they not pay it out to the people of the District every day or week; and does it not enter into the circulation of the District? Do we not pay it out in the regular course of business? I cannot see how this argument is supported; I cannot see how gentlemen make out that the people are to have one currency, and the Government another; because the business of the Government, and the business of the people ramify into, and are intimately blended with, each other.

I beg leave here to advert to a letter which I happened to pick up yesterday, written by our veneral ex-President, General Jackson, in answer to a letter addressed to him by a committee of the Ohio Legislature. I regard the sentiments contained in this letter as those of one speaking, as it were, from the dead. He cannot be supposed to have any personal interest in these great measures which now agitate the country—I mean any interest beyond that natural to a man whose life and services have been devoted to his country—who has served her in peace and in war—who has twice been called to preside over her councils, and who, in his old age, has sought that retirement most congenial to his feelings and wishes. He holds the following language:

"It is particularly gratifying to me, gentlemen, to be assured by your Legislature that the grounds on which I rested my opposition to the encroachments of the money power are regarded with favor by the people of Ohio. The dangers of that power, now more evident, because they are brought closer to the observation and business concerns of all classes of our citizens, form in my judgment the only cloud in our political horizon. In all other aspects the influences adverse to the genius of our institutions seem to have yielded to the demands of the people, and such I doubt not, will be the case with those wielded by the money power as soon as the public voice has another opportunity of acting upon them. All that we have to do on this subject, is to persevere a little longer, maintaining the doctrines of the Constitution and the suggestions of common sense. We know that our fathers who framed the Constitution gave to Congress no power to charter a bank, and we cannot err, therefore, in saying that if our Government had never departed from their example, we would have had none of the evils which now afflict us in consequence of bank suspensions, and an irredeemable paper currency. We know that if the Government deposited none of the money of the people with banks, these institutions would have no power to endanger the safety of the public treasure, or to influence, improperly, questions of public policy. We know that banks do not make money, but only circulate their paper emissions, which must be good or bad according to their capacity to redeem them with specie; and hence that there can be no confidence in them as long as they maintain the right to suspend specie payments at pleasure.

"From such truths, it appears to me to be self-evident, that there is now no relief for the people but in the adoption of the Independent Treasury, recommended by the present administration of the General Government. By this plan, the financial operations of the Treasury will be simplified, and the people will have the strongest guarantee that the money which is raised from them by taxation will be applied according to the requirements of the Constitution. If, in addition to this reform in our financial system, Congress would, at the same time, pass a general bankrupt law, by which the banks which are now in existence, or may be hereafter chartered by the States, would be bound to make an equitable distribution of their effects to their creditors when they refuse to redeem their notes with specie, it cannot be doubted that there would be an end to the evils of a depreciated paper currency. These measures being adopted, but little time would be requisite to enable those banking institutions, which are sound, to regain the public confidence; and the labor of the country, the arming, manufacturing, and mechanic interests, would soon revive—that credit system which is based on real capital, and which goes hand in hand with the labor and enterprise of our citizens, would be enlarged, not diminished, by the operation of these measures."

Mr. L. continued. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks which I have made on this measure, I have endeavored to be as practical as possible. I cannot see in it any thing of the dangerous tendency, and the ruinous and destructive properties, which gentlemen of the Opposition attribute to it; but I do see in it a proposition and a means by which this Government can place itself in a condition where it may have its own money in its own hands, and by which, in case of war or emergency, it may cease to be dependent upon banking institutions. Congress has power to declare war, to appropriate money, and to do many other acts; yet we have seen that we are dependent upon the creatures of State legislation, and upon the creatures of our own raising, for the very money which we thus appropriate, even when needed in time of war. Congress has the honor, the dignity, the fame, and the glory of the country in its hands. How can they be maintained without money? If I were now talking to plain men, I should say, is it not better to have your own money in your own desk, or even in your own old stocking, that it may be within reach when you want it, rather than to loan it to your neighbor, that he may speculate upon it?

This, sir, is the National Independent Treasury. I have done.

SPEECH OF MR. STRONG,

OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, June 8th, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. STRONG said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am in favor of the bill now under consideration. I shall vote for it, and should content myself with giving a silent vote in its support, but for certain resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State I have the honor, in part, to represent, a copy of which has been presented to the House, and is now lying upon its table. I also have a copy of the resolutions, sent to me by the Executive of my State. I desire, sir, that they may be read.

The resolutions were read by the CLERK, and are as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
In Assembly, January 30, 1840.

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) that the people of the State of New York, through their Legislature, do solemnly and earnestly protest against the bill recently, and for the fourth time, reported in the Senate of the United States by a Senator from this State, commonly known as the Independent Treasury bill, and against any scheme on the part of the Federal Government whereby the revenues of that Government shall be required to be collected in specie alone, or in any other medium than the common currency of the country, at all times convertible into coin, or by which those revenues shall be placed in the custody of agents appointed by, and responsible only to the Executive of the United States; and which, as the prominent leading measure and political test of the General Government, has been thrice directly submitted to the people of this State, and by them as often rejected and entirely repudiated, as being adverse to the best interests of our country; as establishing practically one currency for the Government, and another and a different currency for the people; as being an untried experiment on the finances of the country, requiring specie alone in the payment of all debts to the Government, and enabling it thereby to control and destroy the currency created by the States, and by the withdrawal and hoarding of millions of gold and silver, to affect injuriously all our branches of industry, and to take from the farmer, the merchant and the mechanic, the value of his products and the price of his labor; as augmenting and establishing, to a most dangerous extent, the patronage and influence of the General Government; and as being hostile to the fundamental maxims of free government, which withhold from the Executive all control over the public treasure, as pregnant with danger to the business, the credit, the prosperity and liberties of the people.

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That in the judment of this Legislature the reiterated recommendation of the aforesaid scheme of the President of the United States, seconded, as it has been, by the persevering efforts of a Senator of this State, in direct opposition to the expressed will of his constituents to procure its adoption, have deeply alarmed the people of this State, and furnish at this time a prominent obstacle to the prosperity of the country; and that the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States will conform their acts and votes to the expressed will and best interests of their constituents, by steadily and faithfully opposing the measure aforesaid; and that any Senator or Representative who shall persist in advocating the said project, and in urging its adoption will misrepresent the views, wishes and interests of his constituents, and his conduct will merit and receive our unqualified disapprobation.

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That his Excellency the Governor be requested to transmit to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, a copy of the foregoing resolutions, with a request to present the same to both Houses of Congress.

By order.
J. P. PRINDLE, Clerk.

IN SENATE. Febuary 12, 1840.

Resolved, That the Senate do concur with the Assembly in their said resolutions.

By order:
SAMUEL G. ANDREWS, Clerk.

STATE OF NEW YORK, EXECUTIVE DEP'T,
Albany, February 17, 1840.

SIR; I have the honor to transmit you a copy of certain resolutions of the Senate and Assembly of this State, in relation to the bill commonly known as the Independent Treasury bill.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

The Hon. THERON R. STRONG,
House of Representatives.

I feel it due to myself and my constituents, Mr. Chairman, that I should, before giving my vote for this bill, state briefly the views I entertain of these resolutions, and some of the reasons which have influenced me in determining to act in opposition to them. Perhaps, also, it is but respectful to my State, that I should thus notice them, and not go counter to them in silence. It is for the purpose of presenting these views and reasons, that I have risen—not to reply to any remarks of gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate.

I will state, in the outset, that I do not question the right of a State Legislature to pass resolutions instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives, of the State in Congress, to pursue any particular course in relation to their official duties. On the contrary, I concede it in its fullest extent. It is a right which has often been exercised by the party of which I am proud to be a member, and I believe it to be an important and valuable one. I hold it to be the duty of Senators, receiving such instructions, to obey or resign, and of Representatives to give to such requests a respectful and careful consideration. To create such an obligation on the part of Senators, however, it is requisite that the instructions should be plain and definite—that they should direct the course to be pursued, and exclude all discretion in regard to it—that they should be expressed, and not left to be implied from the expression of an opinion.

It requires, Mr. Chairman, but a cursory examination of the resolutions in question, to satisfy any one that they are of an anomalous character. They are not in the form of instructions, advice, or request, and yet they possess some of the ingredients of each. They do not profess to instruct or direct any one—they do not directly, and in terms, offer advice—they make no express request—and yet, classing Senators and Representatives together, they declare that those Senators and Representatives will "conform their acts and votes to the expressed will and best interests of their constituents," by opposing the Independent Treasury bill, and that any one of them who shall support it, will "misrepresent the views, wishes, and interests, of his constituents, and his conduct will merit and receive the unqualified disapprobation of the Legislature."

That they ought not to be regarded as instructions, is quite evident. It appears from the fact, that the language employed is applied equally to Senators and Representatives; that Representatives are coupled with Senators throughout; and that if they are to be considered as instructions at all, they are as much so to one as the other. Now I believe that no political party has ever claimed for a State Legislature the right to instruct Representatives. No individual of any party, however ultra, has, so far as I have any knowledge, ever made any such claim. I am prepared to believe that a majority of the Legislature which passed these resolutions, would go as far as any man or body of men in setting up new and extraordinary pretensions; but such a claim would, in my judgment, be too ridiculous even for them to assert.

There is another prominent reason, sir, why they should not be allowed such a character. It is well known that the political party in New York now in power in that State had repudiated the doctrine of instructions, and for a long period warred against it. Now, if the majority of the Legislature who belong to that political party, intended to change their ground on this subject; if the circumstance of their party being in the ascendancy out of the way at present of being affected by the doctrine, and in a situation to apply it to others, had brought it into favor with them, and determined them to exercise it, it was their duty to come out boldly, and use the language usually employed in giving instructions; language which could leave no doubt as to their intentions. They should not be permitted to have the benefit of the doctrine without taking a position which would compel them to submit to it when it would cut the other way "to partake of the draught when returned to their own lips."

It seems equally manifest that these resolutions cannot be considered as the simple advice or request of the Legislature. The threat which they embrace of the "unqualified disapprobation" of that body upon the conduct of any Senator or Representative, who shall act in opposition to them, is entirely inconsistent with such an idea. It is an interference with that freedom of thought and judgment and action which belongs to a person to whom mere advice is given, or of whom a simple request is made. It appears to imply an assumption of right to control the conduct of both Senators and Representatives. It would seem to claim the entire surrender of their discretion. Nothing short of conforming their acts and votes to the views expressed in the resolutions, can save their conduct from the penalty denounced.

Further search, then, must be made to ascertain their true character. But I shall not pursue the examination. I shall leave it to those who may be more curious on the subject than myself. The remarks I have made are sufficient to show that the resolutions are as I have characterized them—anomalous; that they are entirely novel in their form and combination. I can account for it only from the fact that a majority of the Legislature is composed politically of the most opposite, discordant, and heterogeneous materials—or from a desire on their part to have them Janus-faced—susceptible of two constructions—one which might drive from the Senate a distinguished Senator; another which might be applied in future time to prevent the resolutions operating against them.

"Black spirits and white—

A few words more, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the threat contained in the resolutions. Sir, as one of those for whom it was intended, I have to say, that, for me, it has no terrors. Denying authority in the Legislature to direct my official conduct, admitting no accountability to that body for the manner in which I discharge my duties here, I do not regard it. It can exert no influence over my representative course. I trust I am, and shall, at all times be, actuated in that course by different and higher motives than a regard to the approbation or disapprobation of a body to whose jurisdiction I am not subject. I shall consult the wishes of the electors of my district—my constituents—those who have a right to instruct me, and be governed by them so far as I understand them. Their wishes in regard to the measure against which these resolutions are directed, are known to me. They were declared in my election, and they remain unchanged. They are directly the reverse of what is asserted in the resolutions. In the very act of my election, I was instructed to support the Independent Treasury bill, and those instructions have not been modified or recalled. I am happy that my own feelings and opinions accord with those instructions. I shall take pride in voting for that bill. I shall regard it as a proud honor to give my vote as a member of this body in favor of that great measure of reform. Let the threat be executed. Let legislative censure be bestowed upon me in the most formal and imposing manner, I shall have the consciousness of having done what I believed to be my duty—of having obeyed the will of my constituents. They, sir, will do me justice.

There is another consideration, Mr. Chairman, calculated to prevent that threat from inspiring any particular alarm. Unless I mistake the signs of the times, those from whom it emanated—I refer to the Federal majority in the Legislature—are distined soon to find themselves visited with a "disapprobation" altogether more potent and fearful than that which they hold up in these resolutions. Their conduct the past winter, the "fantastic tricks" which they, giddy and intoxicated with power, have played off, are now under review by their masters, the people of the Empire State, and undergoing a severe and careful scrutiny. Already murmurs of dissatisfaction are heard giving warning as to the sentence. "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting," I venture to predict, will, in November next, fall upon their astonished ears—their "little brief authority" will then be taken from them, and their disapprobation rendered impotent to harm.

Still another reason exists, sir, why I can look upon this threat without apprehension. Since the commencement of the present session of Congress, I, and several of my colleagues, have, in our representative capacity, already been formally censured by those from whom it proceeded. And, sir, for what? For having given our votes for a measure adopted by this House upon the motion of one of their political friends, and by the aid of the votes of a large proportion of their political friends in this body. Now, sir, if our support of that measure was wrong, the support of it by their political friends was equally wrong. If we were deserving of censure, their political friends were equally deserving of censure—both were governed by the same principle, and by principle the course of both must be judged. And yet we see no coldness, no estrangement between them and those friends—the most kind and friendly feelings in relation to each other exist on both sides, and all are now intimately and harmoniously associated in a desperate and death-like struggle for power, and in support of one and the same candidate for the highest office in the nation. What other conclusion can be drawn, than that their censure was insincere and hypocritical, and fulminated for political purposes? And what was the obnoxious measure? It was the incorporating into the rules of the House of a provision that Abolition petitions shall not be entertained—a provision in no respect conflicting with any part of the Constitution—perfectly just in itself—and imperiously demanded by a regard to the rights of a large portion of the people—the peace of the country and the safety and integrity of the Union.

[Here the Chairman remarked that it was not in order to discuss that subject.]

Mr. S. said, I do not propose, sir, at this time, to go into a defence of my vote for that measure, but I will, with the permission of the House, read an extract from an Opposition print in the city of New York, pertinent to the subject, and presenting some interesting views of the political associates of that print, in relation to it. It is a mirror in which many gentlemen may "see themselves as others see them."

[Objection being made, Mr. S. said he would not press the request.

The extract proposed to be read is from an article in the New York Evening Star, of February 12, 1840, in relation to the resolutions of censure introduced into the New York Legislature by Mr. John A. King, and is as follows:

Madame Roland, when about to be guillotined by the Jacobites in Paris, exclaimed, "Oh, Liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name." Precisely is this the case with political Abolitionists. Men who, during the late war with England, refused to raise a finger in defence of their native land, or drive the invader from the soil—who gloried in our defeats, and had conscientious scruples about rejoicing for our victories, are suddenly converted into warm friends of liberty, and pour out lamentations for the slavery of the colored race, are ready to trample on the Constitution of their country in their fierce and new born zeal for liberty. How sincere they are, we will not waste a moment to examine, knowing full well that the enemies of the South in 1798 and in 1812, are about the same persons who are now crying out for immediate emancipation.

They have got, however, a new hobby to ride; a new clap-trap to gull the ignorant and keep up the excitement. The sacred right of petition has been violated; and knowing full well that the right of petition is one of that men of all parties will forever maintain, they will pull the various cords, and run over the strings to make it harmonize with their ultimate object. They will offer resolutions of censure—they will shout the "North betrayed"—they will leave the blacks to their fate for a while to harp upon the newly discovered note, "the sacred right of petition." What is a petition? A legal and proper request couched in respectful language, and made by the people to their Representatives for the passage of special or general laws. These embrace every subject connected with the rights of the citizen and the interest of the country, and the reception of such petions by Congress, have never been, nor ever will be, refused or rejected. But we ask, is there not a class, or character of petitions, which should not be presented or received by Congress? Assuredly there are many such of an offensive character—a hundred subjects may be named on which Congress might be memorialized, which memorials could not be either received, read, or referred to any committee. The Abolition petitions, concerning which this new movement is made, are not petitions at all; they do not partake of the legal character, or personal claims, or general interest, belonging to a legitimate class of petitions. They are papers signed by individuals asking Congress in express terms to violate the Constitution which they have sworn to support. They are papers which insult the loyalty of the members to whom they are addressed; they ask Congress in effect to invade the rights of the South as guarantied by the Constitution; they ask Congress to sow the seeds of a servile war in the South; in short, they, in effect, ask of Congress to dissolve the Union at once. These are incendiary, revolutionary documents, thrown into Congress to effect an illegal purpose, and not petitions of a just, legal or national character; therefore, Congress, in refusing to receive them, do not even remotely invade the sacred right of petition.

Political Abolition and political Antimasonry will consolidate to form the nucleus of a party to govern the country. Piety and fanaticism may preach up Abolition—Peter the Hermit may spring up on all sides for crusaders in favor of the Southern slaves, who are more happy and comfortable than thousands of free Africans in the North—but political power will be the end of all their actions.

Ex-President Adams, who is dead in favor of receiving Abolition petitions, and dead against Abolition itself—who ducks with one hand, and rubs dry with the other, in a recent letter makes the following remarks:

"My involuntary anticipations of the future have been, that slavery will first effect a dissolution of the Union, and that, as a natural consequence of that event, war will abolish slavery, and terminate in a mongrel breed of half blood European and African race—a mulatto nation, which will cover the Southern half of this country from North Carolina to Mexico."

A beautiful picture of the future for Abolitionists to contemplate—division of the Union to begin with, an event deplorable to every friend of Liberty throughout the world—the annihilation of free government, and the downfall of the last of the Republics, and yet as certain to happen as the sun rises, unless Abolition is put down, and put down by the strong hand of the North itself. Then war—the North against the South—then a servile war, in which the North arms the Southern slaves to destroy their masters, and finally the triumph of a black or mulatto Government, like the despotism of Hayti.

These are the forebodings of Mr. Adams, a thinking man, too, which he shadows out for the future as the fruits of Abolition. Let the North ponder on it seriously, deeply, like men, honest men, not fanatics, and they will soon dispose of the incendiary resolutions offered in the Assembly by John A. King.

Mr. S. would add: The "incendiary resolutions" were soon disposed of, but in a manner very different from that indicated in this extract. "Political Abolition and political Antimasonry," it seems, did "consolidate," and having framed the resolutions to suit their purpose, forced them through both branches of the Legislature. The censure designed to be conveyed, however, has fallen pointless and harmless at our feet, and there is no reason to apprehend any thing more serious from any "disapprobation" which they may bestow upon us hereafter for any act in the honest discharge of our official trusts.

If it shall be said that some of the Democrats of the New York Legislature voted for the "incendiary resolutions," the following confession of a "Whig" member of the Legislature, a correspondent of the New York Evening Star, will explain the reason:

"ALBANY, Feb. 7, 1840.

"I voted for the Abolition resolutions, as you call them; and the fact is, our Whig leader in the Assembly, Mr. John A. King! left me no alternative. His resolutions, concocted by the worthy trio here, were the essence of cunning and trickery: one part was in favor of the right of petition, and the other in favor of receiving Abolition petitions; they would allow of no division, and we had to swallow the whole. An honest, patriotic, and straightforward politician, who felt that the right of petition, and a most sacred right it is, was violated, would have offered a resolution defending that right alone, without mixing it with any other matter, and it would have passed unanimously, but, in an unfair and unmanly manner, they endorsed the Abolitionists in the same resolution that they sustained the right of petition, and then presented the dose, all or nothing; and those few who resisted were gazetted as traitors in the State paper. We cannot get on with this kind of legislation, and there will be a flare-up shortly, or other men must take the lead."]

Mr. S. resumed. In regard to the objections to the Independent Treasury bill, specified in the resolutions in question, I have to say, Mr. Chairman, that they are not new—that they are the common objections made to the measure by Federal prints and Federal electioneerers throughout the country. I do not propose to go into a minute and extended examination of them, but will content myself with submitting a few general remarks in relation to each. Some of them I regret to see treated with the respect they are, by allowing them a place in the resolutions. "One currency for the Government, and another and a different currency for the people," which it is alleged this bill would establish practically, is in the nature of things impossible. The people in this country are their own governors—they govern themselves; all the institutions and laws of the country are founded on their will, and are under their control. They carry on the operations of Government through their agents or servants, who are themselves part of the people, and accountable to the people for their conduct. The selection of an individual as a servant or agent does not separate him from the people, but he remains one of them as before. Whatever provision is made or measure adopted in respect to the Government, is made or adopted for the people. It is impossible, therefore, to make such a distinction as the objection implies, while the people continue free. The idea of such a distinction can only exist in the minds of those deeply imbued with the sentiments of Hamilton and the old Federal party—who believed that the British Government formed the best model the world ever produced—that all communities divide themselves into the few and the many—the first are the rich and the well-born, the others the mass of the people—that there should be an aristocracy to control the democracy; and that a National Bank was desirable as a "political machine." It was to the prevalence of such sentiments among the majority of the Legislature, I fear, that the introduction of the objection I am now noticing is to be attributed. Again, sir: the currency to which this bill looks, is the currency of the Constitution. Ought not that not to be the currency in the moneyed transactions of the Government? Is it wise and patriotic in the opponents of this bill to object that it requires the use of the constitutional currency in such transactions? Are they in favor of the collection and disbursement of the revenue in an inferior, currency? Do they not, by making the objection, admit that the paper currency which prevails among the people in their ordinary business operations, is inferior? And would they not evince a more enlightened and lofty patriotism by coming forward and aiding us here and in the States to improve this inferior currency—to bring it up as nearly as may be to the constitutional standard? Another sufficient answer to the objection is to be found in the fact, that the revenues of the Government must, under the operation of the bill, be paid out among the people in the same currency in which they are received, and that so far as the bill interferes with the currency it establishes the same for all.

But the measure is alarming, as being an "untried experiment on the finances of the country." Without stopping to comment on the singular fact that this objection is made by the friends of an Administration that but a short time since recommended an "untried" experiment on the finances of the State of New York, by the creation of a debt of $40,000,000 for internal improvements, I would ask, if they are opposed to an "untried" experiment for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, what measure are they in favor of for that purpose? Are they in favor of the tried experiment of making use of the State banks, and the introduction of an irredeemable shinplaster currency into the moneyed operations of the Government? Would they make use of the State banks in their present sickly and distressed condition, even as a "half-way house," to another measure? Are they in favor of the tried experiment of a National Bank—an institution which Mr. Jefferson characterized, (and experience has proved very justly,) as of the most deadly hostility to the Constitution and liberty. Ay, that is the Federal panacea for the financial disorders of the country. To such an institution is their attention directed. It is one great end and aim of their exertions. Indications to this effect are often furnished by their public prints. They are also frequently discovered in this Hall. In March last, resolutions were presented to the House by an honorable gentleman from the State of Kentucky, standing high in the Opposition ranks, [Mr. POPE,] declaring "that it is necessary and proper to establish a National Bank, with a capital of seventy millions of dollars," &c. One of the gentlemen from Connecticut, who addressed the House a few days since, [Mr. BROCKWAY,] undertook to show that a National Bank might be created under the Constitution. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE,] in his speech on Friday last, if I understood him correctly, expressed the opinion that the people would soon call for such an institution. These and other similar indications, plainly show that a National Bank is one grand object of the efforts of the Opposition. Give that party the ascendancy in the nation, and depend upon it a fifty million or seventy million monster would immediately be saddled upon the people. Once established, and it would be found useful, and be used as a "political machine;" and then, without the miraculous interposition of Providence, we might bid farewell to American liberty. A gigantic moneyed power would be "lord of the ascendant."

Not less unsound and unfounded, so far as any injurious effect is concerned, is the objection, that "requiring specie alone in the payment of all debts to the Government," will enable it "thereby to control and destroy the currency created by the States." The utmost influence such a requisition can exert upon the currency of the States, will be to check, to some extent, overaction; it cannot be made to destroy that currency, nor any farther to control it. So far as it will exert such an influence —so far as it will restrain extravagant expansions, which, by ministering to a spirit of speculation and wild extravagance, are full of evil to the country—it will be beneficial. I wish that a greater effect might be expected from it in this particular—that it might be looked to as an effectual preventive of excessive paper issues—I should, if possible, be still more strongly in favor of it.

The objection that the specie clause will enable the Government, "by the withdrawal and hoarding of millions of gold and silver to affect injuriously all our branches of industry, and to take from the farmer, the merchant, and the mechanic, the value of his products, and the price of his labor," is very readily answered. In the first place, the measure, of which this clause forms a part, contemplates that the revenues of the Government shall be arranged on a scale as nearly as may be to the wants of the Government economically administered, leaving no surplus to "withdraw" or "hoard." In the next place, the amount of revenue will at all times be under the control of the people, through their Representatives in Congress. Again: "all our branches of industry" will be more benefited, and the interest of "the farmer, the merchant, and the mechanic" better promoted by this measure than under any "tried" system of finance. It is, in fact, particularly calculated to benefit the industry of the country, and the laboring classes, and in that respect differs widely from the "tried" bank systems, which were particularly calculated to benefit speculators and all who, too indolent or too proud to labor, sought "to get a living by their wits," to the injury of the working portion of society. Stability and uniformity are essential to the interests of the laboring man, and to the prosperity of regular business, and upon these the Independent Treasury system will exert a favorable influence. The influence of the bank systems was directly the reverse. Fluctuation and change in the business operations of the country, and a host of consequent evils, were their legitimate fruits.

There is no ground for the opinion that this measure will "augment and establish, to a most dangerous extent, the patronage and influence of the General Government." The only increase of patronage it will produce, will be the power of the President to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, four officers, to be denominated receivers general of public money, to be located, one at New York, one at Boston, one at Charleston, and the other at St. Louis, and the only influence of any moment it will confer, will be that arising from this patronage. These officers are to give adequate security for the performance of their duties in regard to the public moneys, and to have no power to loan or use a dollar of them. Who can discover any danger in this patronage and influence? What comparison will the system bear in this respect to the "tried" bank systems, which allowed of the use of the public funds, and under which the General Government possessed as great control over those funds as this proposes to confer upon it. Sir, it is calculated to diminish the patronage and influence of the Government, and this is one of its leading recommendations. The pretence that the reverse would be the case, is sheer humbug.

Equally groundless is all alarm at the "control over the public treasure," which, it is said, this measure will allow the Executive. In this respect it will introduce no change. This treasure will be, as it now is, under the entire control of Congress. No portion of it can be drawn from the Treasury, without an appropriation by law. Congress must give the authority before a dollar can be paid out, either to the President or any other officer or individual, for any purpose whatever. The idea that the whole revenue of the country will, by the provisions of this bill, be subject to the control of the Executive, which it has been attempted by the opponents of the measure to produce, is a mere bugbear; and I regret that it should have frightened the dominant party in the Legislature of my State.

The assertion in the resolutions that the proposed Independent Treasury system has been "thrice directly submitted to the people of the State of New York, and by them as often rejected, and entirely repudiated," is, in my judgment, clearly erroneous. The Federal party there has not dared, at any election since the measure was brought forward, to rest itself mainly upon the ground of hostility to it, but has each time mingled with it other matters, by which means a full and fair expression in relation to it has been prevented. While those who supported the Administration might fairly be regarded as in favor of it—it being the great and leading measure of the Administration—numbers doubtless voted with the Opposition upon other grounds than hostility to it. I do not doubt that a majority of the people of the Empire State are in favor of the project. There, as elsewhere, it has been steadily gaining ground ever since it was presented for consideration. But if it were true that the people of that State have thrice rejected and entirely repudiated the measure, with what propriety could the Federal party object on that account to a continued recommendation and support of it, while they are seeking, in opposition to the oft repeated expression of the will of the people, the establishment of a National Bank, and to give ascendency to the doctrine of a latitudinous construction of the Constitution, and other kindred Federal doctrines?

I will now, Mr. Chairman, advert very briefly to a few affirmative considerations, which have commended the Independent Treasury bill to my approbation.

The first which I will mention is, that the system it proposes is authorized by the Constitution. Upon this point, no doubt can be entertained. This I regard as no ordinary merit, in view of the National Bank system, for the administration of the finances, which has prevailed in times past, and which is the only alternative to the one now proposed—a system which I hold to be entirely unwarranted by the Constitution—which Congress has not, and never had, the power to establish. I shall not enlarge upon this topic, it having been fully discussed before the country of late years, and will only remark further in relation to it, that an adherence to our great charter is indispensable to the perpetuity of our liberties. It is highly desirable also to avoid, as far as possible, all legislation of a questionable authority under it.

Another recommendation of the bill is, that it provides for more full and adequate security of the public moneys than has been required under any former system, or than any system allowing of the use of the public treasure would admit of—a security which, aided by a law such as is proposed by the bill from the Senate, "more effectually to secure public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters," which the friends of the Independent Treasury system desire to have in operation in connection with it, would, it is believed, be as full and effectual as it is possible to devise. Under such safeguards, no Swartwout defalcations could be committed, and few, if any, losses of the public moneys would occur. Those moneys would be safely kept and sacredly appropriated.

Again: the plan it embraces is simple, free from the complicated machinery of the bank systems, easy of comprehension, and, in these respects, well suited to a Republican Government. In such a Government, simplicity should be studied in legislation; every measure should be made plain to the understandings of the people. This consideration is especially entitled to weight in framing a system for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the revenues of the country. That system, above all others, should be such that the people may easily understand it, and readily perceive its operation. It is important in order to the correction of any errors in it which may exist, and to the detection of abuses in its administration. I regard it as an important circumstance in favor of the plan now proposed, that it possesses all requisite plainness.

But the crowning consideration in favor of this bill is, that it proposes an independent system—a system whereby, if adopted, the moneys of the Government will be under the control of the officers of the Government, and at all times on hand and ready for Government purposes—whereby, also, an entire separation will be effected between the Government and the banks, and the numerous evils resulting from their connection, which have operated as a blight and mildew upon the prosperity of the country, will be removed. It is this that entitles it, in an especial degree, to the appellation of a reform measure. Such it truly is. To appreciate the magnitude of the reform it seeks to accomplish, it is only necessary to trace, for a brief period past, the operations of the financial systems of this Government, which have prevailed. Such an examination must satisfy any candid mind that, under those systems, the Government has been dependent upon the banks—that the banks might, at their pleasure, seriously embarrass, if not actually bring to a stand, its operations. A dependence like this is a national degradation—a deep and damning degradation in view of the disregard of all legal and moral and honorable obligation, which has marked the conduct of those institutions (with a few honorable exceptions) of late years; and it is also highly dangerous to the liberties of the country. It will also appear, from such a survey, that those systems exerted a powerful influence in producing those unreasonable bank expansions which have occurred in this country at brief intervals, and which, necessarily followed by violent contractions, have produced such wide spread distress and desolation. By the use of the public treasure, the banks were excited to overaction—overaction on their part aroused an "unregulated spirit of speculation" in the community—a large portion of the people were led to embark in the most visionary and ridiculous enterprises for accumulating property; and high apparent prosperity prevailed throughout the land. At length the banks were called on to fulfil their engagements—the process of contraction commenced—the bubble burst, and little remained of the fruits of speculation, save debt, embarrassment, distress, and ruin. This is but a brief outline of a bank expansion and contraction. They have been so frequent, however, that the experience of every man will enable him to fill up the picture. Perhaps it is impossible to prevent them entirely, while banks exist, but the system proposed will, if adopted, remove one great cause of them, and operate as an important check against their occurrence.

There are other great evils inseparable from a connection between the Government and the banks, rendered plain and palpable by experience, which the passage of this bill would abolish. There are, also, other advantages, than those to which I have referred, to be anticipated from the adoption of the proposed system. I will not take time to go into an enumeration of them. I have already said as much as I desired to in justification of my determination to act in oppisition to the resolutions upon which I have commented, and of the vote I shall give for this bill. The purpose for which I rose is answered.

Permit me, however, Mr. Chairman, before I resume my seat, to say a word as to the prospects of this bill, and to allude briefly to one or two reflections therewith connected. Sir, this bill is soon to become a law. Within a month from this time—I trust within half that period—the Independent Treasury plan will be incorporated into our political system. The people have willed it; they have declared, in language not to be misunderstood, that their Government "of right ought to be," and shall be, independent of banks and the moneyed power; and a majority of this body is ready to carry their will into effect, and anxious for the final vote. Nothing but the last words and dying struggles of its opponents delays its triumph. And what a triumph it will be! Go back to the first recommendation of it; see what impression the project made at first upon the public mind; trace its progress onward; mark the hostility, the clamor, the infinite variety and extreme severity of war it has encountered. Never was a measure more bitterly and violently opposed. The whole artillery of the aristocracy, and the moneyed power, has been brought to bear against it. Yet it has vanquished all. The truth of its principles has led it forward, "conquering and to conquer," until nothing remains to complete its success but the declaration of its victory.

In this triumph the great Democratic doctrine of the honesty of the people, and their capacity for self-government, will also triumph. The simpl truths of the measure have won their convictions, and led them to embrace it, in opposition to every form of misrepresentation—in opposition to the "subtle poison" of the moneyed interest; and notwithstanding the severest pecuniary pressure and distress produced by acting upon the odious and abominable Federal doctrine, that "it is not by argument, but by sufferings, that conviction is to be forced upon the minds of the people." It has been a severe test of their integrity and capacity, but in proportion to its severity will be the glory of the triumph.

This lesson throws a broad and strong light on the future. The view it affords is full of encouragement to the friends of popular liberty. It shows them that the people will act honestly and intelligently; that they will treat the "log cabin and hard cider" flummeries and fooleries of the Opposition with the scorn and the contempt they merit. It presents to their admiring gaze the entire and total rout and overthrow in the coming contest of the combined factions of Abolitionism, Conservatism, politicai Antimasonry, and Federalism, and the brilliant victory of Van Buren and Democracy.

IN SENATE, THURSDAY, May 7, 1840.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted the following report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 24th April.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
May 4, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to submit this report, in compliance with the following resolution, passed by the Senate on the 24th ult:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to the Senate the aggregate amount of all expenditures or payments of every kind from the Treasury in each year, from 1824 to 1839 inclusive, in one column, and in another column for each year the aggregate amount, independent of the payments on account of the public debt, whether funded or unfunded, and in a third column, the aggregate amount for permanent and ordinary purposes, excluding payments on account of objects either extraordinary or temporary; such as the public debt, trust funds and indemnities, claims of States for war debts or 3 per cents on lands sold, occasional donations in money to objects in the District of Columbia or otherwise, survey of the coast, taking the census, duties refunded, the Exploring expedition, and materials collected for the gradual improvement of the navy, durable public buildings of all kinds, bridges and fortifications, all roads, canals, breakwaters, and improvements in rivers and harbors, arming militia and forts, all pensions except those to invalids, and the purchases of title to lands from Indians, the removal of Indians, and their wars, with such other payments as may have been made in those years for property lost or injuries committed during any hostilities."

The resolution was on the same day referred to the Register of the Treasury, with instructions to prepare a tabular statement, containing the information desired in three separate columns. It is hereto annexed, marked A.

He was requested, also, to prepare another statement, showing the specific sum which had been deducted each year on account of each item mentioned in the resolution as either extraordinary or temporary.

Believing that this would be highly useful, as showing the details on which the general results in the third column of the first statement rest, and as embracing many statistical facts, possessing in themselves much interest, I have annexed it, marked B.

Unless some accidental omission or other error has occurred, these two statements will present all the information desired by the resolution.

With high respect,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To Hon. RICH. M. JOHNSON,
Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

T. L. SMITH, Register.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Register's Office, May 4, 1840.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the letter of the Secretary, and the tables, were ordered to be printed

Mr. B. then rose to make another motion, and that was, to print an extra number of these papers. He proposed to give his reasons for the motion, and for that purpose, asked that the papers should be sent to him, (which was done;) and Mr. B. went on to say that his object was to spread before the country, in an authentic form, the full view of all the Government expenses for a series of years past, going back as far as Mr. Monroe's administration; and thereby enabling every citizen, in every part of the country, to see the actual, the comparative, and the classified expenditures of the Government for the whole period. This proceeding had become necessary, Mr. B. said, from the systematic efforts made for some years past, to impress the country with the belief that the expenditures had increased threefold in the last twelve years—that they had risen from THIRTEEN to THIRTY-NINE millions of dollars; and that this enormous increase was the effect of the extravagance, of the corruption, and of the incompetency of the Administrations which had succeeded that of Mr. Adams and Mr. Monroe. These two latter Administrations were held up as the models of economy; those of Mr. Van Buren and General Jackson were stigmatized as monsters of extravagance; and tables of figures were so arranged as to give color to the characters attributed to each. These systematic efforts—this reiterated assertion, made on this floor, of thirteen millions increased to thirty-nine—and the effect which such statements must have upon the minds of those who cannot see the purposes for which the money was expended, appeared to him (Mr. B.) to require some more formal and authentic refutation than any one individual could give—something more imposing than the speech of a solitary member could afford. Familiar with the action of the Government for twenty years past—coming into the Senate in the time of Mr. Monroe—remaining in it ever since—a friend to economy in public and in private life—and closely scrutinizing the expenditures of the Government during the whole time—he (Mr. B.) felt himself to be very able at any time to have risen in his place, and to have exposed the delusion of this thirteen and thirty-nine million bugbear; and, if he did not do so, it was because, in the first place, he was disinclined to bandy contradictions on the floor of the Senate; and, in the second place, because he relied upon the intelligence of the country to set all right whenever they obtained a view of the facts. This view he had made himself the instrument of procuring, and the Secretary of the Treasury had now presented it. It was ready for the contemplation of the American people; and he could wish every citizen to have the picture in his own hands, that he might contemplate it at his own fireside, and at his full leisure. He could wish every citizen to possess a copy of this report, now received from the Secretary of the Treasury, under the call of the Senate, and printed by its order; he could wish every citizen to possess one of these authentic copies, bearing the imprimatur of the American Senate; but that was impossible; and, limiting his action to what was possible, he would propose to print such number of extra copies as would enable some to reach every quarter of the Union. He knew that the report could easily go through the newspapers, (for it was very short,) and he hoped that it would appear in every paper that was a friend to truth and to fair dealing—that wished to give correct information to its readers. He hoped it would appear in all such papers; but that was not sufficient. The newspaper publications were not sufficiently free from cavil to answer his purpose; no publication could be sufficient but the one made by the order of the Senate; and, therefore, he wished the document itself to go forth, with the Senatorial imprimatur upon it, in sufficient numbers to reach every quarter of the Union. He wished a large number to be printed; but would not suggest any particular number until he had first given to the Senate some view of the papers themselves, and thus shown them to be worthy of the most ample multiplication, and of the most extensive diffusion.

Mr. B. then opened the tables, and explained their character and contents. The first one (marked A) consisted of three columns, and exhibited the aggregate, and the classified expenditures of the Government from the year 1824 to 1839, inclusive; the second one (marked B) contained the detailed statement of the payments annually made on account of all temporary or extraordinary objects, including the public debt, for the same period. The second table was explanatory of the third column of the first one; and the two, taken together, would enable every citizen to see the actual expenditures, and the comparative expenditures, of the Government for the whole period which he had mentioned.

Mr. B. then examined the actual and the comparative expenses of two of the years, taken from the two contrasted periods referred to, and invoked the attention of the Senate to the results which the comparison would exhibit. He took the first and the last of the years mentioned in the tables—the years 1824 and 1839—and began with the first item in the first column. This showed the aggregate expenditures for every object for the year 1824, to have been $31,898,538 47—very near thirty-two millions of dollars, said Mr. B. and if stated alone, and without explanation, very capable of astonishing the public, of imposing upon the ignorant, and of raising a cry against the dreadful extravagance, the corruption, and the wickedness of Mr. Monroe's administration. Taken by itself, (and indisputably true it is in itself,) and this aggregate of near thirty-two millions is very sufficient to effect all this surprise and indignation in the public mind; but, passing on to the second column to see what were the expenditures, independent of the public debt, and this large aggregate will be found to be reduced more than one half; it sinks to $15,330,144 71. This is a heavy deduction; but it is not all. Passing on to the third column, and it is seen that the actual expenses of the Government for permanent and ordinary objects, independent of the temporary and extraordinary ones, for this same year, were only $7,107,892 05; being less than the one-fourth part of the aggregate of near thirty-two millions. This looks quite reasonable, and goes far towards relieving Mr. Monroe's administration from the imputation to which a view of the aggregate expenditure for the year would have subjected it. But, to make it entirely satisfactory, and to enable every citizen to understand the important point of the Government expenditures—a point on which the citizens of a free and representative Government should be always well informed—to attain this full satisfaction, let us pass on to the second table (marked B) and fix our eyes on its first column, under the year 1824. We shall there find every temporary and extraordinary object, and the amount paid on account of it, the deduction of which reduced an aggregate of near thirty-two millions to a fraction over seven millions. We shall there find the explanation of the difference between the first and third columns. The first item is the sum of $16,568,393 76, paid on account of the principal and interest of the public debt. The second is the sum of $4,891,386 56, paid to merchants for indemnities under the treaty with Spain of 1819, by which we acquired Florida. The third is $5,510 27 paid to States for claims on account of war debts. The fourth is $47,714 53 for the three per centum to the new States on the lands sold within their limits. The fifth is $17,000 on account of the two per centum to the Cumberland road. The fifth is $4,373 19 for the survey of the coast. The sixth is $423,342 46 for collecting materials for the gradual increase of the navy, and the improvement of the navy yards. The seventh is $180,309 67 for durable public buildings. The eighth is $429,972 04 for bridges and fortifications. The ninth is $56,955 99 for roads, canals, and breakwaters, and improvements in rivers and harbors, except the Cumberland road, which was stated by itself. The tenth is $171,155 43 for providing arms for the militia of the United States, and for arming the fortifications. The eleventh is $1,267,600 41, for all pensions, except those of invalids. The twelfth is $429,987 90 for purchasing land from Indians, and paying for Indian depredations. The thirteenth, and last item, is the sum of $296,960 21 for miscellaneous objects, and for property lost, or injuries committed, during hostilities with any power. The total of all these items, except the public debt, is $8,222,252 66. This total, added to the sum paid on account of the public debt, makes close upon twenty-five millions of dollars; and this, deducted from the aggregate of near thirty-two millions, leaves a fraction over seven millions for the real expenses of the Government—the ordinary and permanent expenses—during the last year of Mr. Monroe's administration. This is certainly a satisfactory result. It exempts the Administration of that period from the imputation of extravagance, which the unexplained exhibition of the aggregate expenditures might have drawn upon it in the minds of uninformed persons. It clears that Administration from all blame. It must be satisfactory to every candid mind. And now let us apply the test of the same examination to some year of the present Administration, now so incontinently charged with ruinous extravagance. Let us see how the same rule will work when applied to the present period; and, for that purpose, let us take the last year in the table, that of 1839. Let others take any year that they please, or as many as they please: I take one, because I only propose to give an example; and I take the last one in the table, because it is the last. Let us proceed with this examination, and see what the results, actual and comparative, will be.

Commencing with the aggregate payments from the Treasury for all objects, Mr. B. said it would be seen at the foot of the first column in the first table, that they amounted to $37,129,396 80; passing to the second column, and it would be seen that this sum was reduced to $25,982,797 75; and passing to the third, and it would be seen that this latter sum was itself reduced to $13,525,800 18; and, referring to the second table, under the year 1839, and it would be seen how this aggregate of thirty-seven millions was reduced to thirteen and a half. It was a great reduction; a reduction of nearly two-thirds from the aggregate amount paid out; and left for the proper expenses of the Government—its ordinary and permanent expenses—an inconceivably small sum for a great nation of seventeen millions of souls, covering an immense extent of territory, and acting a part among the great powers of the world. To trace this reduction—to show the reasons of the difference between the first and the third columns, Mr. B. would follow the same process which he had pursued in explaining the expenditures of the year 1824, and ask for nothing in one case which had not been granted in the other.

1. The first item to be deducted from the thirty-seven million aggregate, was the sum of $11,146,599 05, paid on account of the public debt. He repeated, on account of the public debt; for it was paid in redemption of Treasury notes; and these Treasury notes were so much debt incurred to supply the place of the revenue deposited with the States, in 1836, or shut up in banks during the suspension of 1837, or due from merchants, to whom indulgence had been granted: To supply the place of these unattainable funds, the Government went in debt by issuing Treasury notes; but faithful to the sentiment which abhorred a national debt, it paid off the debt almost as fast as it contracted it. Above eleven millions of this debt was paid in 1839, amounting to almost the one third part of the aggregate expenditure of that year; and thus, nearly the one third part of the sum which is charged upon the Administration as extravagance and corruption, was a mere payment of debt! —a mere payment of Treasury notes which we had issued to supply the place of our misplaced revenue. This item being deducted from the 37 millions, reduces it to 26.

2. The second item to be deducted is stated in the table under the description of trust funds; and consists in moneys received in trust for the Chicasaw Indians, and other Indians, on the sale of their lands, for which the United States act as their agent and treasurer. It amounts to near a quarter of a million, to wit, $240,694 for the year 1839; but for the three preceding years averaged a million and a quarter, and contributed largely to swell the expenditures, as they were termed, of 1836, 1837, and 1838. This item had no existence in the year 1824; so that it becomes a new charge, apparently, upon the Treasury; but in reality no charge at all, as it was only delivering over to Indians the money which had been received for them. Yet this item, amounting to nearly four millions in the last four years, is set down to the reckless extravagance of a mad and ruinous Administration.

3. The third item to be deducted is the sum of $717,552 27 for indemnities; that is to say, for moneys recovered from foreign nations, under General Jackson's administration, for merchants who had been plundered under previous administrations, whose money, when received, had gone into our Treasury, and was afterwards paid out to the rightful owners as their respective rights were ascertained. The payment for 1839 was near three quarters of a million; but for the three previous years they amounted in the whole to about five and a half millions; and, according to the accusation of the Opposition gentlemen, constituted so much of the horrid extravagance of those years! and here let us mark the difference between the present times and those of 1824. When, in that year, the sum of near five millions was paid out of the Treasury for indemnities to merchants under the Florida treaty, no one ever thought of making the people believe that it was a part of the expenses of the Government. No one ever thought of injuring the Administration about it. These conceptions have been reserved for the present day. Now, for the first time in the history of our country, or perhaps of any country, the recovery of indemnities from foreigners, and their payment to our own citizens, becomes a dreadful extravagance—a ruinous waste of money—for which a mad and profligate Administration must be thrust from power!

4. The fourth item is a small sum of $4,875 50 for claims of States on account of expenditures for the general benefit during the late war. It was a payment of debt, and not an expense of Government, and though small in 1839, it had been considerable in the three preceding years, amounting in that time to about $230,000, and of course, swelling by that much the aggregate expenditures of those years, and helping to make up the monstrous extravagance of which the country heard so much.

5. The next item grows out of the three per centum fund to the new States on the amount of the lands sold within their limits. It is due to the States by compact, as a consideration, and a most inadequate one it is, for not taxing the Federal lands. For the year 1839, this item amounted to $63,670; and, being a debt due to the States, is no part of the Government expenses. For the three previous years, when the land sales were at the largest, and when some of the States had neglected for some years to draw their money, the payments on this account amounted to near one and a half millions of dollars; and of course, swelled to that amount the extravagance of 1836, '37, and '38! In the year 1824, this item was only $47,714.

6. The sixth item to be deducted was nearly allied to the former. It was $198,530 for the two per centum on the sales of the public lands to make roads to the new States, and applicable to the Cumberland road. In the year 1824 it was only $17,000; but in the great sales of 1835, '6 and '7, it amounted to near $1,200,000. Here again was a payment of a debt converted into wasteful extravagance!

7. Donations of money to, or payments on account of, the District of Columbia, was the seventh item of deduction which Mr. B. mentioned. It amounted to $126,374 for the year 1839. It was a new item in the list of Government payments, having no existence in 1824, nor until the year 1832. After that time it had been annual, and as high as $313,000 in one year, to wit, 1833, and for the years 1836, '7, and '8, amounted to near $440,000. It was a gratuity to the District, which had no political rights; and it was a gratuity which had no other object than to relieve it from burthens improvidently contracted; yet received the usual character of corrupt extravagance.

8. The survey of the coast was the eighth item which Mr. B. explained. It was a temporary and extraordinary object, which had grown up from a trifle to a large amount within a few years past, and amounted to $91,995 for the year 1839. Previous to General Jackson's administration it rarely exceeded two thousand dollars per annum; for the years 1836-7 and 8, it amounted to about $220,000.

9. Duties refunded to merchants was another of the new and large items which had lately grown up among our Treasury payments. From 1821 to 1832, it was unknown; yet, in 1839, it was $179,304; in the year 1833, it was $701,000; and for 1836-7, and 8, it amounted to above $800,000. This was a favor, or an act of justice to merchants, granted by acts of Congress, or by judicial decisions, or by reversal of previous constructions of the laws. It is no part of the Government expenditure, though, being refunded from the Treasury, it goes into the enumeration, to swell the general aggregate—to swell the cry of extravagance—and to prove the hostility of the Administration to merchants!

10. A tenth item to be deducted was the sum of $714,857 for collecting materials for the increase of the navy. This was an expenditure for the future defence of the country, and averaged about $800,000 per annum since the commencement of General Jackson's administration, though only $423,000 in 1824. It is clearly no part of the expenses of Government, but an outlay of money for the benefit of after years, and of posterity.

11. Permanent public buildings is another of the large items of recent expenditure. Formerly these buildings were of perishable materials, and sunk under the decay of time, or the ravages of fire; for some years past durable materials had been selected, and fireproof edifices constructed. The expenditure for this purpose, in 1839, was $1,248,044, and near the same for the three preceding years. This again was an expenditure for the benefit of posterity, and not chargeable as an expense upon the actual administrations.

12. The sum of $735,670 for bridges and fortifications, was the twelfth item which Mr. B. pointed out for deduction, being both of them expenditures for the benefit of posterity; the expenditure extraordinary and temporary, but the benefit general and permanent.

13. The sum of $1,491,000 for the improvement of rivers, harbors, and roads, exclusive of the Cumberland road, was another expenditure of the same character. In 1824, it was but $56,955; but took a start then which would have known no bounds had it not been for the Maysville veto.

14. Providing arms for the militia of the States, and cannon for the forts, is another expenditure for future times and for posterity. It amounted to $474,906 for 1839, and averaged above half a million a year for each of the three preceding years. In 1824, it was but $171,155.

15. Pensions, except those to invalids, was the next item noted by Mr. B. for deduction. They were gratuities from the Treasury, and not an expense of Government. They amounted in 1839, to $3,033,764, being near three times what they were in 1823. They had been an enormous drain upon the Treasury for the last seven years, amounting in 1833 to $4,485,000, and subsequently averaging about half that sum.

16. Purchase of lands from Indians was another large item to be deducted, and which had vastly increased of late. In 1824, this head of expenditure only amounted to $429,987; in 1839 it was $1,708,123; in 1836 was as high as three millions; in 1837, $2,484,000; and in 1838, it was $4,603,518. These were heavy expenditures, incurred for the great object of relieving all the States from the incumbrance of an Indian population; but though heavy, it is not money gone from the Treasury never to return to it. It all returns, and with profit, in the sale of the lands acquired; yet the vast sums paid on this head, is cited against us as ruinous extravagance, for which the Goths should be driven from the Capitol!

17. Removal of Indians and their wars was another item nearly connected with the last, and subject to the same remarks. It had grown up of late, and was directed to the good of the States. In 1824 it was nothing; in 1839 it was $1,775,914. In the three preceding years it was, respectively, in round numbers, $6,000,000, $6,500,000, and $5,500,000. This is one of the largest heads of increased expenditure in recent years, and one of the most indispensable for the States of the South and West. It is appurtenant to the purchase of the Indian lands; and although large, yet the sales of the lands will far more than reimburse it.

18. And, finally, Mr. B. noted the sum of $232,369 for miscellaneous objects, not reduceable to a precise head, which swelled the list of expenditures, without belonging to the expenses of the Government.

19. The Exploring Expedition was the last of the items. It was of recent origin, amounting to $97,668 in 1839, and to about $560,000 for the three preceding years.

These are the eighteen heads of extraordinary expenditure, said Mr. B. and the amount expended for each; and now let gentlemen of the Opposition say for which of these they did not vote, to which they now object, and for which they will not vote again at this session?

With this view of the tabular statements Mr. B. closed the examination of the items of expenditure, and stated the results to be a reduction of the 37 million aggregate in 1839, like that of the 32 million aggregate in 1824, to about one-third of its amount. The very first item, that of the payment of public debt in the redemption of Treasury notes, reduced it 11 millions of dollars: it sunk it from 37 millions to 26. The other eighteen items amounted to $12,656,977, and reduced the 26 millions to 13½. Here then in a result which is attained by the same process which applies to the year 1824, and to every other year, and which is right in itself; and which must put to flight and to shame all the attempts to excite the country with this bugbear story of extravagance. In the first place the aggregate expenditures have not increased three fold in fifteen years; they have not risen from 13 to 39 millions, as incontinently asserted by the Opposition; but from 32 millions to 37 or 39. And how have they risen? By paying last year 11 millions for Treasury notes, and more than 12 millions for Indian lands, and wars, removals of Indians, and increase of the army and navy, and other items as enumerated. The result is a residuum of 13½ millions for the real expenses of the Government; a sum 1½ millions short of what gentlemen proclaim would be an economical expenditure. They all say that 15 millions would be an economical expenditure: very well! here is 13½! which is a million and a half short of that mark.

The authentic tables show that the aggregate expenditures for 1824, came within five millions of those of 1839; consequently that, without a deduction for extraordinary expenditures, the charge of extravagance, waste, ruin, profligacy, &c. might have been raised against the Administration of that day, and some uninformed persons excited against it by a groundless clamor; yet no one thought of raising such a clamor in 1824. No one then thought of charging, as extravagance, payments on account of the public debt, and for indemnities to merchants, and other extraordinary expenses. Then all parties made the proper deductions for payments either temporary or extraordinary in their nature. No one sought to mystify or to impose upon the ignorant. No one thought of palming a story of thirty-two millions upon the country as the expenses of the country. All that has been reserved for the present times; it has been reserved for our day; and may have been attended for a while with the ephemeral success which crowns for a moment the petty arts of delusion practised upon the ignorant. But the day for this delusion has gone by. The classified tables, now presented, will reach every citizen, and will clear up every doubt. They will enable every citizen to see every item of expenditure—to judge it himself—and to demand of the Opposition gentlemen, if they did not vote for it themselves, and if they now object to it? Taking the extraordinary items as they rise, and beginning with the first, the sum of eleven millions paid for redemption of Treasury notes; and it can be demanded if that payment was not right? and so on through the whole list, amounting to twelve and a half millions. The ordinary and permanent expenses, amounting to thirteen and a half millions, no one objects to: all admit that that sum is a million and half within the mark of meritorious economy. It is on the extraordinaries—it is on the difference between thirteen and a half and thirty-seven millions—that the attack is made; and now we produce these extraordinaries. We give a list of them, item by item, with the amount paid on account of each; and call upon the gentlemen of the Opposition to name the one to which they object? to name the one for which they did not vote. This is what we do; and I will you, Mr. President, what they will do: they will not name one item to which they now object, or against which they voted! They will not name one; and the reason is, because they cannot! They voted for all—they approve all—the country will approve all, except part for pensions and harbors, and of these the Opposition were the leading advocates. And thus these gentlemen of the Opposition are presented in the extraordinary light of going abroad to make a general denunciation of the Administration for extravagant expenditure; and when we show them the bill of particulars, and ask of them to point out the extravagant items, or the the ones for which they did not vote, they will remain silent! They will name no item, because they cannot.

Mr. B. said that this Administration and that of General Jackson were ready for a comparison with any that preceded them. Aggregates against aggregates, or items against items, they were ready for the comparison. If any one shall say that the expenses of the Government were thirty-seven millions in 1839, or thirty-nine millions in 1838, we answer that this is only five or seven millions more than the aggregate of 1824; that the aggregate was then thirty-two millions, and the increase is only in proportion to the increase of the country. If, descending from aggregates and going into items, it is said that sixteen millions must be deducted from the aggregate of 1824 for payments to the public debt, and eight millions more for indemnities and other extraordinaries, we answer that eleven millions must be deducted from the aggregate of 1839 for redemption of Treasury notes, and twelve and a half millions more for Indian wars, treaties, and removals, and a dozen other extraordinaries. This brings the thirty-seven down to thirteeen and a half; and at that point complaint ceases.

Mr. B. said that the tables which were presented treated every Administration alike. Beginning in the last year of Mr. Monroe, they came down through the term of Mr. Adams, and the two terms of General Jackson, and the three years which had elapsed under Mr. Van Buren. All were treated alike. The same rule was applied to the expenditures under each one. The aggregate was given in every case first; and then the extraordinary, separated from the ordinary expenditures, and the same items charged and credited in every case. In looking at the aggregates it will be seen that every Administration needed this classification; that the aggregate under Mr. Adams's administration was not thirteen millions, as repeated so many millions of times, but about the double of that! and that this thirteen millions for that gentleman's administration was only attained by deducting extraordinaries! by going through the very process which reduces the expenditure under Mr. Van Buren to thirteen and a half millions. The smallest aggregate in the whole table is that of 1835, under General Jackson's administration, when the public debt had ceased, and the Indian wars had not begun. The aggregate for that year is seventeen millions and a half. Even including the extraordinaries of that year, and the aggregate was but seventeen millions and a half! Any so it will be again. As soon as we are done paying the Treasury notes, which are issued in lieu of our misplaced revenue, and so soon as our Indian troubles are over, and the payments completed for removal of Indians, and purchase of their lands, the aggregate expenditures will come down to about what they were in 1835; and the ordinary expenses will be within fifteen millions.

Mr. B. demanded who ever deemed it an expense of the Government, when Mr. Jefferson purchased Louisiana at fifteen millions of dollars? And who could think of charging as an expense the large sums which had been lately paid in extinguishing Indian titles, and in removing Indians? One would as soon think of charging, among the expenses of a family, the outlay which should be made by a prudent and thrifty farmer in purchasing additional land, and in inclosing it with fences, or covering it with improvements. The extinction of the Indian titles—the acquisition of their lands for settlement and cultivation; and the removal of the Indians themselves from all the States, was one of the great measures which illustrated Gen. Jackson's administration, and was beneficial both to the Indians and to the States. So great an object could not be effected without a large expenditure of money; and who is there now to stand up and condemn the Administration for this expenditure? Who wants these Indians back? Who wants Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and all the other States, again encumbered with the Indians which have left them?

That the expenses of the Government had increased in the last twelve or fifteen years, Mr. B. said was just as certainly true as it was naturally to have been expected. The country itself had increased in that time: several new States had been admitted into the Union, and several new Territories had been created. An additional impetus had been given to the public defences, in the increase of the army and navy—wars with several Indian tribes had intervened -vast purchases of Indian lands had been effected—whole tribes, nay, whole nations of Indians had been removed, and removed to a vast distance, and at a vast expense. This latter expenditure was chiefly for the benefit of the South and West; but where is the man in any quarter of the Union that can stand up and condemn it?

Sir, I admit an increased expenditure; and, far from concealing, I exhibit and proclaim it. I display the items; they are spread out in the statements now under discussion; I point them out to the country. I say they will be found, principally, in the navy—in the army—in the Indian department—in the pensions—in the light-house establishment—in Indian wars—in the defence of the frontiers, North and West—in fortifications—in preparing arms and munitions of war—in the legislative department—in permanent and durable fire proof public buildings—and in assuming the foreign debt, and making other expenditures for the District of Columbia. In these branches of the service will the increases be principally found, and I supported them all except the increase for pensions, harbors, some of the light-houses, and the book printing part of the legislative expenses. I supported all except these: but the gentlemen of the Opposition supported all that I did, and these besides; and now go forth to raise a cry of extravagance!

Mr. B. said the Opposition not only voted for these increased expenditures, but in some instances greatly augmented them. This was the case in the Indian expenditures, and especially among the Cherokees. The Opposition set themselves up for the guardians of these Indians: they seemed to make political alliance with them. The Indians became parties to our politics: the Opposition became allies to them; and the result was double trouble, and double expense, and double delays, and double vexation of every kind with those Indians; until it required a military force to compel them to comply with treaties which gave them millions more than they ought to have received!

The Opposition not only voted for all the increases, and caused some of them to be augmented, but they attempted many enormous expenditures which the Democratic members opposed and prevented. Let any one look to the bills which were rejected, either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; let any look to the number of these bills, and the tens of millions, in the aggregate, with which they were freighted, and then say what the expenses would have been if the Opposition had been in power. One of these bills alone, the French spoliation bill, was for five millions of dollars; others were for vast sums, especially the harbor bills. They were rejected by the votes of Democratic members; and if they had not been—if they had passed—they would have swelled the thirty-seven to near fifty millions; and would have been charged upon as a reckless, wasteful, horrible extravagance.

Mr. B. said that the financial statements were a difficult subject to handle—hard for a speaker to understand himself, and harder still to make himself be understood by others. It was a point at which the most unfounded impressions might be made on the public mind—on which the greatest errors might be propagated. Yet it was a point on which correct information should be disseminated—on which every citizen should be informed—which every one should make it his business to understand. Economy should be the cardinal virtue of a free Government, and the whole body of the citizens should be the guardians of that virtue. They should guard the national finances; and for that purpose should understand them. They should know how much money was raised, for what purpose, and how expended. They could not be too jealous of the misapplication of the public moneys; they could not scrutinize too closely the public accounts. Those accounts could not be too often presented to them, nor in a form too simple and obvious. It has been my endeavor, said Mr. B. both in calling for the statements which had just come in from the Treasury, and in what I have said upon them, to present the difficult subject of our finances in a plain, obvious, and intelligible form. My object has been to elucidate, and not to mystify; to enlighten, and not to confuse. I have endeavored to present a full, plain, authentic statement of the public expenditures; such as every citizen can see and comprehend. Our adversaries present an aggregate; rush at the passions, and endeavor to alarm, or to enrage the people. I present the particulars and ask for their deliberate judgment. Sir, I have confidence in the capacity of my countrymen. I have confidence in their capacity for self government; in their moral and intellectual capacity for governing themselves—for sustaining and carrying on the frame of Government which our ancestors provided for us. I believe that my fellow citizens possess the requisite qualities for self-government—judgment to understand—virtue to choose—and patriotism to sustain—the principles and the measures which are best for themselves. I do not believe in the monarchial idea, that the people are ignorant, venal, factious; that they have no enlighted views of men or measures; that reason, truth and sound argument, are lost upon them, as pearls thrown to the swine; that the only way to govern them is to bamboozle and debauch them. I believe in none of these monarchial opinions, and have never practised upon them. I have never addressed myself to the supposed ignorance, venality, faction, or caprice of my countrymen, but always to their intelligence, virtue and patriotism. The argumentum ad ignoranliam has had no place in my speeches: the argumentum ad judicium has been my aim. I cannot say that I have spoken with judgment, but I can affirm that I have always paid my countrymen the compliment of speaking to their accredited judgment—never to their supposed folly. I have spoken to the rational minds, to the virtuous hearts, and to the lofty, generous and patriotic feelings of my countrymen; and I am too well content with the effect which this plan of speaking has had, to change it now. Facts, and reasons, are my materials—simplicity my style. Away with exordium—away with peroration—away with holyday phrases—away with theatrical display—away with all figures, but figures of arithmetic; and of these I give many, and never more than in this short speech. This has been my plan of speaking, and this it is now. I have procured plain statements to be made out, and have delivered a plain speech upon them. I have endeavored to make myself intelligible on a subject in which intelligibility is somewhat difficult—on which it is easy for the speaker to get both himself and his hearers into a fog. I have aimed at perspicuity, and flatter myself that I have been understood. I wish the country to judge the expenditures of the Government—the particulars as well as the aggregate—and therefore place the whole before the public. Our adversaries attack the aggregate: Let them examine the particulars, and name the one to which they object, and for which they did not vote!

Mr. B. then appealed to Senators of the Democratic party to name the number of extra copies of the report which they would propose to print, professing himself ready to agree to any number that was satisfactory to his friends

Mr. Hubbard proposed thirty thousand.

Mr. BENTON acccepted the proposition, and moved that thirty thousand extra copies of the report be printed for the use of the Senate.

The question being then on printing thirty thousand extra copies of the report, it was agreed to—yeas 22, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Nowell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Sturgeon, Wall, Williams, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Knight, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster and White—14.

☞ Both the above tables apply to the permanent expenditures of the Government, and explain the reason why they have increased to thirteen and a half millions. The extraordinary expenditures, which swelled the amount to thirty-eight millions, are detailed, item, by item, in the body of Mr. BENTON's speech.

SPEECH OF MR. WILLIAMS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the House of Representatives, June 4, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill "to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue."

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I rise to make a few remarks in reply to those which have been urged against the passage of the bill now under consideration. In doing so, it is not my intention to traverse over the whole subject, but to meet a few prominent objections by unvarnished arguments, and a plain array of facts.

The discussion of this bill, sir, was commenced, and has been followed up, by a denunciation of it as an Executive and aristocratic measure. That it has been recommended by the President, is conceded; but does it thence follow that it is an aristocratic measure? What does it propose? In the first place, to dispense with the use of banks in the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public revenue, and for these purposes to employ responsible officers, appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate; secondly, to require the revenue to be deposited in the Treasury, or its branches, prohibiting any use or loan of it, except in the legal disbursements of Government, under severe penalties of fine and imprisonment; and thirdly, to require, in the course of three years, all dues to be received, and all disbursements to be made, in gold and silver. These are the main provisions of the bill.

In opposition to this, I understand gentlemen to advocate the employment of banking institutions—irresponsible privileged associations—with power to use the public revenue as a fund on which to make loans and discounts for the benefit of their officers, stockholders, and customers.

These, sir, are the two propositions now at issue; and it must be manifest that they involve great and fundamental principles of Government. The question between them is not a mere choice of measures under one and the same theory of Government; but they present, or necessarily involve, two opposite theories—antagonistical principles of Government. The one is founded in a distrust of the people; the other in faith and the capacity of the people for self-government. They distinctly present the issue, whether the many or the few—whether responsible or irresponsible power, shall predominate in the administration of the Government?

The bill under consideration recognises the supremacy and the capacity of the people for self-government, by entrusting the safekeeping and the disbursements of the public revenue to individual agents, appointed by, and responsible to, the Government of the people, for the use and benefit, not of a class or corporation, but of the whole people. Under this system, the equal rights and sovereignty of the people are not only theoretically, but practically acknowledged.

The bank deposite system, on the other hand, necessarily restricts the practical sovereignty of the people, by entrusting the revenue to the possession and use of corporations, unknown to the Constitution of the United States, having charters irrepealable by Congress, and being incapable of ignominious punishment. It takes the public money, raised for the public service, converts it into bank paper, and, as has been truly said, leaves the Government with only a mere right of action against the incorporations entrusted with its keeping. Is such a system calculated to give supremacy to the popular will? No, sir: it renders the Government dependent upon institutions irresponsible to the people. The tendency, if not the design of it, is, not so much the safekeeping of the revenue, as to secure to the favored few the use and control of it. But the control of the revenue is an important branch of sovereignty. Shall this, then, be transferred to irresponsible banking corporations? If it is, what becomes of the boasted sovereignty of the people? It is an old maxim, "to divide sovereignty is to destroy it." The moment. then, our revenue is controlled by the banks, it ceases to be by the people; and our Government, so far as the control of the revenue is concerned, ceases to be a Government of the people, and becomes one of money changers. Its character is changed—the sovereignty departs from the people—is transferred from the many to the few.

Such a system may not be inconsistent with the theories of other Governments, for they lodge the sovereignty and the right to govern in the hands of a class. But it is not so with us; for here the people are supposed to be wiser and more competent than the few to govern and control. Hence to delegate to the members of corporations, associated together for the mere purposes of private gain, the choice of the fiscal agents of Government, is clearly contrary to the spirit of our free institutions—is anti-democratic. It assumes the aristocratic principle, and strikes at the very root of liberty.

The same course of reasoning that leads to a transfer of the fiscal operations of Government to moneyed associations, would lead to a like transfer of its various other departments. If members of corporations—the moneyed few—are better qualified than the people, or their responsible representatives, to choose the fiscal agents, as is done in the choice of bank officers, under the deposite system, does it not follow that they must be so in the choice of the Executive, Judicial, and Legislative, officers of Government? Incompetency in the one case clearly implies it in the others.

An insuperable objection is thus presented, in the very outset, to the bank deposite system. It is clearly repugnant to the first great principles of our Government—the sovereignty and capacity of the people for self-government.

But it is stongly urged against the measure under consideration, that it will injure the manufacturer and rob labor of its honest reward. If I believed, Mr. Chairman, such was to be the effect or tendency of the measure, I would be one of the last to support it; for I know of no interest more worthy the fostering care of Government than that of labor. I know of no portion of the community that has stronger claims for protection than the laborers of our country. Whatever of prosperity it has enjoyed, has been mainly derived from their hands. They have been the source of its wealth, and the architects of its glory. Through their efforts the forest has bowed, and the wilderness been made joyful with the notes of industry and freedom. Towns, cities, and States, have sprung into being, and the mighty tide of empire and of civilization has been sweeping on, on each revolving year, with new and accelerated rapidity, to the broad waters of the Pacific.

But the charge is made, and how is it sustained? How is the anticipated effect to be produced? Is it, as contended, by the prostration, of banks, of credit, and of a paper currency? And is this bill adequate to produce such results? No, sir. There is nothing in it to endanger sound and well regulated banking institutions. It provides for the separation of Government from the vicissitudes of business, and from the corrupt abuses of which banks are the source; but it makes no war upon them. It encroaches not upon their rights. It is a mere dissolution of partnership. The measure leaves them to their own resources, and the indulgent care of their creators, the State Legislatures. Will this, sir, destroy the banks? Not, surely, if they have any solid basis to rest upon. The idea that a mere separation will prove their destruction, can only be founded on the supposition of their entire and inherent weakness and rottenness. If they are sound institutions—if they have any better foundation than public credulity—they can and will exist, notwithstanding the passage of this bill.

It is not a measure offensive but defensive, and necessary to the independence, protection, and proper administration of the Government. The moment the public money is deposited in the banks, the dangerous power is given to a privileged class to bankrupt the Treasury, and arrest the wheels of Government. The experiment has been tried. With over thirty millions of surplus revenue on hand, we have seen the Government, through their plighted faith, not only deprived of its use, and embarrassed, but denounced for its poverty and bankruptcy. Shall the humiliating spectacle of 1837 be again presented to the world? Let us, sir, at least save the Republic from such discredit and disgrace, by the passage of the bill under consideration.

This, sir, is necessary, not only to render the funds of the Government available for the uses of he Government, but to the uniform action of the banks themselves. It will check overaction by withdrawing from their use the public money, the most active cause of the wide spread embarrassments of 1837. This induces them to expand most when money is plenty, and to contract most when their assistance is most needed to save the business community from bankruptcy and ruin. Confine them to their own resources, and they will do a safer business; their circulation will be more uniform than when banking upon the uncertain amount of the public money in deposite. As this varies, not only from year to year, but in different parts of the same year, the use of it by the banks, as a basis for issue or discount, must inevitably tend to increase fluctuation, unsettle markets, and aggravate all the evils of our banking system.

Such, sir, was the opinion of the late President of the United States Bank before the present measure was proposed and made the dividing line of parties. Upon the reorganization of that Bank, in 1836, he not only declared the Bank "safer, stronger, and more prosperous than it ever was," but that "it was an original misfortune in the structure of the Bank that it was in any way connected with persons in office. The instincts of all political power make that association dangerous—useful to neither party—injurious to both."

But it is objected that it will withdraw the public money from the business of the country. What right, sir, have the banks and merchants to its custody and use? Is our revenue raised for the support of Government, or for purposes of private gain and speculation? Sir, we have no right to tax the people, to collect a revenue, for such individual and selfish purposes. Such dangerous power has not been delegated to Congress—has not been surrendered by the people. Why, then, abuse the taxing power? Why, then, pervert the public revenue from its legitimate ends to enable bankers and speculators to thrive upon the Government? Our taxes are mainly collected from the consumers—are paid about equally by the poor as well as the rich. Why, then, should the bankers be the only gainers by the people's money? Are they more meritorious—truer or more devoted friends of their country? If not, why should the revenue go to make the rich richer? Is it showing friendship for the laboring community to exact the property of the laborer in taxes, and take only the promises of the banker?

The system, sir, is unequal, unjust, and dangerous. It adds to the insecurity of the public money in the Treasury, all the risks of banking, trading, and speculation. It taxes the people not merely for the support of Government, but to create a fund for the use of a favored class. It is a species of favoritism at war with sound morality, with Republican legislation, and unworthy of a free and enlightened people.

Strong exceptions have been taken to the provisions of the bill for the collection of the revenue in gold and silver. To all that has been urged on this head, it is a sufficient answer, that no other currency is recognised by the Constitution—that no other currency will enable the Government to meet the demands which may be made upon the Treasury. Every citizen has the right, by the laws of the land, to exact specie in the payment of his debts. Why should the Government be content with less? My colleague [Mr. CUSHING] gives, as a reason, that it will furnish one and a superior currency for the Government, and another and inferior one for the people. But how so, when it only exercises a right secured to every citizen? How is it to benefit the office holders, if our bank paper is redeemable in, and, as contended, equivalent to gold and silver? It will not then affect prices; it will not then command a premium; and of course it will then confer no benefit to the office holder. But when the reverse is the case—when paper ceases to be the representative of what it purports to be—ceases as a whole to be convertible into specie—in a word, becomes depreciated—in that case, my colleague admits, it should not be received into the Treasury.

In either view, then, there is no soundness in the objection. It mistakes altogether the character of our free institutions. While our Government is a Government of the people, the interests of the two cannot be distinct. What is best for the Government will then be best for the people.

Nor is there any just ground to fear that its operation will drain the banks, and accumulate the specie of the country in the vaults of the Treasury. The calls for specie will not be sufficient in amount to produce such effects. As the disbursements are going out during the whole process of receipts, but a small amount of specie will be required to meet the wants of the Treasury. Large estimates have been presented to alarm the country. But such are not the opinions of those who possess the best means of arriving at accurate conclusions. After full investigation, it is believed the whole amount required will not exceed four or five millions. This is the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, founded upon the past action of the Government. Now if the whole of this amount should be withdrawn in a single year, it would not cause a greater variation than has often been produced, during the same period, by the operations of commerce. But as the change is to be gradual, and ample time is allowed for specie to flow in to supply the place of such as may be required for the use of Government, the bill affords no ground whatever to fear the consequences predicted.

Indeed, the very supposition, that such effects are to flow from the bill, is negatived by the arguments of every gentleman who has yet addressed the House on the subject. For while they have labored to create the belief that this measure will hoard specie, destroy banks, and introduce an exclusive metallic currency, they have hesitated not at the same time to denounce it as a Treasury Bank—"a rag manufactory"—whose issues are destined to enter largely into the circulating medium of the country. Both arguments, it is evident, cannot be sound; and I leave it to the country to say whether either is; and whether such reasoning and inconsistency can have any better foundation than an attempt to mislead and deceive the people into subserviency to party views and party aggrandisement.

But the opponents of this measure have not been content with merely predicting evil from its future operations. In their zeal to render it odious to the people, they have gone further, and charged upon the policy of the Administration, in introducing the bill, all the curtailment of business, all the reduction of prices, and of the rates of wages, that have taken place during the last six months. This is a very brief, and it may be a very politic way, for them to account for the existing embarrassments; but, sir, is it the true way? Why attribute to the Government the present revulsion more than those which occurred under prior Administrations? It is not so great, so universal, or desolating, as those under the reign of the United States Bank in 1819, '22, '25, and '28-9. We have now seen, in the Northern cities at least, but very few failures; whereas at each of the former periods, they were very numerous. In 1825, during the short space of two months, there were no less than eighty failures in the city of Boston alone, exceeding in amount three millions of dollars. And so great were the embarrassments among manufacturers in 1829, that, within the circle of ten adjacent miles of Providence, "upwards of twenty-five hundred people were suddenly and unexpectedly thrown out of employment in the short space of ten days!"

If such revulsions "fairly belonged to the vibrations of trade," as contended by an honorable Senator, [Mr. DAVIS,] may not the one from which the country is now recovering, be much more fairly accounted for on other causes than the action of this Administration? Why, then, attribute to this source existing embarrassments? Is it not losing sight of truth for party ends? Is it not bearing false testimony against the Government of the people? And is such conduct becoming patriots intent only on their country's good?

Sir, if there is stagnation of business, it is but the exhaustion consequent upon overaction and excess. Merchants have overtraded, the banks have overissued, and the States have contracted debts beyond the bounds of prudence, or their present ability to pay. These are the sources of our country's embarrassments. And what has the Administration done to produce these unfortunate results? Did it cause the States to run up their debts in Europe to the amount of $170,000,000 for wild projects of internal improvement? Did it charter the nine hundred State banks, and flood the country with their issues? Did it cause the banks to grant their loans and discounts to favored directors and reckless speculators, instead of dividing them among business men to uphold the business of the country? No, sir; these are not the acts of this Administration; nor is it answerable for their bitter fruits—for the doings of the States acting in their sovereign capacities. It is their unequal and vicious legislation which has plunged the country into embarrassment, and to them belongs the odious responsibility.

But we are told that States, where the friends of the Administration have had the majority, have largely increased their banking capital. True, sir; but how was the increase effected? By the votes of the majority of the Democratic members of those Legislatures? There are few, if any, instances where such has been the case, The increase of banks has generally been caused by the votes of the Opposition with the aid of a few, perhaps interested, Democrats. If there are instances to the contrary, they are but exceptions to the general rule.

Nor is the Administration responsible for the depression in the price of agricultural products. Some of these, it is true, are now low; but not more so than they have been periodically for the last twenty years. From the following table, exhibiting the prices of flour, beef, tobacco, and pork, in the city of New York, it will be seen, that the prices of each article named, was higher in March last, than in 1834, in 1830, or in 1828:

The average price of flour per barrel, in Philadelphia, during the present Administration, has exceeded $7 00; during General Jackson's last term, according to a table published in Hazard's Register, it was $6 16; during his first term, it was $5 63; during Mr. Adams's term, it was $5 14; and during Mr. Monroe's last term, it was $5 95; thus showing, if high prices are to be the test of merit, the preference is to be given to the present over the preceding Administrations.

But notwithstanding all this, we hear much said about the fall of prices, as if it was something new and unprecedented, and all the work of the Administration. Is there any connection between the two? What, sir, is price? It is defined as the relative proportion existing between the amount of money and the amount of commodities in the market. It can, then, only be altered by an undue depression or increase of the one or the other. During the past year, we have witnessed both. We have had a bountiful harvest, and a great curtailment of bank issues; and hence the fall of prices. But has the Administration caused either? Has it increased the amount of commodities? No, sir. These are not the fruits of our legislation, but the products of industry and the seasons. To charge the Administration, then, with the fall of prices consequent upon the increase of the supply in the market, amounts to nothing more nor less than to denounce it for the gifts of a fruitful season and a beneficent Providence. Has Government, then, diminished the amount of money or currency? There is no evidence of such a deed on the part of this Administration. It has passed no law on the subject, but continues to receive the same kind of money which has been received into the Treasury from the foundation of the Government, with the exception of a short period during the war.

The revulsion, then, which has taken place in prices, is not the act of this Administration, but is the joint result of a bountiful harvest, and of the acts of incorporations acting independent of this Government, and arrayed in open hostility against it. In other words, it is the natural operation of those great laws of trade and currency, which lead to a fall of prices when supply exceeds demand, or when the currency becomes contracted, or assumes a higher standard of value.

Nor has the objection any better foundation, that the Administration design to degrade our laboring community to a level with that of European countries. If this is "what the Administration propose," my colleague says he can answer "that Massachusetts will never accept such a policy." No, sir; neither Massachusetts nor any other State will accept it at the hands of this Administration, for the good and conclusive reason that it has adopted no such policy; advocates no such policy; and can have no motive or intention to propose any such degrading policy. The charge is no less groundless than ridiculous. Neither this, nor any other Administration, could produce such a result, if they should entertain the unholy wish. In making the objection, gentlemen studiously keep out of sight the vast difference between this country and Europe, the character of our institutions, the condition of our country, and the laws which regulate the rates of wages. These are not determined alone by the currency of a country, though it has a very important bearing, but by the density of its population, by their intelligence and enterprise, and by all the circumstances that can affect consumption or production. The greater the demand, other things being the same, the higher wages will be. But as the demand will be greater, so will wages be higher, among a sparse but free and intelligent, than among a dense and oppressed population. Hence wages are low in Europe, and comparatively high here; and such will continue to be the case, while there is a down trodden surplus population in Europe, and while the enterprise and intelligence of our citizens, and our extensive public domain, afford ample resources against any long continued excess of supply beyond demand.

How perfectly preposterous then is it for gentlemen seriously to accuse the Administration of the design to reduce the free laborers of this country to a level with those of Europe, by a mere requisition of gold and silver in the receipts of the Treasury. The change is altogether too great and radical to be produced by such a cause. It would require a revolution, not only in the system of our Government, but in the condition of our country, and the character of our people. Before it could be brought about, our liberties must be swallowed up in despotism, the enterprise and intelligence of our citizens be lost in luxury and sensuality, and the wide spread acres of our public land teem and overflow with a half starved, ignorant, and king oppressed population.

On what, then, rests the charge that the Administration is hostile to laborers? The only evidence which has yet been adduced is the declaration of some of the friends of the Administration of opposition to the banking system. Now suppose such opposition to be entertained to the full extent represented; does it follow that they are opposed to the well being of the laborer? Is such a charge deducible from such premises? If it is, how stands the case with the Opposition? Have none of its members expressed similar hostility? Look, sir, at the opinions avowed by the honorable John Tyler, the Whig candidate for the Vice Presidency. In a speech delivered against the late United States Bank, and published in the National Intelligencer of April 6, 1819, he used the following emphatic language:

"For one, I enter my protest against the banking system as conducted in this country—a system not to be supported by any correct principles of political economy; a gross delusion, the dream of a visionary—a system which has done more to corrupt the morals of society than any thing else; which has introduced a struggle for wealth, instead of that honorable struggle which governs the actions of a patriot, and makes ambition virtue; which has made the husbandman spurn his cottage, and introduced a spirit at variance with the simplicity of our institutions. I call upon the warm advocates of banking now to surrender their errors. Shall I take them by the hand and lead them through our cities? Bankruptcy meets us at every step; ruin stares us every where in the face. Shall I be told of the benefits arising to commerce from the concentration of capital? Away with the delusion. Experience has exposed its fallacy. True, for a moment, it has operated as a stimulus; but, like ardent spirit, it has produced activity and energy but for a moment: relaxation has followed, and the torpor of death has ensued. When you first open your bank, much bustle ensues: a factitious goddess, pretending to be wealth, stands at the door, inviting all to enter and receive accommodation; splendid palaces arise; the ocean is covered with sails: but some alteration in the state of the country takes place; and when the thoughtless adventurer, seated in the midst of his family, in the imaginary enjoyment of permanent security, sketches out to himself long and halcyon days, his prospects are overshadowed, and misery, ruin, and bankruptcy make their appearance in the form of bank curtailments. If this be true, and I appeal to the knowledge of all men for its truth, I demand to know if you can put down the system to soon. Can we too soon escape the dangers with which we are surrounded? I know I shall be told that, even if we put down this bank, the State banks will still exist. Even if true, the position is not a justifiable one. If the State Legislatures do not follow the example which we set them, we shall have acquitted ourselves of our duty. It is all that can be asked of us. But, sir, we actually possess the lever of Archimides, and have a foot of ground on which to rest it. Our revenue amounts to upwards of $20,000,000 annually. Require a fourth, or even a sixth, to be paid in gold and silver—what would be the effect? The merchant would collect the notes of banks, and demand specie for them; and thus a test would be adopted by means of which to ascertain the solvency of each institution. The demand of specie thus produced would have the beneficial effect of introducing more of it into the country; for money is like every other article, and will find its way to the market where it is most wanting. The system might be enlarged gradually until your wishes should be consummated."

Where, sir, in the range of our history, can you find a bolder denunciation of our whole banking system? If opposition to it, then, makes any of the friends of the Administration the enemies of the laborer, must not the opposition of Mr. Tyler make him equally so? There is no escape from the conclusion; and the opponents of the bill must either acknowledge the inference which they have drawn unwarranted, or stand before the country guilty of the inconsistency of denouncing the opponents of the banking system as hostile to laborers, while they have presented and are urging the election of an equally strong opponent, as par excellence, the friend of the laborer. To this alternative they are brought; and they may take either horn of the dilemma they choose.

Nor is opposition to our banking system peculiar to Mr. Tyler himself. The Richmond Whig, the organ of the Opposition in Virginia, in alluding in a late number to the necessity of bank reform, has the following paragraph, not only explicitly attributing the crying evils of the day to banks, but lamenting their introduction into the country in as strong language as those whose opposition is held up as an undisguised warfare upon labor and civilization:

"Unhappy was the day for America, when banks were introduced into the country. Speculation, debt, ruin, depravation of morals, and misery, have followed in their train. Much of the improvement which they are said to have accomplished, we believe to be no improvement at all; but if it be, improvement prematurely attempted, and effected by the unnatural expansion of the paper system, which, again collapsing, as collapse it always will, after such an expansion, has scattered destruction through the land."

Nor are these doctrines peculiar to Virginia, but were proclaimed by a recent Whig candidate for the Presidency (Mr. Webster) in 1816, and reiterated in strong and glowing terms in 1832. Even the Senator [Mr. DAVIS] who charges upon the friends of the Administration a design to reduce the rewards of labor, by infusing a greater amount of specie into the currency, promulgated similar doctrines in his message as Governor of Massachusetts in 1834, and affirmed in 1838 that experience had confirmed him in their correctness. Nor is this all. No longer ago than last fall one of the organs of the Opposition (the Boston Daily Advertiser) published a series of essays, written by one of the leading Whigs of New England, taking as strong ground against our banking system, so far as it bears upon labor, as the most radical Democrat. The following is an extract from an essay published in that paper in September last:

"The currency of the country, instead of possessing that steadiness in value essential to the great interests of the nation, and which is the characteristic of a metal currency, is, under its present management, subject to frequent and violent fluctuations, equal in the course of a year to 10, 15, or 20 per cent. causing a correspondi. g variation in the value of property. Such changes are extremely injurious to the operations of all regular industry. With a currency liable to such variations, no tolerably correct calculations can be made for twelve, or even for six months to come, by the farmer, merchant, mechanic, and manufacturer, of the value of their products at the termination of these periods. Men of the greatest skill, industry, and economy, in the management of their concerns, are constantly defeated of their earnings, if not wholly ruined, by these sudden changes in the standard of value—changes which are wholly beyond the foresight, if not the comprehension, of the great mass of the business community. They neither understand the causes of their suffering, nor if they did, so long as they continued in business, could they guard against them. All the industrious classes suffer from such frequent and violent alternations in the value of property; but the heaviest portion of it falls upon that large body of men who rely upon their limited and fixed incomes derivable from fees, salaries, or upon money investments in banks, and other institutions; and, above all, upon that much more numerous class who depend upon manual labor—upon their daily earnings for their daily bread. The merchant and manufacturer will find some compensation for his share of the evils of a deranged currency, by the enhanced profits incident to trade, when the currency is in a state of expansion, while the wealthy capitalist, who is out of the current of active business, may profit in his money investments, by the purchase of the property of the disabled and distressed classes, at half its ordinary value.

"To the retired and laboring classes, then, we say, that an uncertain, fluctuating currency, tending, as ours has been of late, to excess, is an unmitigated evil—at least such it has been in this country. The effect of the undue expansion from 1834 to 1836, when the bank issues were increased from 95 to 186 millions, and the liabilities from 171 to 341 millions, which was the main, and the only effective cause of the commercial revulsion and bank suspension in 1837. We repeat, the effect of that over issue of paper, was to raise and to maintain the prices of the necessaries of life from 20 to 30, and occasionally 50 per cent. beyond what they would have been had our currency been kept in a natural and sound state. Thus the cost of living was enhanced perhaps one-third, while the incomes and wages of the large classes to which we have referred were, in a great degree, stationary. This evil, too, is still existing; and will not cease to exist, till by a further contraction of our exuberant currency, prices are brought to a more natural level—to that level, in fact, on which the rewards of labor, and the incomes of invested capital were based, when our currency was in its ordinary sound state. To place these classes on a level with the active business portion of the community, who, from their position, can profit by the fluctuations of our currency, their fees, wages and incomes should have been increased in a corresponding ratio with the effect in the prices of the necessaries of life consequent upon an enlargement of the currency. No such augmentation to the incomes and wages of the classes to which we allude, was ever made; nor is there any probability of its being done; because, in the first place, the sufferers, being for the most part ignorant of the true causes of the increased expense of living, do not comprehend the reasonableness of demanding an increase of compensation proportionate to the decreased value of money; and secondly, if such a demand was made, would it not be alleged that the derangement of the currency, being in its nature temporary, and liable, therefore, to a return to its former sound state, it would be inexpedient and unjust to make these changes in the prices of labor, and of professional services, which it would be just and expedient to make in case of a permanent alteration in the value of money—such, for instance, as would arise from a sudden and considerable variation in the quantities of the precious metals existing in the commercial world? Such, we apprehend, in the case here imagined, would be the arguments employed by the most powerful against the most powerless portion of the community, to prevent their obtaining any abatement for their loss in the decreased value of money consequent upon an enlargement of the circulating medium.

"Again: not only are the less affluent and laboring classes compelled to pay the increased prices for their provisions, founded upon a superfluous currency, while their fees, salaries and wages are based upon a lower scale of an undepreciated currency; but at every revulsion in business, they are liable to be thrown out of their accustomed vocations, and driven to new ones for which they are less fitted, and sometimes wholly deprived of any employment."

The evils here described, with the derangement of business and prices, are explicitly declared to be "the natural, if not the inevitable, fruits of a vicious system of currency; of a currency issued by 900 banks," which have the power, and exercise it too, "of expanding the circulating medium to any extent they deem proper, and, consequently, of altering the value of property to a like extent." And the opinion is expressed, that while the system is continued, we shall have convulsions and revulsions at intervals of perhaps three or four years, when "paper of undefined value, or of no value, may be used, if not legally, yet by force of public opinion, stronger than the laws of the land, to discharge debts based upon coin of a fixed value, to the great discouragement of honest industry, in utter disregard of the rights of property, and of those principles upon which our institutions are based."

Such, sir, was the language of a leading Whig in a leading organ of the Opposition last fall. Where, then, was their holy horror of infusing more specie into our circulating medium? Where, then, was all the eloquence since manifested in favor of high nominal wages? We heard nothing of it then in Massachusetts. It slumbered, sir, until political power was seen departing from their grasp—until a desperate effort became necessary to uphold a desperate and sinking cause. No political capital could then be made out of it. The evils of our banking system were then proclaimed from the high quarters of Whigism, and in a paper, too, which represents the commercial and manufacturing interests of New England. No fears were then expressed at a reduction of currency or prices; but, on the contrary, a reduction of both was openly, boldly, and most strenuously recommended, as necessary to the best interests of the country, and the restoration of business to a sound and healthful state. In an essay in that paper of the 9th of October, the writer says:

"Our prices have been so high for the last twelve months past, owing to our redundant currency, that there has hardly been a moment when the products of our soil or our manufactories, would command in any foreign market so much as they cost in the home one—one consequence of which has been, that the best mode of payment for import cargoes was found in the negotiating of bills on London, and for the reimbursement of which we are now shipping a portion of our too scanty supplies of coin.

"The extreme prices of grain among us, were not owing to a bad harvest—for seldom has the country been blessed with a better one. The unnatural price of nine dollars a barrel for flour was caused, not by a scarcity of wheat, but by a superabundance of currency—of bank notes—issued and loaned by the banks in New York State, and other grain States—for the purpose of sustaining and enhancing the prices of grain 25 to 33½ above what they ought to have been, and what they would have been had our currency been in natural and sound state.

"But it will be alleged that our currency has since been in a course of contraction. True, and prices have felt the good effects of it, but they are still too high. Even cotton, which is looked upon with least favor as an article of commerce, cannot be purchased in the New York market, where most of the stock is concentrated, nor in any other market, so low, with the usual export charges to Europe, as the last Liverpool quotations; while wheat, with a superabundant crop, and a large surplus of the past season, is probably higher than in any of the grain exporting countries of Europe. This is not all; the moment there is a slight improvement in the prices of cotton abroad, or even a faint prospect of a demand for flour and wheat in England, he spirit of rash speculation would revive—prices advance beyond their already inflated rates, and prudent men be prevented, as they were last year, from the free exportation of those staples."

"Again, had the currency not been redundant, prices of foreign goods would have been lower—the temptations to import lessened, and thus the balance of foreign payments kept down, perhaps some 20, 30, or $40,000,000 below what they are at this moment. It is this foreign debt, this heavy balance against us, and which is constantly accruing, and probably faster than it is discharged, that has brought the exchanges against the country, and by the drains upon our coin, caused the banks to suddenly curtail their issues and their loans, and thus created the heavy pressure on the money market, which has deranged all operations of business."

"If the principal part of our currency was coin, the parting with five times the amount we have exported, or which we may hereafter be required to export, would cause but a slight variation of prices."

In these extracts, we have two important admissions. In the first place, what my colleague charges upon the Administration as a mere matter of inference—a reduction of currency and prices—is strongly recommended as the only true policy to be pursued by the banks and business men. Prices are declared to be too high; and the opinion is subsequently expressed, that when the currency becomes "as contracted as it should be," the price of flour "may fall to $5, and then we may go to foreign markets, in competition with the grain growers of Europe, which we have not been able to do for some five or six years past—sometimes by reason of a scant harvest, but more commonly because our prices were unnaturally sustained by a superabundant currency, in common with the prices of cotton and most other staples. This every importing merchant will know to be true, from the result of his operations."

After the promulgation of such sentiments from such a quarter, does it now become my colleague to reproach the Administration with the design to reduce the currency and prices? If there has been a contraction, is not the evidence clear and full to show that it was a measure strongly pressed upon the banks by his own political friend, and one, too, who has been held up as a guide on the subject of currency?

In the second place, we have the admission that "had the currency not been redundant, prices of foreign goods would have been lower." And such most obviously would have been the case. An inflation of our currency cheapens the whole mass, and consequently requires more currency here, though it may not materially affect prices abroad, to measure out a given quantity of goods, whether of foreign or domestic production. But suppose our currency should be more contracted than it has usually been; and suppose all things of foreign production should retain their old prices, as contended by my colleague, would it not then operate in favor of those of domestic production? If my colleague's object is to afford foreign goods to our citizens at low prices, why does he advocate a high tariff? Is it not to enhance the price of foreign goods, and thereby encourage the growth and manufacture of our own? If this bill, then, as he argues, will have the same effect, why oppose it? His objection on this head is evidently inconsistent with his tariff doctrines, and, according to his own theory, is therefore entitled to no weight.

Throughout the whole discussion of this measure, its opponents have seemed to take it for granted that the interest of labor is identical with that of our banking system. Is such an assumption just and well founded? Is it true that our paper currency is the one of all others the best calculated to promote the well being of the laborer? Let us, sir, bring it to the test of acknowledged principles, and the results of experience.

What is the great office of a currency? To pay debts—to settle balances. It is defined as the medial commodity by which the value of labor and property are measured and determined. If it is unstable and fluctuating, such will be the standard of value and the character of business. Hence stability has been rightly considered by standard writers on political economy, as essential to "the prosperity of a country as fixed standards of weights and measures."

Now, does this important element of stability enter into and characterize our paper currency? Sir, every body knows the contrary. The winds and waves of ocean have not been more variable. Instead of possessing that stability which is necessary to give steadiness of value, it has varied with the varying feelings of the human breast. Founded upon confidence, it has ebbed and flowed as the human mind has alternated from hope to fear. At times we have seen it so contracted as not to afford the requisite facilities for the operations of business, while at other periods it has been so expanded as to afford means for the wildest extravagance and speculation. It has borne no uniform proportion either to the population, the specie, or the wealth of the country.

In 1816, the amount of currency was $11 per head of the whole population; $7 in 1819, $5 in 1830, $6 in 1834, $7 in 1835, $8 in 1836, and $10 in January, 1837.

In 1819, the amount of paper and specie in circulation, was over seventy millions of dollars; in 1820, less than forty-eight millions. In 1833, the bank circulation was sixty-five millions; in 1834, ninety-four millions; and in January, 1837, no less than one hundred and forty-nine millions. From 1830 to 1837, there was an increase in the loans and discounts of banks from two hundred to five hundred and twenty-five millions; and the circulation from sixty-one to one hundred and forty-nine millions; and in the deposites from thirty-five to one hundred and twenty-seven milllions. Here was an increase in the currency, in the short space of six years, of over one hundred per cent. while the increase in the wealth of the country could not have exceeded one quarter of that amount.

Much has been said against the depression of a specie standard; but what better do we have under our present system? As it now is, our people have to suffer not only all the evils of an inflated paper currency, but all the evils of a sudden contraction of such a currency to the specie standard. This is capable of demonstration. It results from the very nature of our paper medium—from the test of its convertibility.

"The constant tendency of banks," says the late president of the United States Bank, "is to lend too much, and to put too many notes in circulation." But an expanded currency cannot long be maintained. Each new issue cheapens the whole mass, and causes an exportation of specie; first, because it induces a rise of prices and large importations, and thereby creates a demand for specie to pay for them; and secondly, because specie, like other commodities, will seek that market where it is most highly valued. Whenever, therefore, our currency is increased beyond what is necessary to do the business of the country at prices about on a confidence of an inflated paper currency, but of that which would exist under a specie currency. The revulsion not only brings down the paper currency to the test of specie, but through the loss of confidence, actually depresses business below what it would be under a specie currency.

par with those of other countries, specie will either circulate at a premium, or be exported, as it can be done, under such circumstances, with profit as a mere article of merchandise.

Now is declared by the late president of the Unites Sates Bank, to be "the law of our currency, when from superabundance too much coin leaves the country, the remainder must be preserved by diminishing the paper, so as to make it more valuable." And what is the consequence? With contractions come failures. The usual accommodations are withthheld; business is paralyzed; the wheels of industry are arrested; and distrust and despair and panic pervade the whole community. There follows, then, not only the prostration of

We have had an illustration of this in the state of our business and currency during the last winter and spring. It appears from the returns of the banks, that they curtailed their circulation from $135,170,995, in January, 1839, to 106,968,572, on the first of January last. This included the returns from Mississippi, where their bills, I am informed, were at 70 per cent. discount, and also those from the other non-specie paying States, where their bills circulated from 6 to 10 per cent. discount. Deduct the amount of this depreciation, and the whole value of the bank circulation did not much, if any, exceed 90,000,000 on the first of January last. But the curtailment did not stop there. It appears, from notices in different parts of the country, that it was continued during the winter; and, if such was the case, as we have good reason to believe, the whole bank circulation in March last could not have exceeded in value $85,000,000, the estimated amount of specie in the country. And yet the opponents of this bill talk of the depression of specie prices, as if it did not already take place under the ruinous and rapid vibrations of our paper system.

But for business to be reduced to what may properly be called the specie standard, it is not necessary for our circulation to be reduced to the amount of specie in this country. We have not now, nor have we had for years, our due relative portion. The channels of business have been filled with paper. This has entered more largely into circulation than in other commercial nations, and driven specie from our borders. But for a superabundance of paper issues, we should always have what to our industry and wealth belong. When there is a relative deficiency, it would flow in from other countries; and when there is an undue expansion, it would flow out. The tendency of currency among all commercial nations, is to a level. And the same is true of prices. Goods will seek that market where they will command the most profit. Hence, under the high nominal prices of our bank expansion, potatoes were imported from Holland, grain from the Black Sea, and butter from Germany; while with the abundant harvests of the past year, and our contracted currency, we are now exporting bread stuffs.

In the discussion on the recharter of the United States Bank in 1832, Mr. Webster declared for the Bank "to call in its loans at the rate of 8,000,000 a year, is an operation which, however wisely it may be conducted, cannot but inflict a blow on the community, of tremendous force and frightful consequences. The thing cannot be done without distress, bankruptcy, and ruin to many." But instead of a curtailment of eight millions, we have experience one during the past year to the enormous amount of thirty to forty millions. And is it strange that the frightful consequences should follow in wide spread embarrassments and derangements of business? Could it be otherwise than that the pursuits of trade and industry should feel the astounding shock of the tremendous blow of bank mismanagemen and contraction?

Nor have these bank paroxysms been of unfrequent occurrence. During the last twenty-two years we have had no less than eight serious revulsions, varying the amount of currency in some years not less than twenty to forty per cent. and scattering ruin and bankruptcy through the land.

It is contended, Mr. Chairman, by an honorable Sentator, (Mr. DAVIS,) that "gold and silver are no more exempt" from fluctuation than paper. But is this so? Where, sir, can you find examples of such desolating fluctuations in a metallic currency? Where, sir, has it stimulated the wild spirit of speculation and overtrading, like paper? When and where, in the records of history, has it been susceptible of being expanded and contracted to the same extent, and with like facility, with that of our paper medium? No such instances have been adduced, and in the absence of proof, we have a right to presume that none such do exist. It is not in the nature of things, sir, that such should be the case. Paper is the more elastic medium. It may be expanded or contracted at pleasure, and has been recommended for possessing this greater power of variableness. The late president of the United States Bank went so far as to declare its "value to consist in its elasticity—its power of alternate expansion and contraction."

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it the office of a currency, thus characterized by "alternate expansion and contraction," to benefit the laborer? No, sir: it tends to rob labor of its first and most essential rights, the true amount and security of its earnings.

It purports to represent specie, but not unfrequently fails to represent property of any kind. It has no uniform and intrinsic value. One day it may be equivalent to specie, and the next day valueless. Nor have the great body of the laboring community any means of ascertaining its value, but from those who are directly interested in concealing any deficiency from the knowledge of the public. There is, consequently, a degree of uncertainty about our currency which constantly exposes labor to the severest loss.

Every great variation in its amount operates a wrong, by varying the standard of value. As it expands or contracts, it augments or diminishes the stipulated consideration of contracts, and thereby becomes a source of loss to the debtor or creditor portion of the community. When the contraction is great, as it must be in every collision of paper with specie, after an expansion, the loss suffered, by a man engaged in extensive business, is often sufficient to absorb a large estate, and reduce its possessor to comfortless poverty. This was the case in 1837, and in each of the former great revulsions of our currency. It thus makes and unmakes fortunes, without labor, regardless of the rights of industry, or the obligations of justice.

Another source of loss and insecurity, is the overaction to which such a currency inevitably leads. An expansion enhances prices, the effect of which is to stimulate production, and increase the supply. But the effect of high prices is also to check consumption. The consequences are, a glut in the market, stagnation of business, failures and heavy losses to the industrious portion of the community. It affords facilities for contracting debts without the corresponding ability to pay. The more it is expanded, the more wildly men rush beyond the bounds of prudence. Insolvencies are thus multiplied, and the grossest extravagance encouraged. Economy is exchanged for prodigality, and the business of the country partakes of all the uncertainty of a lottery, and all the viciousness of gaming.

What better evidence, sir, of this fact can be required than the enormous amount of foreign luxuries consumed in this country? During a period of only ten years, we have imported wines and spirits to the value of forty-one millions, and silks to the value of no less than one hundred and eighteen millions; showing in these articles alone a consumption of foreign luxuries to the amount of over fifteen millions annually.

Look, also, at the number of insolvencies and failures under our paper system. Do we find them take place in such startling frequency and amount in hard money countries? So far from it, I find it asserted in a recent work, that more take place with us in one year, than happen under the hard money currency of Holland in a whole century. And I have high Whig authority that there "were more suspensions and bankruptcies in the United States, in 1837, than have occurred in France, where the currency consists mainly of specie, since the establishment of order, after the overthrow of Bonaparte.

The direct loss sustained by the use of a paper currency, cannot be stated with much precision. The most that can be done is to approximate the enormous amount by estimates founded upon losses which have been ascertained.

It appears, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the public money lost, by using banks as depositories, and receiving their notes in payment of public dues, amounts, according to an estimate of the Committee of Ways and Means, to $34,974,722; but according to the estimate of the Department to $6,474,722. Now take the lowest estimate, and suppose the people to have lost, in their individual business, in the same proportion as in Governmental transactions. According to the Secretary of the Treasury, our currency does not usually exceed, in a sound state, about seven dollars per head of the whole population. This would now give us a circulation of about $112,000,000. The amount required in the fiscal operations of Government is estimated at five millions, which is about one-twenty-second part of the whole circulation. Assuming this to be the true proportion, the sum lost by Government, $6,474,722, multiplied by twenty-two, will give an aggregate $142,443,884.

But this vast sum is but a small part of the true amount lost by the people; for they lose at a much higher rate than in the fiscal transactions of the Government. This must be manifest from the laws which prohibit its officers from receiving bills of non-specie paying banks; from their superior knowledge to distinguish good from bad money; and from the bonds and securities taken to protect Government from loss in the failure of banks.

Take the recent deposite banks as an example. In the failure of some of these institutions, the bill-holders lost not less than fifty to seventy per cent. while the Government escaped without any loss whatever. Take also the case of loss from depreciation. In May, 1837, the banks throughou the country suspended specie payments, and their bills through the year circulated at from five to ten per cent. discount. Now, if the people lost only at the rate of six per cent. this would make a loss of near nine millions, estimating a loss to occur only on one payment, whereas, according to the supposition of Mr. Gallatin, each dollar performs ten payments during the year. But without supposing the community to lose on each payment, the loss from depreciation in 1837 has been estimated to amount to twenty-five to thirty millions, to say nothing of the severe losses from the same cause during the last year. But from this source Government has sustained no loss, excepting a short period during the war.

Take also the loss from small bills. One tenth part of the notes issued under five dollars, it has been estimated by experienced bankers, are never presented for payment to the banks. Like counterfeit and other spurious money, they ultimately fall into the hands of the poorer portion of the community, and become a loss to those who are least able to bear it. But from this source also Government has been protected from loss.

From these and other considerations, it must be clearly apparent, that the people, at the lowest calculation, have lost in the transaction of their business, at least five times as much as Government, from the use of a paper currency. This would give an aggregate of $712,219,420; equal to an annual loss $14,244,388, since the foundation of the Government.

But to this sum must be added the cost of our paper system, over and above a metallic one. I am aware that a paper currency has been advocated on the ground of its superior cheapness; but I believe it is so without due consideration of the immense sum required to pay the salaries of bank officers and other incidental expenses of the system.

According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the whole banking capital of the United States returned in January, 1839, was

Loans and discounts, - -	492 278 015
Invested in real estate, - -	16,607,832
Circulation, - - -	135,170,985
Specie in the banks. - -	45,132,673

Now we have a right to presume that the banks derived an income of six per cent. from the amount invested in their real estate, and an income from loans and discounts equal to six and a half per cent. the interest being paid in advance. At these rates, their receipts from their real estate were

	$996,469
From loans and discounts, -	31,398,070
Total income, - -	$32,394,539

The amount which they would have received as private individuals on that capital, would have amounted to only $19,627,950; showing a difference of $12,766,589. Now as the banks do not on an average divide over six per cent. on their capital, this sum of $12, 766,589 must be expended in the working of the system, and of course exhibit the gross amount of cost to the people of the country.

But in offset to this, it is contended that a paper currency increases the productive capital of the country, and, consequently, the amount of profit. This, sir, may be well doubted; for unless it enlarges the circulating medium, there will be only an exchange of capital. But if it does enlarge it, prices will be enhanced, and of course require a corresponding increase of capital to do the same amount of business. But allow that it does increase the productive capital to the amount contended for—the difference between the specie in the banks and the amount of their circulation. This, in January, 1839, would make an increase of ninety millions, and at six per cent. a sufficiently high rate for such an inflated state of the currency, be equal to an income of $5,400,000. The wear and tear of a metallic currency on that amount of circulation at one-seventh of one per cent. the estimate of Mr. Gallatin, would amount to $193,101. Add this to the above sum of $5,400,000, and we have $5.593,101, as the sum to be deducted from the $12,766,589, the gross cost; which operation leaves the sum of $7,173,488 as the nett cost of our paper over a metallic currency.

Look at the burdens thus imposed upon the people. The annual direct loss by the use of paper, we have seen, amounts to $14,244,388, and the nett cost of the system to $7,173,388; making an aggregate of $21,417,776—a sum greater than the annual expenses of our Government.

Now, sir, who pay this large sum? Is it the trader, merchant, and manufacturer? But they have no means to pay but in profits derived from the laborer and consumer. It is then a tax upon labor and consumption. And is that a just system of currency which imposes such burdens upon labor? which taxes the many for the benefit of the few? which multiplies the non-productive at the expense of the productive portion of the community? What better is it than the principle of taxation that prevails among the monarchies of the old world? Where is the security of property? Where the equal rights of the citizen? All, sir, at the mercy of a privileged order.

But there is another respect in which our paper currency operates most unequally, and that, too, at the expense of labor. Under a just and equitable system, property, labor, and the circulating medium, will maintain their true relative proportioned value. Neither will be elevated above its just worth, nor depressed below it. But such is not the case under our paper currency. In its rapid vibrations, prices lose their true proportion to each other, and the poor suffer at the expense of the rich. Capital is powerful, coercive, and grasping. It naturally seeks the largest profits, and does not, therefore, generally allow an increase of wages upon an expansion, until forced to do so.

When the price offered is equal to what is paid in other branches of business, requiring the same amount of skill, no increase can be effected without the consent of the capitalist, or by a general combination of the laborers. But neither the one nor the other can readily be obtained. Time is therefore required to effect a rise in wages, even after the laborer finds his profits absorbed, or greatly diminished, in the enhanced price of the necessaries of life. His wages are not determined by the profits of any particular branch of industry, but by the rates which the same amount of skill will generally command. If he leaves it in search of higher rewards, others will come in to supply his place. The natural consequence is, that labor is one of the last things to rise on an expansion, and the first to fall on a contraction of the currency. He is forced, through the operation of a fluctuating currency, to receive his wages at the rate of a sound, but in a depreciated one, and to purchase his necessaries at the high prices consequent upon such depreciation. And hence every great inflation of our currency operates to the depression of laborers.

The truth of this, Mr. Chairman, will readily be seen by comparing the price of wages with the price of the necessaries of life during any of the periods of great expansion.

The following table exhibits such a comparison with the amount of bank circulation in the years 1834, 1835, and 1836, in the town of my residence, in the district which I have the honor to represent.

	Bank circulation.	Carpenters' wages per day.	Flour per barrel.	Corn per bushel.	Pork per pound.
1834,	$94.839,570	$1 50	$5 75	78 cts.	9 cts.
1835,	103,692,495	1 50	6 50	100	10
1836,	140,301,038	1 75	9 75	120	14

From this it appears that, from 1834 to 1836, there was an increase in the currency of 48 per cent.; in the price of flour of 70 per cent; in the price of corn and pork of 54 per cent. each; while the increase in the price of wages was only 16⅔ per cent. The increase of the currency was not at the same per cent. owing to the speculative buying, and selling, and forestalling, to which such an expansion naturally leads. The difference between the rise of wages and of currency was 31 per cent.; between the rise of wages and of flour, 53 per cent.; and between the rise of wages and of corn and pork, 37 per cent.; making an average difference between the rise of labor and the necessaries of life amount to 42 per cent.

Now which was the best for the laborer; the higher wages of 1836, or the lower wages of 1834—nominal or real wages? Suppose him to have been paid in provisions, instead of money. In that case, he would have received for a week's wages in 1834, more than one barrel and a half of flour; while in 1836 it would have been even less than a barrel. In 1834 he would have received eleven and a half bushels of corn; but in 1836 only seven and a half bushels; and yet a currency which thus deludes the laborer with a slight nominal increase in his wages, but the more effectually to rob him of his hard earnings in the increased prices of the necessaries of life, is held up by the opponents of this bill to be not only identical with civilization, but the one of all others the most beneficial to the laboring community.

It will not be pretended, Mr. Chairman, that the laborer did not produce as much in 1836 as in 1834; but through the unjust operation of a bank expansion, we see he was wronged out for forty-two per cent. of his earnings—for the benefit of whom? Not for the Government—not for the honest trader and farmer, but to enrich foreigners, bankers, and speculators. Disguise it as we may, every inflation of our currency impoverishes our own, for the benefit of foreign labor. It greatly enhances the nominal price of articles beyond what they bear in other countries, without affording corresponding facilities in their production and manufacture here. It thus enables the foreigner to undersell us in our own markets. It gives to him all the advantage of manufacturing at low prices, and selling at high prices, for he receives his pay, not in our depreciated paper currency; if he does, it is immediately converted into gold and silver, the better currency, which gentlemen think our Government ought not to possess. According to their theory, there is no harm for the foreigner to be paid in the superior currency; but it is a horrid and unpardonable offence for the Government of their own country to be, even when it is directly calculated to secure to the whole people a greater amount of that better currency.

In practical effect, sir, there is no difference between rendering our yard stick shorter than that of England, and depreciating our currency below that of England. What purports to be the same, is not in reality the same measure—the representative of the same amount of value in the two countries. Ours, while inflated, is the shorter or cheaper, and measures out a less quantity of goods to the consumer. The difference between the two currencies has, at times, been estimated as high as twenty to thirty per cent. But whatever the difference is, to that extent it neutralizes the tariff, and operates as a bounty upon foreign, at the expense of American industry. To that extent we are the loser while we are the debtor of England, because we consume her goods under our high nominal prices, our shorter measure, while we are compelled to pay in merchandize or money under her higher standard, or greater measure of value.

Hence it is that the balance of trade has generally been against this country; and when that is the case, the English capitalists have but to refuse an extension of credit, to derange the whole business of our country, drain our banks of their specie, induce a suspension of specie payments, and, if our public revenue should be deposited in banks, close, if not bankrupt, the National Treasury itself.

It is now acknowledged on all hands that the suspension of specie payments was thus brought about in 1837. The Bank of England, finding her bullion greatly diminished, called upon her creditors, engaged in American business, for specie. Hence the run upon our banks, and the suspension throughout the Union.

Ought it longer to be considered, then, a doubtful question, whether our Government shall be compelled to be connected with the banking system? What dictate, sir, of patriotism, or wisdom, requires that the earnings of our citizens, and the finances of our Government, should be subject to the control of a foreign power? And yet it is the policy, if not the object, of the Opposition, to bring about such a connection between bank and State, as would leave the whole industry of our country at the mercy of the English nation; in fact, would lay the independence, and power, and wealth, of our people, at the feet of the moneyed power abroad, and the brokers and bankers leagued with it at home.

I am aware, sir, that this injurious operation of our currency is denied by the opponents of this bill. But how is it regarded by those who reap the rich harvest from it abroad? In their circular of the 22d of November last, the Messrs. Baring, Brothers, and Co. express their conviction that, by investments in our State stocks, "England employs her annual surplus of capital both safely and profitably, and encourages her best customer," alluding to our purchase of her manufactures. Now how so, if such loans, which tend powerfully to expand our currency, encourage, in a corresponding degree, our own industry, and enable us to manufacture proportionately cheaper? No, sir. If such was the case, her investments would not then encourage the sale of her manufactures with us; we should not, then, be the good customer represented.

This view of the subject is also confirmed by the admissions of the bank agents who have visited England for the sale of stocks. In a pamphlet published in London, and said to be written by James Duer, esq. of New York, is the following argument addressed to the British capitalist:

"The capital borrowed by the United States is not so withdrawn as to interfere in any manner with the circulation, or derange the currency of the country, [that is, Great Britain.] It is used in payment of the debt that the United States, in the course of trade, annually contracts. It is transferred by bills from the banker to the merchant, and is taken to America, not in bullion, but in British goods; every investment made, while it adds to the income of the capitalist, swells the profit of the manufacturer."

Not of the American but the British manufacturer, by increasing facilities for foreign remittances, and thus inducing excessive importations.

But there is stronger proof than any mere declarations of opinion, that an inflation of our currency leads to excessive importations. Whoever will compare the amount of our bank circulation with the amount of our imports, cannot fail of seeing the intimate connection between the two—how they mutually act and react upon each other. Every great expansion of our currency has been accompanied by excessive importations; and unless the balance due has been invested in some of our stocks, caused a demand upon the banks for specie, and a consequent contraction and prostration of business. Look at a few facts:

Year.	Bank circulation.	Imports.	Exports.
1816	$110,000,000	$147,103,000	$81,920,452
1817	69,000,000	99,250,000	87,671,569
1818	74,000,000	121,750,000	93,281,133
1819	62,000,000	87,125,000	70,142,521
1820	44,863,344	74 450,000	69,691,669

The effect of our bank circulation upon our importations is here most clearly manifest. In 1816, when our currency was more inflated than at any other period since the Revolution, as a natural consequence, our imports are seen to have increased from 113,000,000 in 1815 to 147,000,000 in 1816, while our exports amounted to less than 82,000,000. This was followed by a contraction of the circulation to 60,000,000, and of imports to 99,000,000. But the excessive issues of the United States Bank during 1817 increased the circulation to 74,000,000, and the imports from 99 in 1817 to 121 000,000 in 1818—showing an excess of over 28,000,000 of imports, which caused a demand for specie, a reduction of circulation to 44,000,000 in 1820, and general embarrassment and distress throughout the country.

Mr. Crawford, in speaking of this period, says:

"As there is no recorded example in the history of nations of the reduction of currency so rapid, so but few examples have occurred of distress so general."

This took place under the regulation of a United States Bank. Take, as another illustration, an expansion of a more recent date:

Year.	Bank circulation.	Imports.	Exports.
1832	$59,000,000	$101,029,266	$87,176,943
1833	65,500,000	108,118,311	90,140,433
1834	94,839,570	126,521,332	104,336,973
1835	103,692,495	149,895,742	121,693,577
1836	140,301,038	189,980 035	128,663,040
1837	149,185,890	140,989,217	117,419.376
1838	116,138,910	113,717,404	108,486.616
1839	135.170,995	157,609,560	118,359,004

From 1832 to 1834, the bank circulation is here seen to have increased from fifty-nine to ninety-four millions, accompanied by an increase of imports from one hundred and one to one hundred and twenty-six millions, and an increase of exports from eighty-seven to only one hundred and four millions. This left a large balance against us, but instead of being followed according to the laws of trade, by a demand of specie for exportation to pay the debt, the sale of State stocks abroad, through the facilities afforded by the United States Bank, caused an excess of specie importations. This produced an additional inflation—an increase, from 1834 to 1836, of forty-eight per cent. in the circulation, of fifty per cent. in the imports, and only twenty-four in the exports; showing how powerfully excessive issues stimulate excessive importations, and that one, if not the most efficient, way to prevent them, is to give more stability to our currency.

In 1837, the imports are seen to have fallen off, though there was an increase of circulation. This arose from the suspension of specie payments, and the consequent difficulty in making the proper remittances. But upon the resumption of specie payments the next year, the difficulty was removed, and the imports are seen to have again rose with the circulation.

It is this undue inflation of our currency, which has rendered competition with other nations so difficult, and so often prostrated our manufacturers It has periodically glutted our markets with foreign fabrics, paralyzed the arm of American industry, and entailed upon the country a foreign debt of near two hundred millions, to be wrung from the hard earnings of industry, in addition to the hundreds of millions of which the laboring community have already been robbed through the same unrighteous operation of an expanding and contracting currency. It yearly exacts a tribute from our people, for foreign nations, amounting to a sum, which, if imposed in the form of direct tax, would fire every patriot soul in the land, and raise a cry of oppression that would resound throughout the civilized world. But being in the form of an indirect tax, the burden is not only patiently borne, but the very system which imposes it lauded to the skies.

But we have been directed to look to England for illustrations, and to contrast her situation with that of France. Let us, sir, institute a comparison, and see if the condition of the English laborer will justify the assumptions of the paper currency advocates; let us see whether the French laborer should desire a more exclusive paper currency, however much it may be desired by ministers or other classes.

The currency of Great Britain is estimated at £70,000,000 or $340,000,000; of which £34,000,000 is specie.

The currency of France is estimated at £120,-000,000, or $580.000,000 in specie. The paper in 1837, was only $50,000,000, but is supposed to be rather more now. The Bank of France is allowed to issue no notes under 500 francs, equal to about $93 00, and the Bank of Havre none under 250 francs.

Now what is the effect of these two currencies upon prices? The difference between these two countries is not wholly owing to the State of the currency; but this, nevertheless, has an important influence.

According to the Foreign Quarterly Review, an English laborer's daily wages may be averaged at nine shillings a week; while a Frenchman's do not usually exceed six shillings—one-third less. But the same authority says the average price of wheat in England is 8s. 6d the bushel; while in Paris it is only five shillings—that is as 17 to 10. Consequently an English laborer can purchase a bushel of wheat with a week's work and have a six pence left; while the French laborer can purchase a bushel of wheat with a week's work and have a shilling left. Now, if we look only at the nominal prices, the advantage will appear altogether in favor of the English laborer; but if we look at the real prices—at what the wages in each country will command—the better test—the advantage in favor of the French laborer is seen to be no less than fifty per cent.

That the rewards of labor and the condition of laborers are both greatly depressed in France, cannot be denied. But this, sir, is not for the want of a more exclusive paper currency. If this is all that is wanting to render the laborer happy, prosperous, and elevated, the task of the philanthropist is indeed an easy one. The down trodden millions of humanity might then rise at once from their degradation of ages in all the glory of independent and happy freemen. But has paper currency such potency? Do we find such elevating and life-giving influence in all paper moneyed countries?

In Sweden, which by the way is held up by an honorable Senator [Mr. DAVIS] as a warning against a hard money currency, according to Storch, bills of the nominal value of nineteen cents are issued, and the "daily wages of a skilled agriculturalist are 7d. or 8d.; while the unskilled obtain no more than 3d. or 4d. and board themselves. Their food consists of hard bread, dried fish, and gruel without meat."

In Austria, where bills of about three dollars' value are issued, the mass of laborers have not yet fully obtained their freedom, but are compelled to work for the proprietors of the soil during every day of the week excepting Sunday.

In Russia, where paper of the value of about twenty cents circulates, the laborers are serfs or slaves.

In Denmark, where notes of the value of about eight cents are issued, the peasantry are also held in bondage, and bought and sold together with the land on which they labor.

If a paper currency is as identical with the well being of the laborer—is as essential to his elevation, as represented, why this degradation of laborers in paper moneyed countries? Why are the laborers of Russia grovelling in the bonds of ignorance and servitude? Why are those of Denmark bought and sold like beasts of burden? Why are those of Sweden stinted to a sum varying only from 3d. to 8d. per day? Why are agricultural wages, under the paper currency of Ireland, from whence have emigrated so many true friends of freedom, as low as 1s. to a 6d. a day, while they vary from $1 50 to $3 per day in Cuba, with its hard money currency?

No sir, it is not for the want of a more exclusive paper currency, that the laborer of France is no better off, but for the want of a better Government—of more freedom. He is now surrounded with restrictions. He is not free to labor how and where he will. Without a patent from Government, he cannot follow a trade, or carry his goods from province to province. Government determines how many bakers, how many butchers, how many printers there shall be. It comes in contact with individual enterprise, and cramps the industry of the country by arbitrary and unequal laws.

But with all the superior freedom of the English nation, what is the condition of her laboring population? No small portion, sir, without fault of their own, are doomed, from early childhood to premature old age, to unremitting toil, to gain the barest subsistence, to keep body and soul together. The lowest class of laborers, according to McCulloch, eat meat only once a week, and the most numerous class only two or three times a week. Considered as a whole, the London Quarterly Review says: "The English pauper is better fed than the independent laborer; the suspected thief receives considerably more food than the pauper; the convicted thief receives still more; and the transported felon receives every day nearly three times as much food as the honest peasant."

It is true, sir, that a greater portion of the laborers of France are deprived of the use of animal food; but does it follow that as a whole they are worse off? No, sir; so far from it, I have the authority of an English statesman, who speaks from observation and a critical examination of the subject, that the reverse is the case. Mr. Bulwer, in describing the condition of France, says:

"The comforts of the great mass of her inhabitants are, to say the least, as great as those of our own laborers—and upon the whole, their condition is better. To use the words of Mr. Birkbeck, "there are in France none of those exhibitions of profligacy which disgust you at every step in our country villages—no ragged wretches staggering home from a filthy ale house—nor is this to be attributed to poverty! the earnings of the laborer are one third more in proportion than in England."

In England, according to the same authority, one third of the wages of labor are required for the support of Government; in France only one sixth. In England, one sixth of the population are paupers; in France only one twentieth. In England, property is gathered together in masses—is in the possession of the few; in France it is divided and diffusive. In England, the increase of wealth has been most rapid; so also has been the frightful advance of pauperism. From 1814 to 1832, it appears, from Parliamentary documents, that the increase of population was twenty-five per cent.; of poor rates three hundred to four hundred per cent.; and of crimes three hundred per cent.

Now, why this marked difference? Why this rapid increase of pauperism in England? Why so great distress among her laboring population? It is not through any diminution of her aggregate wealth; for we are assured that the greatest misery is experienced where wealth is on the most rapid increase. The explanation, then, must be sought in her unequal laws of distribution. "But the legislative measures," says the London Quarterly Review, "which of all others have exercised the greatest influence on the distribution of wealth within the present century, and have operated most extensively to transfer it from one class to another, are the laws which regulate the circulating medium." Yes, sir, the English mode of regulating the currency, which is held up as worthy the admiration and support of the free and intelligent laborers of America is admitted to have operated more to the depression of laborers than any other laws of the realm. Nor is the admission made without the most ample evidence.

Take, for example, the bank expansion from 1790 to 1800. In 1790, when the circulation of the Bank of England was 10,000,000, the agricultural laborer could purchase eighty-two pints of wheat for a week's wages; but in 1800, when its circulation had expanded to 15,000,000, he could procure no more than fifty two pints. Is this a process of growing rich which the free laborers of the United States desire?

But lest this should be considered an isolated instance, and partly attributable to other causes, as it may be, contrast the circulation of the Bank of England with the price of wheat for a series of years, and see if the increase of the one has not been attended with an increase of the other like cause and effect.

From	Average circulation.	Average price of wheat.
1770 to 1780	£7,461,081	45s.
1780 to 1790	7,861,329	45s. 9d.
1790 to 1800	12,400,028	55s. 11d.
1800 to 1810	16,862,333	82s. 2d.
1810 to 1820	24,815,294	88s. 8d.
1820 to 1830	21,222,216	58s. 5d.

Here, sir, are facts and figures which show, beyond a doubt, the intimate connection between the amount of bank circulation, and the price of the necessaries of life. Each series of expansion are seen to have led to an additional rise in the price of wheat. But the wrong did not stop there. It is the nature of evil to beget evil. Each increase in the price of wheat put the means of subsistence still further out of the reach of the laborer, and thus led to an increase of pauperism from about £1,000,000 of poor rates in 1770 to over £8,000,000 in 1820.

But, while the Bank thus wrung from the laborer his earnings, to a degree bordering upon famine, its income was augmented in a corresponding ratio. The distribution of profits from 1790 to 1832 are stated to have amounted "to £51,546,666, a sum almost ten times greater than the average produce of all the mines of the world during the nine and a half years preceding 1832."

To such a degree has the paper system of England operated to the privation and suffering of her working classes, that Mr. Huskinson declared "that if England had a steady metallic currency, the body of the population would remain unoppressed." Whether this is true in its full extent, may be doubted; but certain it is that her stock and banking systems have proved the greatest engine of oppression in the administration of her Government. Without the facilities which they have afforded of taxing future generations to minister to the ambition and unholy passions of the present, it never could have waged its unrighteous wars—never could have entailed upon the English people a debt of £800,000,000, to pay the interest on which, is crushing her laboring people into poverty and the grave.

This enormous debt, sir, with all its attendant evils of pauperism, crime, and distress, is but one of the legitimate fruits of the connection of bank and State. Before its establishment, it is matter of history that "loans were contracted only for short periods, assigning funds to redeem the principal and interest." To relieve Government from this wholesome check, and the embarrassments of wasteful expenditures, the Bank was established; and as the expenditures and debt of the Government have increased, the power of the Bank has expanded, until it now exercises a controlling influence, not only over trade and commerce, but over the Government itself.

Is it a sufficient answer to all this to point us, as my colleague has done, to the power, wealth, and dominion of the British nation? Sir, what avails it that she has "become the queen, not of Europe only, but of Asia," while millions of her population are dying of starvation in the East, and millions more, on her own proud isle, are reduced to the very point of starvation, to enable the privileged few to roll in splendor and riot in luxury, but to show us, in characters of living light,

"——— How wide the limits stand Between a splendid and a happy land."

Like causes will produce like effects. It is the natural operation of our banking system to accumulate wealth in masses. Both as a principle of taxation and distribution, it is unequal and unrighteous. Already has it disturbed the natural order of society—already has it divided our population into classes, the unprivileged many and the privileged few, clamorous for the spoils of industry and the control of Government; and unless it is arrested in its career of conquest, our Government will degenerate into a moneyed aristocracy, and the degradation and suffering of the English laborer be the fate of our own.

It is due to the laborers, if to no other portion of our people, that the connection between bank and State should be severed. Too long has it given an undue ascendency of privilege over right, and of capital over labor, in the legislation of our country. Too long has it extended its sanction and a shield of protection over the wrongs and the outrages, which the system has inflicted upon the laboring community. They are entitled to higher rewards of industry, to more ample protection, and to a fuller enjoyment of their rights, than has yet been secured to them by the laws of their country.

I do not say, Mr. Chairman, that there should be no paper and no credit; but I do believe that there should be no paper of denominations to expose labor to the loss of its earnings, and no monopoly of credit to render it tributary to its exactions. What is wanted is a stable and uniform currency. None other can secure stable markets; none other can secure to labor the fruits of its earnings—or be the true representative of the amount of value intended in the transfer of property or services. It is essential to secure justice between contracting parties, between debtor and creditor, between employer and employed.

And it is one of the greatest recommendations of the measure under consideration, that it will render most essential aid in the attainment of these important objects. It will give more uniformity and stability to the currency by infusing more specie into it. It will not only check overissues by the amount required in the receipts and disbursements of Government, and by withholding its mark of "good" upon bank paper; but by creating a constant demand for specie it will bring paper to the test of convertibility, and thus compel banks to keep their issues within safer limits to meet such demands. And as far as it does this—as far as it infuses more specie into the currency—I have high Whig authority, the testimony of Mr. Gallatin, that it will check violent expansions and contractions, and operate beneficially upon the banks and upon the currency at large. The following is an extract from his "Considerations on the Currency and Banking System:"

"We have had an opportunity to witness in France the salutary effects of a currency consisting principally of the precious metals, not only in cases of great national difficulty, but also for the specific purpose of reinstating a bank momentarily endangered by overissues of paper. But we prefer referring to the evidence of a very able and practical witness, who was also deeply interested in the issue, and we will extract this from the work of another distinguished and practical writer, [Tooke on Currency.]"

"Of the comparative facility with which the coffers of a bank, which has suffered too great a reduction of its resources by imprudent issues of paper, may be replenished out of a circulation, consisting in a great proportion of coin, notwithstanding a coincident demand for large payments abroad, a strong instance is afforded in the case of the Bank of France, in 1817 and 1818. The circumstance is thus stated in Mr. Baring's evidence in March, 1819."—Vide Report of Lord's committee on the resumption of cash payments, p. 103.

"Speaking of a drain which that bank had experienced, he says:

"Their bullion was reduced, by imprudent issues, from one hundred and seventeen millions of francs to thirty-four millions of francs, and has returned, by more prudent and cautious measures, to one hundred millions of francs, at which it stood ten days ago, when I left Paris. This considerable change took place since the first week in November, when the amount of specie in that bank was at its lowest. It must, however, be always recollected, that this operation took place in a country, every part of the circulation of which is saturated with specie, and, therefore, no inference can be drawn in favor of the possibility of so rapid an operation in this country, where, owing to the absence of specie in circulation, the supply must entirely come from abroad; for in Paris, though some portions may have come from foreign countries, the great supply must undoubtedly have come through all the various small channels of circulation through that kingdom."

"Again, in the same evidence, page 105:

"Q. Has not France, after two years of great scarcity in corn, and two years of foreign contribution, been able to contribute a proportion of the precious metals to the wants of Russia and Austria?

"A. Undoubtedly, the precious metals have been supplied from France to Russia and Austria, and shipped, to a considerable amount, to America, notwithstanding the payments to foreign powers, and very large payments for imported corn, whilst, at the same time, wine having almost totally failed for several years past, they were deprived of the most essential article of their export."

"And in reference to these payments, in the preceding answer, Mr. Baring states that they 'produced no derangement whatever of the circulation of that country, (France.)'

"It may not be unimportant further to remark, that the state of the currency in France, ever since the suppression of the assignats, appears to be decisive of the great advantages attending a metallic circulation, in times of political difficulty and danger. On no one great occasion did her efforts appear to be paralyzed or even restricted, by any derangement of the currency; and in two instances of her territory being occupied by an invading army, there does not appear to have been any material fluctuation in its value."

This measure will thus secure to the manufacturer two things, among those most essential to the success of his business. In the first place, it will preserve inviolate the constitutional specie standard of value, and hold it up as the true measure in the business transactions of the country. And there can be no portion of the business community who are more interested in the preservation of this standard, in its purity, than our manufacturers, as there is none which has suffered more through an unstable and fluctuating currency. It has rendered their business one of great hazard, and ruinous uncertainty. They want, what this bill proposes, a fixed measure—a stable currency—to enable them to determine whether they can manufacture at profit, and a uniform one, to secure full returns of profit.

In the next place, it will operate beneficially by checking excessive importations. As it creates a demand for specie, in that proportion, it will prevent its exportation for the purchase of foreign fabrics. It will also withhold the public revenue from the merchants to make importations with. Under the deposite system the revenue is often both an effect and a cause of overaction. It forms a basis for discounts to merchants. Each new discount furnishes additional means for new importations; and each new importation furnishes in turn new deposites, and thus the process of inflation goes on, until the deposites are called for, or the bubble bursts. In proportion to the tendency to overaction, are the means furnished for over importations. The people's money is added to the merchant's to aggravate the evil. But under the proposed measure, the public revenue cannot be loaned out to stimulate over importations. Whenever overtrading commences, specie will begin to accumulate in the vaults of the Treasury, until it forces the banks to withhold accommodations, and thus to check the tendency to excess, and prevent foreign goods from being brought so extensively into competition with our own.

This measure is thus clearly calculated to benefit the manufacturer; and, what is also important to the interest of the laborer, to enlist the banking and commercial interests in favor of an economical Administration—in favor of confining expenditures to the necessary wants of Government.

It thus appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that the President, in recommending this measure, has not shown himself opposed to the interests of the laborer and manufacturer, but their true, firm, and enlightened friend. He has shown himself for protecting labor by recommending the enactment of equal and wholesome laws; and for elevating the laborer, by giving him time for mental improvement. These are no less the rights of the laborer than essential to his highest well being. He cannot rise to his proper station while fettered by partial laws, and borne down by heavy burdens. There must be equality of legislation—there must be time for mental improvement—to secure to him the fruits of his labor and the blessings of freedom. Goldsmith says—

"'Tis true in every soil,
These who think will govern those who toil."

And such will be the case if the opposite policy is allowed to prevail. But let the laborer have time for mental improvement, as the President recommends; let manual and mental toil be united—let them keep pace together—let them be joined in indissoluble bonds; and then those who toil, as of right belongs to them, will be governors instead of the governed. Thought, sir, is the magic lever by which individuals and communities are moved and controlled. Develope the most thought among laborers, and the empire of the world is theirs.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY,

OF ALABAMA.

In Senate, Saturday, June 13, 1840—On the motion of Mr. ROANE to print 20,000 copies of the Report of the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama rose, in reply to Mr. CRITTENDEN of Kentucky, and Mr. PRESTON of South Carolina, and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: This debate has assumed a most extraordinary character. The simple question now before the Senate is, whether 20,000 extra copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia, upon the plan submitted by the Secretary of War for their reorganization and discipline, shall be printed? With that question alone before the Senate, what a discursive range have gentlemen thought proper to give to the discussion! The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] have both complained that the report of the committee is to be printed and sent out before the question is tried.

Sir, said Mr. C. what question is to be tried? Not whether the plan of the Secretary of War is to be adopted and carried out. Not whether any former projet of General Knox, General Harrison, or of any other person, whose plans are treated of in the report, shall be sanctioned by the Senate. No, sir; the report of the committee expressly repudiates all those plans. After going through a detail and examination of the various projets, recommended and proposed by different individuals of the Executive and Legislative departments, the committee expressly declare—

"With so many instances of fruitless attempts to change our militia system before them, your committee are not prepared to adopt the plan recommended by the Secretary of War, nor to make any other material change in the organization and discipline of the militia, at present."

It is thus demonstrated that the committee are opposed to the adoption of Mr. Poinsett's plan, and, at the same time, opposed to any other material change of our system; and the only proposition they submit to the Senate, is, "that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

The only question for immediate consideration is, on the motion of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. ROANE,] to print the 20,000 extra copies of the report. In this there is nothing unusual—it is the practice of every day. Does the Senator from South Carolina deny that the facts set forth are true? I do not understand him to do so; nor has he pointed out any errors of fact. His complaints all go to the views and opinions of the committee upon those facts. Whether they be correct, or not, will be submitted to the country for determination; and Mr. C. said with that tribunal he was willing to rest the question.

While the Senator from South Carolina admits he had read the report of the committee, Mr. C. said, he was persuaded the gentleman had not examined its contents with much attention, else he would not have complained that the committee had not set forth the plan submitted by the Executive, "nor any analysis of it." Still less would he have complained that the committee had not given their opinion of it. It is true, said Mr. C. the report does not set forth the entire projet of the Secretary of War, nor was it at all usual to pursue that course, more especially in regard to documents of such considerable length, and when, too, that paper had been sent forth on the wings of the wind, and circulated far and wide, not only through the Whig papers, from the Aroostook to the Sabine, but by the celebrated Executive Committee, composed of his political friends, with the portentous and alarming caption, in Romancapitals: "PLAN OF THE STANDING ARMY OF 200,000 MEN, SUBMITTED TO CONGRESS BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR, AND RECOMMENDED BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES."

Mr. C. said, perhaps the committee had not given so minute or extended an analysis of the Secretary's plan, as the astute and learned gentleman would have given it had the task devolved on him; but they certainly had not omitted it altogether. They had given the general outline of the plan, in the first place, showing into how many classes the whole body of the militia were to be divided. They had shown within what ages militia duty was to be performed. They had shown the amount and character of individual burdens which were to be borne; as regarded arming themselves, and the time they were to be mustered or trained. They had shown to what extent they were to be armed and equipped at the public expense, and to what extent at their own expense. And they had shown that the Secretary proposed paying, as well as arming and subsisting the whole of the active class, while they were being trained. Yet the gentleman says the committee has given no analysis of the Secretary's plan! So, he said, we had given no opinion of it—when the report shows we wholly rejected it. I trust the Senator will do the committee the justice to make these corrections when he comes to write out his speech for publication.

Mr. C. said he thought he knew what sort of report would have been satisfactory to the Senator from South Carolina and to the Senator from Kentucky; and he would submit it to the candor of those gentlemen and their friends to say whether he was not correct. If the committee had intended to hit the taste and meet the approbation of the gentlemen, they should have reported, in substance—that the Secretary's projet was entirely new, unprecedented, and unparalleled in the history of our own, or of any other Republican Government, from the foundation of the world—that it was a bold and reckless attempt at the unhallowed usurpation of all power; military as well as civil—that it was nothing less than an artfully devised scheme of the present occupant of the White House, to create a standing army of 200,000 men, with whose aid he intended to hold on to the Government, whether re-elected or not, and to establish a cruel and absolute despotism over the good people of this country, on the ruins of the Constitution! And they should have concluded by calling on the people to rally in the defence of their rights and relieve their country from the impending danger! If the committee had so reported, Mr. C. said he would venture the most confident opinion that there would have been no complaint that they had not set forth the report of the Secretary, nor given any analysis thereof. Not only would all censure have been hushed into silence, but the committee would have been lauded for their intelligence, their patriotism, and independence. Nay, sir, they would have been admitted into the modern Whig church, without giving in any other experience, and without any further pledge of "uncompromising hostility to the re-election of Mr. Van Buren."

The Senator from South Carolina moved to print Mr. Poinsett's plan—for what? Not because there was to be any action upon it, at the instance of any friend of the Administration, or of any body else; the simple question was, whether the committee should be discharged from its further consideration; to which there would be no objection, it might be presumed, from any quarter. What motive, then, could there be now for printing the Secretary's report? Mr. C. said he could imagine no motive, except for political effect; and he thought this sufficiently evinced by the Senator's resistance of his [Mr. C.'s] motion to print the several reports of General Harrison, with that of Mr. Poinsett. By that course, he said, it would be made apparent, that Mr. Poinsett's plan was not the only one obnoxious to the censures and denunciations of that Senator and his friends; but that his distinguished friend of "North Bend" (to whose service he believed the Senator had "devoted his time, talents, and purse,") had gone fully as far—nay, far beyond any of those who had preceded, or come after him. The effect of this course would be to give the light of truth to the country upon the much distorted and misrepresented plan of the Secretary of War, and ensure the award of justice to that much injured individual, as well as to the President. I ask (said Mr. C.) if they are to suffer condemnation for doing that which others have done with impunity, and, perhaps, without even censure? I demand whether the President and Secretary are to be denounced for following in the footsteps of the father of his country? For, as our report shows, the plan of General Knox, which was expressly approved and adopted by General Washington, is the basis of Mr. Poinsett's plan. And, more especially, are the Senators from South Carolina and Kentucky fit accusers on this occasion, when they are endeavoring to elevate to the Chief Magistracy, a man who has outstripped all others in the extravagance of his views and propositions on this subject?

Is Mr. Poinsett in favor of "camps of discipline?" so is General Harrison. In his report of 1817, repeated in 1819, he alludes to the "error, indeed, common to all the militia systems in use in the United States, that the periods of training were too short and too distant from each other, to produce much benefit." He adds: "To remedy this defect, five camps of discipline have been recommended." The same views are expressed in his letter to Governor Scott of Kentucky, as will presently appear.

Is Mr. Poinsett in favor of training 100,000 militia? so is General Harrison. In his letter to Governor Scott, written at "Vincennes, 10th of March, 1809," while he was Governor of Indiana, he alludes to his having then "recommended camps of discipline for those who are already capable of bearing arms." He also remarks: "Professorships of tactics should be established in all our seminaries"—the same idea inculcated in his reports made in Congress, in 1817 and 1819, wherein the same plan, extended to primary schools, is distinctly proposed, (as shown in the report of the committee,) and the military education of "all the youth of the United States" at the public expense. When gentlemen speak of monstrosities, and meditated infractions of the Constitution, I beg them to bear this in mind, and show from what clause of the Constitution is derived this stupendous plan for "the education of all the youth of the United States," and "the whole expense of the establishment to be borne by the public Treasury?"

But, Mr. President, to the point of training

100,000 militia at the public expense, which is a distinct proposition, independent of the four or five millions of dollars, which would now be annually expended for the military education of all the youth of the United States. In the same letter of General Harrison to Governor Scott, he remarks:

"It will, no doubt, be urged as a reason for continuing the old plan, (of mustering the militia for short periods,) that the poorer class of citizens cannot spare five or six weeks in a year from their farms, to learn military duty. I know they cannot without being paid. But is not our Government able to pay them?"

Remember this was more than thirty one years ago; when our fiscal resources were not half equal to what they now are; and how does he answer the questio? "Is not our Government able to pay them?" He immediately follows the question by this answer: "If not, they ought to make themselves so, by laying on additional taxes."

What think you, Mr. President, of that idea for a "retrenchment and reform candidate for the Presidency?" If the Government is not able to pay the expense of mustering the militia for five or six weeks in the year, "they ought to make themselves so, by laying on additional taxes." Such are General Harrison's views of economy! However, let us give him the benefit of his own argument, which follows:

"But I am persuaded that the money, which is devoted to other objects, might be more usefully, and certainly more consistently, applied to this purpose. Under our present circumstances, the six thousand regular troops we have, are very proper, but I think that one hundred thousand disciplined militia would be better, and that the money which is spent in the former, would soon effect the discipline of the latter. I am far from thinking a fleet unnecessary, and there is no man who attaches more importance to the improvement of our country by canals and roads."

Thus, sir, (said Mr. CLAY,) if Mr. Poinsett is for training the militia annually, for a period not exceeding thirty days, General Harrison is for training them five or six weeks. The maximum of the of the former is thirty days; that of the latter is forty-two days.

Is Mr. Poinsett in favor of paying the militia for the time spent in training? So is General Harrison; and, if the money be not in the Treasury, it ought to be raised "by laying on additional taxes."

The Senator from South Carolina has even seized upon particular words—such as, when the men are being trained, they are spoken of as being in "service," and as being "paid" for their services, and furnished "rations," &c. Such are the expedients to which the gentleman resorts to excite and to keep up prejudices, and sustain the imputation of a contemplated standing army. Mr. C. said he would not spend much time in combating such arguments as these; he would, however, remind the gentleman of a maxim, with which, from his profession, he should be familiar—qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice—and that, in placing a construction upon a sentence or paragraph, at all doubtful or obscure, reference should always be had to the context. Pursuing this principle, it would be very obvious that the terms which he had noticed, were applied to the time, subsistence, and remuneration of the corps to be disciplined. But (Mr. C. said) if the gentleman would put himself to the trouble of examination, he might find precedent enough for the use of such terms in the same high authority—the resolution, letter, and reports of his favorite chief, (General Harrison,) as well as in the report of General Knox. Mr. C. said he thought it should be sufficient to exempt Mr. POINSETT from very severe censure, or reproach, with any friend of General Harrison, to show that he was sustained by his example; and he would be glad to know from the Senator from South Carolina how it was that he could condemn the Secretary of War with such unsparing bitterness for his projet; and, in the same breath, sing pæans of unqualified praise in behalf of his great Whig leader, who had gone immeasurably farther?

If additional evidence were required to show the ultra views of General Harrison upon the subject of training and disciplining the militia, it is to be found in his proposition to extend the power already conferred on the General Government by an amendment of the Constitution, which he offered in the House of Representatives of the United States on the 28th February, 1817; and again at the ensuing session of Congress, so determined was he on his purpose. Omitting the preamble, which is merely formal, the amendment proposed is in the following words:

"Congress shall, concurrently with the States, have power to provide for training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed for that purpose, and, whilst engaged in that service, they shall be subject to the rules and regulations prescribed for the government of the militia when in the military service of the United States; and, also, to provide for teaching, in the primary schools and other seminaries of learning in the several States, the system of discipline prescribed for the militia."

Sir, what an immense accumulation of power to the General Government was here sought to be effected! Nothing less than the power now belonging to the States, which, added to that already possessed by Congress, under the Constitution as it is, would have eventuated in nothing short of consolidation. The committee have given their construction of it in their report; I yet believe it to be sound, and, as neither its accuracy nor justice has been questioned by the friends of General Harrison, so far as I have heard, I will here adopt it as my own. The committee remark:

"It will be borne in mind, that the existing provision of the Constitution expressly reserves 'to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.' The object of the proposed amendment of the Constitution, which will be found appended to this report, was to give Congress, 'concurrently with the States,' the 'power to provide for training the militia,' and further declaring, that 'whilst engaged in that service [that is, being trained] they shall be subject to the rules and regulations prescribed for the government of the militia, when in the military service of the United States,'" &c.

"The effect of this amendment to the Constitution, if it had been adopted, would have been to concede to the authorities of the General Government, whenever it might be deemed expedient to exercise it, the most ample power to train and discipline the militia, in such manner, and for such length of time, as Congress might have directed or authorized, limited only by their discretion. Conferring on Congress, in general terms, power concurrently with the States—and, of course, to the same extent—discretionary authority might have been given to the President, or any other functionary of the General Government, to have trained the militia, in any number, at any place, at any season, and for any portion of the year. Further, it would have subjected them, expressly, while being trained or disciplined, to the same 'rules and regulations prescribed for he government of the militia, when in the military service of the United States;' in other words, it would have subjected them, in time of peace, and when assembled for the mere purpose of being trained or disciplined to 'the rules and articles of war.'"

Let it be remembered, sir, that when this amendment was offered, the rules and articles of war permitted severe and ignominious corporal punishments to be inflicted on regular soldiers for many offences considered trivial by those in private life. What a stretch of power, to inflict such punishments on militia, for slight insubordination, or trifling derelictions of duty, whilst being trained in time of peace!

But, Mr. President, (said Mr. C.) I must pause in my reply to the Senator from South Carolina, till I make some answer to a portion of the remarks which fell from the Senator from Kentucky, who, I regret, is not now in his seat. The other day, amongst other remarks I had the honor to submit, on this same subject, without any intention to provoke a debate on the political principles of General Harrison, in reply to the Senator from South Carolina, I expressed my surprise that he, professing the principles of a State Rights politician, could enter so warmly into the support of a "black cockade Federalist." The remark was casual and incidental, and it was not then my purpose to dwell upon the subject any further. The Senator from Kentucky, however, seems to have determined not to suffer the remark to pass by unnoticed—for he has obviously, with some preparation, entered into a formal defence of General Harrison's political character, and has brought forward evidence to exculpate him from the charge. I am not accustomed to make imputations against any man, unless upon grounds at least satisfactory to myself; and, whenever I am charged with so doing, I feel bound to sustain the accusation, or to make the amende honorable. I am not disposed to depart from that rule on this occasion; and, as I confidently believe the charge to be well founded, I shall endeavor to sustain it.

In allusion to my remark, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] deprecated the terms employed, which were no other than those I have mentioned, as approbrious epithets. However they may be politically, they certainly are not personally approbrious, and were not so intended when used by me. But, sir, the time was, when, so far from being regarded as odious, or offensive, the name of Federalist was courted by many of the distinguished men of this country as highly honorable. As a political party name, it had its origin with the Constitution itself. This country then, as it always has been, was divided into two great parties. One of those parties was in favor of so framing the Constitution, as to centralize all possible power in the Federal, or General Government; they objected to the Constitution because it did not give sufficient power, and therefore took the name of Federal party. The other party was opposed to building up too strong a Government here, and, on that ground, many of the distinguished sages and patriots of the Revolution deprecated the adoption of the Constitution—they believed it delegated too much power—they were in favor of retaining more power with the States—and were then called the Republican or Democratic party. Notwithstanding the opposition of many of the latter party, however, the Constitution was adopted. Yet the contest between these parties did not end here. No sooner was the Government organized, than the Federalists, those who had been in favor of giving great powers to this Government by express delegation, began a struggle to extend its powers by construction. The Republicans insisted that the Government should be restricted to the powers expressly delegated, and those absolutely necessary and proper for carrying them into execution. The Federalists maintained, most absurdly, as the other party has always believed, that the words "promote the general welfare," in the preamble to the Constitution, constituted a substantive and distinct grant of power, when it was merely amongst the inducements to the actual delegations of power, which followed in the body of the instrument. This was the plain line of demarkation between the two great political parties, at the foundation of the Government; and, sir, it has continued down to the present day. The first United States Bank, and other kindred measures, during the Administration of General Washington, were those of the Federal party, headed by Hamilton, and designed to enlarge and increase the power of this Government. The alien and sedition laws, for whose constitutionality no one is now bold enough to contend, and the large standing army of the elder Adams, with the badge called the "black cockade," were the distinguishing characteristics of his administration; and to call a man a "black cockade Federalist," is simply to designate him as a friend and supporter of that Administration. This, sir, is what I intended, when I applied the name to General Harrison—no more.

Now, sir, the question arises, did the facts justify me in so characterizing him? I do not hesitate to maintain, they did; and I go further, and will show by proofs, most conclusive and satisfactory, that the whole history of his subsequent political life has but gone to confirm and stamp that character upon him. Upon what evidence do I rely to convict him of black cockade Federalism? It is this: In the first place, the evidence of the late John Randolph of Virginia, who charged him to his teeth, upon this very floor of the Senate, with having been "an open, zealous, frank supporter of the sedition law, and black cockade Administration." And did General Harrison deny the charge? Did he, as an innocent man, feeling the imputation to be opprobrious and unwarrantable, repel it, and roundly contradict Mr. Randolph, and defy him to the proof? No, sir; no. Listen to his qualified, evasive, and disingenuous answer:

"Mr. Harrison said that he could not refrain from making his acknowledgments to the gentleman from Virginia for the notice he had been pleased to take of him. He has been pleased to say that, in the administration of Mr. Adams, I was a Federalist, and he comes to that conclusion from the course pursued by me in the session of 1799-1800. At that session, the gentleman and myself met for the first time—he in the station of Representative from Virginia, and I in the more humble one of Delegate from the Northwestern Territory. Having no vote, I did not think it proper to take part in the discussion of any of the great political questions which divided the two parties. My business was to procure the passage of the bills which I had introduced for the benefit of the people I represented. The gentleman had no means of knowing my political principles, unless he obtained them in private conversation. As I was upon terms of intimacy with the gentleman, it is very probable that he might have heard me express sentiments favorable to the then Administration. I certainly felt them—so far, at least, as to the course pursued by it in relation to the Government of France. Nor (said Mr. H.) was I unsupported in that opinion by those who had a right to control my actions, if not my opinions. In no part of the country were those measures more decidedly approbated than by my immediate constituents—the Legislature of the Northwestern Territory: as the address of that body to the President during that session will show. For Mr. Adams (said Mr. H.) I entertained at that time, and have ever since entertained, the greatest respect. I believed him to be an honest man and a pure patriot, and his conduct during that session proved him to be such. This opinion I have (said Mr. H.) was entertained by those two able and upright statesmen, John Marshall and James A. Bayard."

In this extract from General Harrison's reply to Mr. Randolph, he says: "Having no vote, I did not think it proper to take part in the discussion of any of the great political questions which divided the two parties." Was not the standing army of John Adams, and its reduction, one of "the great political questions which divided the two parties?" Who can deny it? I would hazard little in saying, there is not a man now living in the United States, who was then an intelligent boy of ten years old, who does not know that the large standing army of the elder Adams was one of the prominent measures of his Administration. It was cause of great alarm to the whole Republican party—nay, sir, to all the friends of constitutional liberty—that with the then limited resources of the country, its Government in the hands of those who had endeavored, in the very formation of the Constitution, to aggregate and centralize in it all power, and in a time of peace, that a law should have been passed, in little more than a year after the commencement of that Administration, "to augment the army of the United States" to the amount of "twelve additional regiments of infantry, and six troops of light dragoons, and to appoint two Major Generals, an Inspector General, three Brigadier Generals, and an Adjutant General." Why, sir, I have not had time to turn to the act and ascertain the precise number of men to a regiment, but if the same number was then required, as now, to constitute one, each regiment contained more than seven hundred men, and twelve regiments of infantry, and six troops of light dragoons, would have amounted to an addition of nine thousand men; and probably augmenting the whole army to twelve thousand. We must have quadrupled our resources since that period, and our need of regular troops has perhaps increased in proportion. We have been, since the commencement of this Administration, as much in danger of a war with Great Britain, as we then were in danger of a war with France. Suppose Mr. Van Buren had called for a proportionate augmentation of the standing army, it would have increased it to fifty thousand men! What Republican, what patriot, would not have had cause of alarm? Why, sir, even the Opposition, the Federal party of the present day, as they are out of power, would have sounded the tocsin of alarm throughout the mountains and valleys of this wide spread Confederacy, and would have called on the people to come to the rescue. Whether they would, or not, sure I am, that every Democrat would have denounced the President as a deserter from his professed principles, and have abandoned his support forever.

Then, sir, it is fair to set down the proposition pending in January, 1800, to repeal the law creating the standing army of the elder Adams, as one of "the great political questions which divided the two parties"—the declaration of General Harrison to the contrary notwithstanding; and against that proposition he voluntarily made a speech in the House of Representatives of the United States, on the 9th of January, 1800.

In the same speech, made in the Senate in reply to Mr. Randolph's charge that he was "an open, zealous, and frank supporter of the sedition law, and black cockade Administration," General Harrison also made this remark: "The gentleman [Mr. Randolph] had no means of knowing my political principles, unless he obtained them in private conversation." Yet he made the speech in support of the standing army, as already mentioned, and unnecessarily, I may add, except to show his "zeal" in support of "the sedition law and black cockade Administration"—as, being authorized to give no vote, he, of course, had none to explain. But, after these disingenuous attempts at evasion, he makes a contingent confession, by saying: "As I was upon terms of intimacy with the gentleman, [Mr. Randolph,] it is very probable that he might have heard me express sentiments favorable to the then Administration." And he concludes his reply on this point, by the avowal of his belief in the pure patriotism of Mr. Adams, and bringing to his support the concurrence of "those two able and upright statesmen, John Marshall and James A. Bayard"—two gentlemen distinguished for ultra Federalism throughout their lives! Is it not a little singular that general Harrison never brings forward a Republican witness to prove his own Republicanism? We have had exhibited, in the course of this debate, the certificate of Judge Burnet, of Cincinnati, who avows himself to have been heretofore a Federalist, (nor does he pretend to have changed,) to prove General Harrison to have been a Jeffersonian Republican! I shall remark on this testimony hereafter. Let the old General now speak for himself. Here is the resolution for the repeal of the laws which had augmented the army to the truly alarming extent already noticed:

"Resolved, That so much of the act passed the 16th of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled 'An act to augment the army of the United States, and for other purposes,' as authorizes the President of the United States to raise twelve additional regiments of infantry and six troops of light dragoons, and to appoint two major generals, an inspector general, three brigadier generals, and an adjutant general; and so much of the act passed the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, entitled 'An act for the better organizing of the troops of the United States, and for other purposes,' as authorizes the appointment of a commander of the army, and a quartermaster general, ought to be repealed.

"Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a committee of the whole House."

On the 9th January, 1800, Mr. Harrison, (the present General William Henry Harrison, the nominee of the Harrisburg Convention for the Presidency,) made a speech against the above resolution.

This speech is to be found in Duane's Aurora of the 5th February, 1800, and is therein thus reported:

"Mr. Harrison said: The resolution has been so ably spoken to, that it could not be expected to receive any new light from what he should add; but when it was recollected that he had no other way of expressing his opinion on any subject that came before the House, than by taking part in the debate—not having a vote in the House—he trusted he need make no apology for rising on the present subject, which to him appeared an important one."

"He was fully of opinion that the disbanding so large a portion of the military force would be attended with disastrous consequences. In giving this opinion, he was sure he spoke that of nine-tenths of his constituents, and that they would with much more readiness bear their proportion of the expense which would be necessary to maintain these forces than that they should be disbanded.

"The employment of his past life, Mr. Harrison said, had led him to believe that too much reliance was placed on the militia. Were valor or alertness the only requisites in the formation of a good soldier, he should willingly give the militia that character. But these are only partial qualities compared with those whom they may be called to meet. What would their valor do if attacked by the military tactics of a Bonaparte or a Massena? Nothing short of discipline will do for our forces. And are our militia well disciplined? No, sir, they are not.

"Mr. Harrison said he had experienced the inconvenienees of a militia army. In 1794, he went out with a number of the militia of his part of the country against the Indians. When brought into action they behaved very well; they did not want courage, but after a very short service they wanted to go home; they were anxious to see their families, and therefore numbers deserted and left the army in a state which was almost the cause of its destruction.

"He had experienced seven years' service with the militia but was sorry to say, such was their conduct that he never could think of trusting the country entirely to their protection. They might do well with regular troops, and no doubt would. Under these impressions, and from this experience, he knew he spoke the will of a great proportion of his constituents—he sincerely hoped the resolution would not pass."

This was Gen. Harrison's speech in favor of the enormous standing army of the elder Adams, which, perhaps, created as much excitement and alarm as any other measure of his odious and execrable administration. He said "he had experienced the inconvenience of a militia army—after a very short service they wanted to go home, they were anxious to see their families, and, therefore, numbers deserted, and left the army in a state which was almost the cause of its destruction." "He had experienced seven years' service with the militia, but was sorry to say, such was their conduct, that he could never think of trusting the country entirely to their protection." Very complimentary to our citizen soldiery, indeed! To say nothing of many similar victories, who fought the victorious battles against the Creek Indians, in the war of 1812? The militia. Who won the ever-memorable victories of the 23d of December, 1814, and the 8th of January, 1815, below New Orleans? Mainly, the militia. Yes, sir, and whenever they have good and brave officers to command them—a Washington, a Jackson, and many others who might be named—they will achieve like deeds of valor and glory, and crown themselves with never fading laurels.

One other view, Mr. President, of this celebrated speech, which has fortunately risen up to bear witness in the cause of truth and justice, and I shall pass on to other matters. All the Republican members of the House—I have heard of but one exception—voted against Gen. Harrison's sentiments and speech: all the Federalists, I believe, (certainly the most distinguished,) voted as he spoke, against reducing Adams's standing army. He made his speech on the 9th of January, 1800. On the 12th of May, 1800, (just four calendar months and three days thereafter) he was nominated by President Adams, the elder, to be Governor of Indiana, and on the next day his nomination was confirmed by the Senate. Striking coincidence! I concur with others in the opinion, that, "from these facts, there can be no doubt that Gen. Harrison was completely identified with the old Federal party, as it existed under the administration of John Adams." President Adams, like all others holding the power of appointment, preferred his friends to his enemies. It is right that it should be so. I have no hesitancy in avowing that, character and qualifications being equal, or nearly so, I should always appoint my political friends, rather than my enemies. Well, sir, how does the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] attempt to exculpate his friend Gen. Harrison from his dilemma? Why, he says every body knows that Mr. Randolph was an eccentric man! Truly he was—but he was a man of extraordinary memory, as well as genius—he spoke of facts—nobody ever questioned his veracity, or honor, or honesty. Besides, even Gen. Harrison made no unqualified denial—but he testifies against himself, and in support of Mr. Randolph's charge, in his speech last noticed—out of his own mouth is he condemned.

But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] brings forward the letter, or certificate of Judge Burnet, before alluded to, as evidence of General Harrison's political orthodoxy. And what does he say? Hear him speak, in his letter to Mr. Southgate of Kentucky, which follows:

"CINCINNATI, Feb. 27, 1840.

"MY DEAR SIR: I remark, in reply to your letter of this morning, that, during the contest between Mr. Jefferson and the elder Adams, General Harrison and myself were residing in the Northwestern Territory, and of course had not the privilege of voting. At that time I was in habits of great intimacy with Gen. Harrison, although I was a Federalist, (honestly so,) and he a Republican of the Jefferson school. I supported Adams warmly, and he, with equal warmth, supported Mr. Jefferson. During the controversy, from 1796 inclusive, I conversed and argued with him times without number—he sustaining Mr. Jefferson, and I Mr. Adams. You may assure your friend that there was not a more consistent, decided supporter of Mr. Jefferson in the Northwestern Territory than Gen. Harrison. For the truth of this declaration I most willingly pledge my reputation.

"I state to you what I saw, and heard, and know. When the Alien and Sedition law passed, the General was not a member of Congress. He neither voted, nor had an opportuniy of voting on that law.

"Your friend,

"J. BURNET.

"Hon. WM. SOUTHGATE."

Upon this letter, Mr. President, I remark, in the first place, Judge Burnet avows that he "was a Federalist, (honestly so.") No doubt; and as he does not say he has ever changed, he is doubtless still one. The next thing I have to remark is on the singularity of the circumstance, that so intelligent a friend of Gen. Harrison as Mr. Southgate is known to be, should omit and pass by all the old Republicans of '98 and '99—many of whom are certainly now living in the Western country—and call on a man, always known as a Federalist, to prove the old General's Democracy! Why, sir, this seems to me to be "passing strange!" If you wished to prove a man a Christian, would you not think it better to call on some member of the church, to which he professed to belong, than upon any out door sinner, who, perhaps, might not know what constituted a Christian? Another remark I would make, is on the extraordinary fact, that while, according to Judge Burnet, he "with warmth supported Mr. Jefferson," in argument with him, (privately, I suppose,) he supported John Adams the elder in his public speeches in Congress, as we have just seen! Judge Burnet says, "when the alien and sedition law passed, the General (Harrison) was not a member of Congress. He neither voted, nor had an opportunity of voting, on that law." But he does not think proper to inform us how he would have voted if he had had that opportunity. Again, sir, those two gentlemen were then opposed in politics—they now harmonize—Judge Burnet was one of the Vice Presidents (Federalist as he acknowledges himself) of the Harrisburg Convention, which unanimously nominated Gen. Harrison for President. Who has changed? Do Federalists, as a body, usually nominate or support Republicans for office?

Mr. President, we have somewhat seen what Federalism was in the beginning, and during the reign of the elder Adams: has it changed? No, sir; whatever may have been the mutations of name they have found it expedient to adopt, the principles of the party have remained unaltered. True, sir, they have resorted to many devices to get rid of the odium which has ever followed them, or rather followed their doctrines, when brought into practical operation; but it will not do, so long as the people remember the great landmarks I have already mentioned. After the hard fought battles of '98 and '99, which resulted in the triumphant election of Mr. Jefferson in 1800, they soon found it in vain to attempt to get into power under their original cognomen. Hence, they tried the experiment of mitigating, if they could not entirely remove the odium brought upon them by their reckless disregard of the restraints of the Constitution. They first coupled our name with their own—calling themseves Federal Republicans! They fought hard, under this name, against all the principles and policy of Mr. Jefferson's Administration; but they did not regain their lost power. In despite of their opposition, Mr. Madison succeeded to the Presidency; and, under the same name, they continued the struggle throughout his Administration. It was the Federal Republican party (as they then called themselves) that opposed the late war; it was the same party that denounced it as an unwholy war; it was the same party that resisted all appropriations to subsist, clothe, and pay our troops; the same party that withheld, as far as was in their power, all the means necessary to its successful prosecution; the same party that held out blue light signals to the enemy when upon our coasts, and furnished them with supplies; the same party that declared it "unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at our victories;" and the same party that held the Hartford Convention, and threatened to dissolve the Union, or drive Mr. Madison and Congress into the Potomac. Now all this was done to regain their lost power. For that object they took advantage of the embarrassments growing out of the war.

But, Mr. President, thank Heaven! although they embarrassed us greatly, and aided, encouraged, and comforted the enemy considerably, they did not succeed. Although our affairs for some time wore a gloomy aspect, our gallant navy won brilliant victories, wherever an enemy could be met on the lakes or the ocean; and we became more and more successful on land, until the war was terminated in a blaze of glory, on the plains below New Orleans. This happy and brilliant sequel to our trying conflict with Great Britain, threw her friends in this country all aback. They at once found that their old name, even with the honored and popular adjunct of "Republican," would no longer shield them from the execrations, or condemnation of their countrymen. They had now tried its efficacy through the two long administrations of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison; and with deep disappointment and mortification, they found it had not only failed to produce the desired effect of rendering them popular, and giving them power, but that they had rendered it equally as odious as their old one. They then dropped the name, Federal, altogether; and substituted National in its stead; calling themselves National Republicans, still thinking that our name, instead of the principles it indicated, would enable them to prevail. This was their third name; and, under it, they carried on their operations through the administrations of Mr. Monroe and the younger Adams. Under its auspices, they succeeded in instituting a new class of Federal measures, called the American system, embracing mainly high protective tariffs and prodigal expenditures for internal improvements by the General Government. Thus they went on through the two last named administrations, enriching one portion of the Union at the expense of the other, until the Union itself was in imminent danger. They continued to wear this name till the tariff was modified, their system of internal improvements arrested, and the recharter of the Bank of the United States defeated by the veto messages of General Jackson! They had lost the Presidential election of 1832 by an overwhelming majority of the votes given in the electoral colleges; and they found their principles were no better concealed by their third name of National Republicans, than they had been by their first and second names. Under such adverse circumstances, it was indispensable that another change should be made, or the prize of power abandoned; and the inventive genius of the party was set to work to find some new cognomen that would be less odious to the people than the last. In this trying conjuncture, upon the suggestion of one of their new converts, under the convincing argumentation of the United States Bank, with great promptitude and unanimity, they adopted the time honored name of Whig—a name consecrated by the blood of the martyred heroes and patriots of the Revolution! Lamentable, indeed, that such a name should ever have been prostituted to party purposes! Well, sir, what has been the result of this change? Although it rallied every division and fragment of the old Federal, Federal Republican, and National Republican parties, including Antimasons and Abolitionists, its broad mantle was not sufficient to conceal, from the scrutinizing intelligence of the people, the unchanged deformity of their principles; and, under it, notwithstanding all their management and devices, four years ago, with their motto of "divide and conquer," they were gloriously defeated. They have already found, in some parts of the Union, that this name will sustain them no longer. Indeed, last year, a portion of the party assumed the name of "Whig Conservatives;" and now, in some parts of the country, they are calling themselves "Democratic Whigs," and in others they have gone so far as to call themselves "Democratic Republicans." But all these transmutations will not long deceive the enlightened freemen of this country; if they would obtain and keep their confidence, they must practise our principles, as well as take our name. I trust, sir, the Senate will pardon me for the time I have consumed in this cursory review of the course of parties; they are reminiscences, I think, worth preserving.

Let us now enquire, for a moment, in the ranks of which party General Harrison has been doing battle since the people put an end to the "sedition law and black cockade Administration." What has been his course upon the tariff—a subject of vital and most exciting interest to all the inhabitants of the South, more especially? He not only uniformly voted for it in Congress, but, in allusion to a remark made by Mr. Garnett of Virginia, that the effect of the political quackery of the tariff "had been to cover the streets of Norfolk with grass," General Harrison, after insisting on its benefits, remarked:

"It may be asked whether, under any circumstances, I would be willing to abandon the tariff. I answer, without any hesitation, in the affirmative. Whenever the streets of Norfolk and Charleston shall be covered with grass, and our Southern friends find no market for their produce, and this state of things can be distinctly traced to the tariff, I will then instantly give my voice for its modification or entire repeal; even if I should still think that its continuance would be beneficial to a majority of the American people."

Here we have him tauntingly and sarcastically telling us, in reply to the complaints of a distinguished Southron, that he will consent to its modification or repeal, "whenever the streets of Norfolk and Charleston shall be covered with grass" and the Southern people can "find no market for their produce, and this state of things can be distinctly traced to the tariff." Generous sympathy! He would modify or repeal the law after we had become utterly ruined! Nor, sir, was his support of the tariff confined to his votes and speeches in Congress. In the Senate of the Ohio Legislature, on the 9th of December, 1819, he made himself the leader in favor of a tariff to protect and encourage domestic manufactures and internal improvements. Here is his motion from the Journal of that body:

"Mr. Harrison moved the adoption of two resolutions, instructing our members in Congress to procure the passage of laws modifying the tariff on imported articles, and for the encouragement of domestic manufactures and internal improvements; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table."

On the 14th December, 1819, the Journal gives the following account of the further proceeding on those resolutions:

December 14, 1819. "The Senate then took up the report of the Committee of the Whole upon the resolutions repealing the tariff on imported articles, and relative to internal improvements and domestic manufactures; which report was amended and agreed to; and on motion to agree to the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That, in their opinion, the present pecuniary embarrassments of the country are, in a great degree, caused by want of encouragement and protection to domestic manufactures, and that good policy requires that such modifications of the tariff, on imported articles, be immediately made, as will stop that inundation of foreign merchandise which has destroyed or suspended the operations of the greater part of the manufacturing establishments of the United States; which motion to agree to said resolution was unanimously decided in the affirmative.

"The yeas and nays having been required, those members who were present, and voted in the affirmative, were—

"Messrs. Baldwin, Brown, Campbell, Fithian, Foos, Furnas, HARRISON, Hooker, Irwin, Jennings, Lucas, Madeara, McLaughlin, M'Lean, Newcom, Pollock, Robb, Ruggles, Russel, Shelby, Simpson, Spencer, Swearingen, Sullivan, Thompson, and Trimble, speaker.

Here we have General Harrison absurdly ascribing the "pecuniary embarrassments of the country" to the "want of encouragement and protection to domestic manufactures"—when every body knows that the inordinate expansions of the banks before, and their inability to meet their engagements, and the general disorder and depreciation of the paper currency of the times—notwithstanding the great regulator, the Bank of the United States, was in full operation—was the real cause of that embarrassment and distress. But that was his pretext; though the tariff of 1816, which had been acquiesced in by the South, to extricate the country from the national debt, created by the war with Great Britain, was in force: that tariff did not satisfy him. He was not only for encouraging and protecting domestic manufactures, but thought "that good policy required that such modifications of the tariff on imported articles, be immediately made, as will stop that inundation of foreign merchandise," &c. In other words, he was so ultra in his tariff principles that he would carry it up to absolute prohibition! As a citizen of the South, and more especially of South Carolina, can the Senator [Mr. PRESTON] give his sanction to such doctrine as this, and support its author and advocate for the Chief Manistracy of the nation, with all its immense powet, patronage, and influence—against which he was wont to declaim so eloquently?

But let us now examine his resolution in favor of internal improvements, and of bounties to manufacturers. Here it is, with his vote:

"On motion,

"To agree to the resolution relative to internal improvements and domestic manufactures, to wit:

"Resolved, That in the present state of pecuniary embarrassment amongst the people, it is UNWISE AND IMPOLITIC FOR THE GOVERNMENT TO PAY OFF THE PUBLIC DEBT MORE RAPIDLY THAN THE OBLIGATIONS IT MAY HAVE COME UNDER TO ITS CREDITORS MAY REQUIRE; AND THAT ANY SURPLUS IN THE TREASURY WOULD BE MORE USEFULLY EMPLOYED IN THE INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT OF THE COUNTRY, BY ROADS AND CANALS, AND IN THE SUPPORT AND ENCOURAGEMENT OF DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES; which motion to agree was decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 2."

"And the yeas and nays being required,

"Those who noted in the affirmative were—

"Messrs. Baldwin, Brown, Campbell, Fithian, Foos, Furnas HARRISON, Hooker, Irwin, Jennings, Lucas, Madeara, M'Laughlin, M'Lean, Newcom, Pollock, Robb, Ruggles, Simpson, Spencer, Swearingen, Sullivan, Thompson, and Speaker (Trimble.)

"Those who voted in the negative were—

"Messrs. Russel and Shelby."

So General Harrison thought it "unwise and impolitic for the Government to pay off the national debt more rapidly than the obligations it may have come under to its creditors may require." This sentiment is perfectly in keeping with the whole tenor of his political life. One of the leading tenets in the creed of the Federal party always has been, that "a national debt was a national blessing." Instead of paying off the national debt, and giving to our country the proud pre-eminence she now occupies as one, of only some two or three Governments in the whole world, without a public debt, he would have continued it until now, or ad infinitum; for no capitalist, holding the public securities of the United States at the rate of the accruing interest, would have ever required payment of the principal. It would have amounted to a perpetuity of our national debt, upon which we should have been for ever paying a heavy annual interest. And how did he propose applying our revenue? Why, instead of extricating ourselves from all pecuniary obligations, he thought "that any surplus in the Treasury would be more usefully employed in the internal improvement of the country, by roads and canals, and in the support and encouragement of domestic manufactures." Did the wildest schemer, or the most visionary and enthusiastic projector, ever go further for internal improvements by the General Government, or for a system, not only of encouragement and protection, but of bounties to those engaged in domestic manufactures? But one answer can be given to this question: an intelligent community cannot misunderstand it. To close this scene of unholy contrivance to take money out of the pockets of one class of our citizens and put it in those of another—to rob one section of the Union to enrich another—the same journal shows this further proceeding:

"The Senate then came to the following resolution, on motion of Mr. Harrison:

"Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to use their exertions to procure the passage of laws, embracing the principles recommended in the foregoing resolutions.

"Ordered, That said resolution be sent to the House of Representatives, with a message, requesting their concurrence therein."

Having thus instructed the Senators, and requested the Representatives in Congress, from Ohio, "to use their exertions to procure the passage of laws, embracing the principles recommended in the foregoing resolutions—in other words, to put in requisition the whole power of this Government, to tax the planting, farming, mechanic, and commercial classes, for the benefit of manufacturers—one would have supposed that General Harrison, or any other person, would have been content; but not so, sir. Immediately after the proceedings just noticed, the same journal shows what follows:

"On motion of Mr. Harrison,

"The Senate agreed to the following resolution, the same having been reported from the committee of the whole without amendment.

"Resolved, That provisions should be made, by law, for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, as far as it is in the power of the State to encourage them, and that a committee of three be appointed to prepare and report a bill, exempting from taxation the houses employed as manufactories of such fabrics as are usually imported from foreign countries, and exempting also the workmen employed in such establishments from military service, and laboring on the public highways, and a committee was thereupon appointed, of Messrs. Harrison, Russel, and Shelby."

Now, sir, if this does not cap the climax of monstrosity in tariff protection, encouragement, and bounties, I cannot understand the force of plain language. Not content with exciting to action for the benefit of manufacturers, all the powers of the General Government, he now declares that the States should also encourage them. How? By "exempting from taxation the houses employed as manufactories of such fabrics as are usually imported from foreign countries, and exempting, also, the workmen employed in such establishments from military service, and laboring on the public highways!"

Why really, sir, General Harrison has fine notions of that equality of rights and privileges guarantied by the Constitution. He would not only encourage domestic manufacturers by bounties and prohibitions, but would free their property from the taxation to which all other capital is subjected, and, moreover, relieve the workmen employed by them from all the customary duties and burdens common to all other citizens. Can it be denied that here was a barefaced attempt to constitute both manufacturers and their "operatives" (as they call them) a privileged class? I leave the answer to every intelligent man. And I now repeat the question to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] whether he can give his sanction to these principles of General Harrison, or support their author for a situation, above all others, best calculated to enable him to bring them into practical operation? What would the people of South Carolina think, if any particular class amongst them were exempted by the Legislature from taxation, the duty of defending the country, and making roads?

But, sir, the gentleman may suppose that the evidence furnished by his resolutions in the Ohio Legislature, that General Harrison was in favor of a system of internal improvements by the General Government, is not sufficient. Lest he, or any other person, may have a doubt upon this subject, I invite your attention to his votes in Congress, embracing every possible aspect of the question. In 1818, when he was a member of the House of Representatives, the following resolutions, declaratory of the power of Congress to carry on such a system, for every purpose ever sugggested, or contemplated by any enthusiast, were introduced; and he solemnly recorded his vote in favor of each proposition:

"1st resolution. That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other roads, and for the improvement of water courses." [Upon this resolution, the vote stood—ayes 90, noes 75; General Harrison voting in the affirmative.]

"2d resolution. That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct post roads and military roads, provided that private property be not taken for public use, without just compensation." [Upon this resolution the vote stood—ayes 82, noes 84; General Harrison voting in the affirmative.]

"3d resolution. That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct roads and canals necessary for commerce between the States, provided that private property be not taken for public purposes, without just compensation." [Upon this resolution the vote stood—ayes 71, noes 95; General Harrison voting in the affirmative.]

"4th resolution. That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct canals for military purposes, provided that no private property be taken for any such purpose, without just compensation being made therefor." [Upon this resolution the vote stood—ayes 81, noes 83; General Harrison still voting in the affirmative.]

Sir, it is now demonstrated, that in the Legislature of Ohio, General Harrison was even disposed to delay the payment of the national debt, to promote and carry on Internal Improvements by the General Government; and that, as a member of Congress, he voted "that Congress had power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other (what other? why, all other) roads, and for the improvement of water courses." What water courses? all—there is no specification nor restriction. This is not all—he voted for every possible modification of the power which (I presume) ever entered the imagination of man. And can the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON] who denies the constitutional power of this Government to made roads and canals, and to improve "water courses," or even to construct harbors—can he, who has so often battled with me, shoulder to shoulder, on this floor, in opposition to such measures, on constitutional grounds—I repeat, can the Senator from South Caroline now give his sanction to these doctrines, so solemnly voted by General Harrison? Has he changed his own opinions upon this subject? I presume not. Has General Harrison changed his opinions? I presume not. He declines making any "further declaration of his principles, for the public eye," and we are referred to his "views" which have heretofore been given to the public, "fully and explicitly"—and we are expressly told, "that those views, whether connected with constitutional or other questions of very general interest, have undergone no change."

What are General Harrison's views on the subject of an United States Bank? Hear him in his reply to Sherrod Williams in 1836:

"The question, then, for me to answer, is, whether, under the circumstances you state, if elected to the office of President, I would sign an act to charter another bank. I answer, I would, if it were clearly ascertained that the public interest, in relation to the collection and disbursement of the revenue, would materially suffer without one, and there were unequivocal manifestations of public opinion in its favor."

The plain declaration here made by him is, that he would sign an act to charter such a bank, if it was clearly ascertained that the public interest required it, and public sentiment were in its favor. This declaration involves the assertion of the monstrous doctrine, that any thing is constitutional which it is believed the public interest requires, and in favor of which there is an unequivocal manifestation of public opinion. It amounts to saying that any thing is constitutional which may be deemed necessary and proper; or that may, in the discretion of Congress and the President, be considered expedient. Under such views as these, of what imaginable use is a written constitution? Does it not leave every thing to the mere will and discretion of our public agents—untrammelled by constitutional restraints? It seems to me, sir, there can be no difference of opinion on this subject; and that no doubt can be entertained, if General Harrison were elected President—a large majority of his friends, deeming a National Bank both constitutional and expedient—he would not only approve but recommend the charter of one. Does the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] sanction this opinion of his distinguished chief?

But, sir, amongst all the opinions entertained, or expressed by General Harrison, none can be more dangerous in tendency, than that which I am now about to bring to the notice of the Senate. I allude to his opinions upon slavery, and the powers of this Government in reference to it. I do not intend, on this occasion, to discuss the question, whether he is an Abolitionist or not? That is a matter which, for the present, I leave debatable, as the evidence is somewhat contradictory. But hear a declaration of opinion, which no one questions he made, in regard to the power of this Government to provide a remedy for slavery. In his speech, delivered at Cheviot on the 4th day of July, 1833, he says:

"Should I be asked if there is no way by which the General Government can aid the cause of emancipation, I answer that it has long been an object near my heart to see the whole of its surplus revenue appropriated to that object. With the sanction of the States holding the slaves, there appears to me to be no constitutional objection to its being thus applied, embracing not only the colonization of those that may be otherwise freed, but the purchase of the freedom of others."

He declares "it has long been an object near his heart to see the whole surplus revenue appropriated to that object"—the cause of emancipation." With the sanction of the States holding the slaves, he sees no constitutional objection! Can he, or any one else, point to the power delegated in the Constitution to authorize Congress to appropriate money to colonize negroes already free, or to "purchase the freedom of others?" I defy him to show any such power, or to show that it is one "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" any of those which are granted. Certainly, no man who believes the Constitution imposes any limitations—no man, unless he believes this to be a Government of discretionary powers, can, for a moment, justify such an opinion. But, sir, has it not been the settled opinion of all the South, universally, that the subject of emancipation, or abolition, (which is the same thing,) could not be touched rightfully or safely by this Government? Do the petitions, which have been, year after year, presented to the two Houses of Congress, which have agitated the Union from one end to the other, and threatened its dissolution, mean any thing more than the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the Territories, by such means as Congress may, in their discretion, think proper? Nothing, sir—nothing. If their purpose of emancipation can be attained, the Abolitionists care not about the means that may be employed; they would be willing it should be done by an appropriation of money. Then the proposition of General Harrison is but one form of Abolition. What would be the practical operation of such a measure? Why, sir, we being the principal tax payers, would mainly contribute the money to create the "surplus revenue." In other words, the money would first be drawn from us by taxation; and, after paying the expenses of collection and disbursement, it would be paid back to us for our negroes, and they turned loose among us, free and equal. What a delightful state of society this would bring about, and how much it would contribute to our prosperity and happiness!

But, sir, can the people of the South, for one moment, tolerate this Government in any legislation whatever upon the subject of slaves—one of the clear and indubitable compromises of the Constitution—a subject left to the exclusive control of the respective States? Can they safely suffer one step to be taken, by Congress, on the subject of slavery? No intelligent man, who feels as a Southron, can for a moment hesitate to answer—no. The first step will inevitably and certainly be followed by others; that first step will be the signal for our destruction, or a dissolution of the Union; and the people of the South cannot, nay, they will not, hesitate which alternative to choose. No consideration of life nor death can ever tempt the South to submit to such intermeddling and violation of good faith. Now I ask the Senator from South Carolina whether he gives his sanction to this opinion?

Mr. President, when I took up this branch of the subject, I laid down the proposition, in substance, that the Federalists were that party opposed to a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States, and in favor of extending its powers beyond those expressly delegated, or necessary and proper for carrying them into execution. I have now established—at least to my own satisfaction—that General Harrison was a black cockade Federalist, and supporter of the alien and sedition law, and standing army Administration of John Adams the elder. I have also shown that his opinions upon the tariff; upon internal improvements by the General Goverment; upon a National Bank; and upon the emancipation of our slaves, by the appropriation of the national treasure, are favorable to the exercise of all those powers; and that they are all assumptions of power not delegated by the Constitution, nor necessary or proper for carrying those powers into execution. These are the great questions which have principally divided the two parties for many years past; and General Harrison having been found, uniformly, upon the side of latitudinous construction, continues down to the present day emphatically a Federalist—though now without the badge of the black cockade, which has long since been unfashionable.

But his friends say General Harrison is not only a Jeffersonian Republican, but the poor man's friend, and a man of boundless humanity and benevolence—full of the milk of human kindness. Let us examine his pretensions a few moments on this score, through the medium of his legislative history in Indiana and Ohio. I do not know, Mr. President, that I should ever have brought this subject to the notice of the Senate, but that the friends of General Harrison, ready as many of them are to misrepresent the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, have roundly denied the authenticity of the Indiana law, and the extract from the Ohio Journal, as published in the newspapers. I have very recently received a letter from one of my most respectable and intelligent constituents, stating the fact of this denial and requesting an authentic copy to be forwarded. Anxious to comply with this, and all other reasonable requests coming from those who have honored me with their confidence, I was setting about procuring such copies from those States, when fortunately I was saved the trouble, owing to a similar request having been made of some of my North Carolina friends, by some of their constituents. The copies I shall read are certified to be "truly copied" by the two Senators and six of the Representatives of the State of North Carolina, at the request of two other Representatives. They are all gentlemen of honor and veracity; and, on their authority, I do not hesitate to vouch for the truth and genuineness of these documents, both here and to my constituents. These transcripts read as follows:

Extract from the Laws of the Indiana Territory, printed at Vincennes, by Messrs. Stout and Smoot, in 1807, and now in the Library of the State Department, Washington City.

CHAPTER VI.

AN ACT RESPECTING CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

"SEC. 30. When any person or persons shall, on conviction of any crime or breach of any penal law, be sentenced to pay a fine or fines, with or without the costs of prosecution, it shall and may be lawful for the court before whom such conviction shall be had, to order the sheriff to sell or hire the person or persons so convicted to service, to any person or persons who will pay the said fine and costs, for such term of time as the said court shall judge reasonable.

"And if such person or persons, so sentenced and hired or sold, shall abscond from the service of his or her master or mistress before the term of such servitude shall be expired, he or she so absconding shall, on conviction before a justice of the peace, be whipped with thirty-nine stripes, and shall, moreover serve two days for every one so lost.

"SEC. 31. The judges of the several courts of record in this Territory shall give this act in charge to the grand jury at each and every court in which a grand jury shall be sworn.

JESSE B. THOMAS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
B. CHAMBERS,
President of the Council.

Approved September 17, 1807.
WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON."

"From the journal of the Senate of the State of Ohio, 1st session of the 19th General Assembly, held in the town of Columbus,

The following is extracted from the proceedings of Tuesday, January 30, 1821, to be found on pages 304 and 305:

"An act supplementary to the act for the punishment of certain offences therein named being under consideration,

"Mr. Fithian then moved to strike out the 19th section of said bill, as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That when any person shall be imprisoned, either upon execution or otherwise, for the non-payment of a fine, or costs, or both, it shall be lawful for the sheriff of the county to sell out such person as a servant to any person within this State, who will pay the whole amount due, for the shortest period of service, of which sale public notice shall be given at least ten days; and upon such sale being effected, the sheriff shall give to the purchaser a certificate thereof, and deliver over the prisoner to him; from which time the relation between such purchaser and the prisoner shall be that of master and servant, until the time of service expires, and for injuries done by either, remedy shall be had in the same manner as is or may be provided by law in the case of master and apprentices; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent persons being discharged from imprisonment according to the provisions of the thirty-seventh section of the act to which this is supplementary, if it shall be considered expedient to grant such discharge: Provided, That the court, in pronouncing sentence upon any person or persons convicted under this act, or the act to which this is supplementary, may direct such person or persons to be detained in prison until the fine be paid, or the person or persons otherwise disposed of agreeably to the provisions of this act:

"Whhich motion was decided in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 12

"And the yeas and nays being required, those who voted in the affirmative, were,

"Messrs. Beasly, Brown, Fithian, Gass, Heaton, Jennings, Lucas, Matthews, McLaughlin, McMillan, Newcom, Russell, Scofield, Shelby, Spencer, Stone, Swearingen, Thompson, and Womeldorf—20.

Those who voted in the negative, were,

"Messrs. Baldwin, Cole, Foos, Foster, HARRISON, McLean, Dzwalt, Pollock, Ruggles, Roberts, Wheeler, and Speaker—12.

"At the request of the Hon. William Montgomery and Hon. M. T. Hawkins, we certify the foregoing copy of an extract from a law passed in the Territorial Assembly of Indiana, and signed by William H. Harrison, as Governor of said Territory, and the extract from the journal of the State of Ohio, are truly copied.

CHARLES FISHER,
ROBERT STRANGE,
B. BROWN,
CHARLES SHEPARD,
HENRY W. CONNOR,
JOHN HILL,
JAS. J. McKAY,
J. A. BYNUM."

Here, sir, is a specimen of his humanity, benevolence, and kindness! Here is evidence that he is "the poor man's friend!!" According to the law of Indiana, which he approved, when (having an absolute veto, under the ordinance of the Territory) he might have defeated it, in despite of the unanimous votes of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives, any person or persons, male or female, on conviction of any crime, or breach of any penal law, (that is, for a mere misdemeanor, without any moral turpitude,) being sentenced to pay a fine, with or without costs, might have been sold by the sheriff to any person or persons, (white or black,) who would pay the fine and costs. And if the unfortunate individual so sold or hired, absconded before the expiration of the term of servitude, they were made liable, "on conviction before a justice of the peace, (without a trial by jury,) to be whipped with thirty-nine lashes," and to "serve two days for every one so lost." To sell a free man into servitude for a mere misdemeanor—for instance, an assault and battery, affray, or the like—would be intolerable enough; but to inflict the ignominious punishment of thirty-nine lashes on a white man or woman, for merely leaving such service, and without a trial by jury, would be an outrage never, perhaps, perpetrated by any other Legislature since the days of Magna Charta. Without further comment, I leave this humane and benevolent poor man's friend to the judgment of his country, merely adding that the section of the bill for which he voted in Ohio, was substantially like the law passed, with his approval, in Indiana, except the punishment of whipping for absconding.

Hoping that I shall be excused for this episode, Mr. President, as it seemed to be a necessary response to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] on yesterday, I shall now proceed with my reply to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON.] That honorable Senator thought proper to ascribe to the present Chief Magistrate inordinate fondness for power, and, in support of that charge, asserted that more military power had been aggregated under this Administration than any other. To prove this, he alluded to the increase of the army by a law passed about two years ago. Under that law, the army, if full, would only amount to about twelve thousand men, to man our batteries and fortifications, in all our seaport towns, for their protection against an invading enemy, and for the defence of our extended inland frontier, on the North and the West, for thousands of miles. That measure was, on all sides of the Senate, so generally acquiesced in, that, if I do not mistake, it passed without calling for a division. I am inclined to think the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] himself voted for that bill—did he not?

[Here Mr. PRESTON nodded assent.]

Mr. C. remarked, the Senator admits he voted for it, yet he now complains of it, as if unnecessary and unjustifiable. The Senator from South Carolina, in a tone of disapprobation, also alludes to the act which passed near the close of the last session, appropriating ten millions of dollars, to be raised by loans, and placed at the disposal of the President; and also authorizing him to accept the services of fifty thousand volunteers, to repel invasion, if that contingency happened, as another evidence of the disposition of this Administration to augment its powers. Well, sir, what is the history of this measure? Did the President ask Congress to give him the power to raise that number of men, and that amount of money? No, sir; on the contrary, it was the spontaneous act of the two Houses, in view of what they regarded as possible danger of invasion by Great Britain. The measure originated in, and passed the House almost unanimously. It came into the Senate on the 2d of March, "was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in committee of the whole," without being referred, as usual, to one of the standing committees. The only amendment moved, at any stage of the bill in the Senate, was to strike out the third section, the motion being made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] who stood alone in the affirmative, on taking the yeas and nays. The name of the Senanator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] is recorded in the negative. No amendment being made to the bill, it was reported to the Senate and passed to a third reading. It was immediately read a third time by unanimous consent, and passed, by yeas and nays, unanimously—the name of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] being again recorded in favor of the bill!

Those are the two measures relied on by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] to prove the grasping ambition of the present Administration, and the aggregation of more military power under it than any former one. Both measures passed through the Senate by an almost unanimous vote, and the Senator himself voting for both. This, sir, may be considered as a specimen of the fairness with which the Administration is censured and abused by the Opposition gentlemen, or their party; they first pass the measure, or at least assist in doing so, and then turn round and denounce it, as unwise, profligate, or dangerous. How just and magnanimous, to aid in passing measures, often when they could not pass without their assistance, and then to ascribe the wrong exclusively to the Administration, or its friends!

The censures of the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. President, which have been so much lavished on the President and Secretary of War, cannot be well reconciled with other portions of his own course as a member of this body. In the progress of my investigation, I find an act was passed in the spring of 1836, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons, or mounted riflemen." This act authorized the President to accept the services of volunteers, who might offer themselves (without the intervention of the State Executives;) and the bill, as it passed the House, authorized the President to organize them into battalions, squadrons, regiments, &c. The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, of the Senate, of which the Senator from South Carolina is a member; and by examining the Journal, I find, on the 11th of May, 1836, Mr. PRESTON reported it from that committee, with amendments. Two of those amendments, so reported by the Senator, as I suppose, were to the third section; which passed the House in the following words:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to organize the companies so tendering their services, as aforesaid, into battalions, squadrons, regiments, brigades, and divisions, as soon as the number of volunteers shall render such organization in his judgment expedient."

The first amendment to this section was to strike out the word "companies," and insert, instead of it, the word "volunteers"—the effect of which was to let the volunteers be received by the President wholly without organization under the State authority, that he might have all the power in his own hands. For, the next amendment proposed to the section was, to add the following clause, at the end of the section:

"And shall appoint the necessary officers, which appointments shall be submitted to the Senate at its next session."

This was one of the amendments with which the bill was returned from the Senate to the House, though it did not meet their concurrence, and did not become a part of the act, which passed. I presume the Senator from South Carolina reported and acquiesced in this amendment, and supported it. [Mr. PRESTON assented.] Where will you find a more odious, or more revolting proposition to the people of the several States, than to take from them the appointment of their own militia officers, and give the power of appointing all those officers to the President? Such was the effect, and extent of the Senator's amendment; for the bill authorized the President to accept the services of ten thousand volunteers; and of course, the power to "appoint the necessary officers" would have embraced the appointment, not only of the major generals, brigadier generals, and colonels of regiments, but all the other officers, down to the lowest subaltern. These journals, sir, are sometimes troublesome things. Why, sir, the gentleman talks of a violation of the Constitution, in the plan proposed by the Secretary of War. Was there ever a more palpable violation of that instrument proposed by any one? Or a more glaring attempt to invade and wrest from the States one of their most important and expressly "reserved rights?" Never, sir; never. What are the powers granted to Congress over the militia? First, the power "To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." In this clause, the power is only given to call them forth, for three enumerated objects.

The other clause gives to Congress the power—

"To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

Is argument necessary to satisfy the plainest understanding, that a law giving the power of appointing officers of the militia to the President, under any circumstances, would be a clear and indubitable infraction of this provision of the Constitution, and an outrageous usurpation of one of the reserved rights of the States? No, sir; there can be no doubt; and it would be insulting to common sense to press the argument. Yet, sir, the author of this proposition—to take from the people, in the face of the plain letter of the Constitution, the appointment of their own militia officers, who are to command them in the hour of battle, and have the guardianship of their lives and honor—at the same time giving the power of those appointments to the President: yes, sir, the author of this most monstrous, unconstitutional proposition, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] is the chosen champion of the Opposition, to inveigh against the Secretary of War, and denounce him and the President for the plan of organization submitted to our consideration! I will add nothing further on this point, than to say—the power proposed by the Senator from South Carolina never can be exercised in Alabama, while my voice can be heard and heeded.

Suffer me now, Mr. President, to call your attention to the 17th clause of Mr. Poinsett's projet, which is pronounced, by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] as "monstrous and unconstitutional." It is on this clause the Senator relies, as I understand him, to establish the charge of unconstitutionality, and the consequent imputation of grasping ambition and usurpation. That it may be fairly understood, I will read the clause in question, which is in the following words:

"17th. That the President of the United States be authorized to call forth and assemble such numbers of the ACTIVE force of the militia, at such places within their respective districts, and at such times, not exceeding twice nor ——— days in the same year, as he may deem necessary; and during such period, including the time when going to and returning from the place of rendezvous, they shall be deemed in the service of the United States, and be subject to such regulations as the President may think proper to adopt for their instruction, discipline, and improvement in military knowledge."

Now, sir, taking this clause independently of all others, I do not hesitate to admit its unconstitutionality. In the usual acceptation of the terms, I can never agree that Congress can give the President power to call forth the militia merely for discipline, nor for any other purpose than to "execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." Nor can I agree that they shall be considered "in the service of the United States," or that the President shall prescribe regulations, or, in the language of the Senator, command them, when merely under discipline. But, sir, does not the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] know that, in placing a construction upon any instrument, law, or document, all the parts upon the same subject should be taken together? He certainly ought to know this. Well, sir, are there no other clauses of the Secretary's document bearing upon this question? Yes, sir, the very clause preceding the one he read. The 16th clause of the Secretary's plan proposes:

"16th. That the officers of the militia of the several classes shall be appointed by and in such manner as the Legislature of the respective States shall direct, and in the Territories of the United States in such manner as is prescribed by existing laws."

This certainly proposes to leave more power with the States than the Senator's amendment to the bill in 1836, upon which I have commented did. It leaves them the power of appointing their own officers; and the men, the care and guardianship of those who may be chosen by themselves, or their States.

The 39th clause of the Secretary's projet, clearly contemplates that his plan of organization is to be carried out by State legislation. An examination of it will satisfy the most prejudiced mind that it is to be submitted to the States for their adoption; for it concludes with a proviso, "that until such enrolment and organization be made, the existing laws governing the militia of each State be considered as still in force." The Senate can, however, place their own construction upon it: it is in the following words:

"39th. That the Legislatures of the several States, at the earliest period of time after the adoption of this system, enact such laws as may be necessary to enrol and organize the militia of the respective States, according to the provisions contained herein: provided that, until such enrolment and organization be made, the existing laws governing the militia of each State be considered as still in force."

But, sir, this is not all. To obviate all doubt of the Secretary's meaning in the projet originally submitted to the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on the Militia of that House, addressed him in a letter, under their instructions, for a "more full exposition of his views." What is the Secretary's reply to the question, whether he intended that power should be given to the President to call all the militia of one district to assemble together at one place, and out of their respective States. Here it is:

"The proposition to divide the territory of the United States, by which is here meant the area embraced by the geographical boundaries of the whole Confederacy, is intended for military purposes, in order that each district may be commanded by one officer, who would have the general direction of the regulars and militia within the district; but the plan contemplated that the power of the President to call out the militia should be restricted to assembling the militia of each State within its own territorial limits."

He says "the power of the President to call out the militia should be restricted to assembling the militia of each State within its own territorial limits." Hence the Senator from South Carolina may dismiss his alarm about the President calling the militia from Lee, Russell, and other western counties of Virginia, all the way into the District of Columbia, to be trained! His fears may be quieted, too, in regard to the danger of the President, or some of his successors, concentrating ten thousand of the militia in the rotundo of the Capitol, with bristling bayonets, on the eve of a Presidential election, to overawe and control the votes of the House of Representatives for that important office.

The Secretary goes further, as to his purpose of submitting his plan to the States for their co-operation. Hear the following part of his explanatory letter:

"With regard to the 17th article, the same difficulty which presented itself to the committee, occurred to me when considering this subject, viz: that provision of the Constitution which restricts the power of Congress over the militia to organizing, arming, and disciplining them, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. Although the word "disciplining" is susceptible of a different interpretation from that given to it here, yet the subsequent reservation to the States of the power to train the militia according to the system of discipline adopted by Congress, would seem to define its meaning; and as we cannot be too scrupulous in our interpretation of the Constitution, I propose that, in the event of its becoming necessary, to resort to draughts in order to fill the ranks of the active class of militia, to apply to the States to place by law their contingents at the disposal of the General Government, for a period of not more than thirty days of every year, for the purpose of their being trained in conjunction with the regular troops, and by veteran officers. It is not probable that this co-operation will be withheld by any State, when the advantages are presented to it of possessing a body of well organized, well armed, and well disciplined militia, without any expense, either to the States or to the citizens thereof; and when they are made aware that it is the intention of the Government to assemble such militia at convenient points within each State, and in the vicinity of depots of arms, which it is proposed to establish as part of the system.

Here he speaks of his purpose of applying to the States to place their militia of the "active class" "at the disposal of the General Government," for how long, or for what purpose? "For a period of not more than thirty days of every year, for the purpose of their being trained, in conjunction with regular troops, and by veteran officers."

The Senator from South Carolina is mistaken, then, in supposing that it was the design of the Secretary of War, or the President, merely by the legislation of Congress, and independently of the State authorities, to assume the command of the militia. He is mistaken in saying it was contemplated to drag them out of their own States. Then what does this "monstrous proposition" amount to? Why, sir, that, with the consent of the States, the President may appoint the times and places at which the militia of the "active class" shall assemble, within their respective States, for the purpose of being trained. That, with the consent of the States, he may designate officers of the regular army, not to command, but to drill them; and also that they be "trained in conjunction with regular troops." The State Legislatures have power to do all this, if they thought proper: that is, they could require any class of their militia to assemble, encamp, and muster, at such times and such places, within their respective States, as they thought proper; or they could authorize any officer to appoint those times and places; or they could appoint, or designate, any officer (even of the regular army, with the consent of his superiors) to drill or train them. And could they not authorize the President to appoint the times and places of training, within the respective States; and, also, authorize him to cause the active class to be trained "with regular troops, and by veteran officers?" Unquestionably, the State Legislatures could do these things. Then, although we cannot approve of the plan, why shall we denounce and execrate the Secretary of War, for the mere proposal? I think I know why it has been, and will continue to be done. If I were to make twenty conjectures, as to the motive that impels to such a course, every one of them would be that it has been, and will continue to be done—first, because Mr. Van Buren is a candidate for re-election to the office of President; and second, because the plan for the reorganization of the militia can be so misrepresented and distorted as to injure him in the estimation of his fellow citizens. If the same plan had been suspended for the present, and proposed at the next session of Congress, after the President's re-election, although it might have been disapproved by some, it would have excited no alarm—the Whig camp would have been "as calm as a summer's morning."

Sir, this is not the only instance in which the Senator and his friends have waged this description of warfare against the Administration. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] in the outset of this debate, was loud in his complaints that the committee had dragged in, as he expressed it, the reports of General Harrison. It was in vain that he was reminded of the fact that the committee had commenced their report, as they declare, in the very first sentence, with a view to examine the subject of the reorganization of the militia, "in reference to the powers of Congress, the various plans which have been proposed, and such measures as have been matured, at different periods, since the adoption of the Constitution, without ever having read one of General Harrison's reports, and without knowing he had ever made one—at least so far as the chairman is concerned. It was in vain the Senator was assured that the reports of General Harrison thus came up, legitimately, in the path upon which the committee sat out, and were used by them only because they belonged to the subject. All these protestations did not seem to be satisfactory; it is difficult to satisfy a gentleman who is resolved not to be content.

But in the mean time, the report of the Committee on the Militia, of the other House, including a minority report, signed by four of the Senator's political friends, is printed and laid upon our tables. Well, having examined and written upon the same subject myself, it was very natural that I should desire to see what those distinguished gentlemen had said of Mr. Poinsett's report. Accordingly, I read this minority report—and what do I find? Why, sir, that they, too, have "dragged in" the same identical reports of General Harrison, made in 1817 and 1819, from which the committee of the Senate had made extracts! Yet, the Senator has not thought proper to censure them. It would not, I presume, comport with his notions of equality, while censuring the committee of the Senate for dragging in General Harrison's reports, to censure his political friends for doing precisely the same thing. It is true, sir, there is some difference in the extracts the minority of the committee of the House have thought proper to make, and those made by the committee of the Senate. They have given the argument, and theoretical views of General Harrison, in favor of a well disciplined militia, together with a few of his accustomed displays of historical learning in reference to the ancient Republics—how "small Republics have been overthrown by those which were more powerful, as Saguntum destroyed by Carthage, and Numantia by Rome."

But, sir, the minority have wholly omitted to notice the result of all this learning and argument—the distinct, practical proposition, with which the report concludes, and the point, to establish the expediency of which all the foregoing part seems to have been intended—that is, the proposition to give a military education to "all the youth of the United States." This is in both the same reports from which they quote, and from which the committee of the Senate make extracts; yet they do not notice it at all, though it is clear it would involve the annual expenditure of millions of dollars.

The minority committee report, however, does not fail to notice the public expense and individual burdens which would attend the adoption of Mr. Poinsett's plan. They set them forth to the "public eye" in bold relief. They first set forth that part of Mr. Poinsett's plan which requires the militia to arm themselves, in the following terms:

"The Secretary of War computes the number of the militia at one million five hundred thousand between the age of twenty, and under that of forty-five years, who are to be enrolled, etc.; and every citizen so enrolled, etc. 'shall, within three months thereafter, provide himself with a good musket—bore of sufficient capacity to receive a lead ball of eighteen in the pound, a sufficient bayonet and belt, two spare flints, a knapsack, cartridge box—to contain at least twenty-four cartridges, suited to the bore of his musket; and each cartridge to contain a ball and three buckshot, and a sufficient quantity of powder, or with a good rifle, knapsack, shot pouch, and powder horn, or flask, with sufficient powder and ball for twenty-four charges, and two spare flint; and that he shall appear so armed, equipped, and provided, when called out for exercise, or into service."

The committee then go on to say, in substance, that they have endeavored to procure the prices of the materials with which all the militiamen are required to furnish themselves; and seem to deplore their disappointment in not having obtained them. They proceed, however, upon the best data they have, and estimate the gun and other equipments of each militia man to cost $20. They then proceed arithmetically, and very correctly state, that, "to purchase these one million and a half of muskets, &c. at twenty dollars each, would cost the people of the United States thirty millions of dollars. Are they prepared at this time of pecuniary distress to advance this sum of thirty millions of dollars out of their private pockets? We think not; we know they are not." "So far, so good." At the price assumed, it would cost all the estimated number of the militia, of the Union, that sum, to arm and equip themselves in the manner proposed; and for one, I would not consent to enforce such a regulation.

But, sir, if it was the object of the minority of the committee of the other House to give the country full and correct information upon this subject, and enable them to form a true opinion, as to the amount of new burdens, sought to be imposed upon them by the Secretary of War, they have "no doubt unintentionally" omitted one important fact; that is, that the law, as it now exists upon the statute book, requires of them precisely the same thing. By the law of May 8th, 1792, passed under General Washington's administration, and sought to be enforced by the act of March, 1803, approved by Mr. Jefferson, every man, subject to militia duty, is now required to arm and equip himself, at his own expense, and substantially, in the same manner. To relieve all apprehension that this is a new burden, attempted to be imposed on the people, I will ask the Secretary to read the first section of the act first mentioned to the Senate. [The Secretary then read that section from the act of May 8th, 1792, in the following words:

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each and every free, able-bodied, white, male citizen of the respective States, resident therein, who is or shall be of the age of eighteen years, and under the age of forty-five years, (except as is hereinafter excepted,) shall, severally and respectively, be enrolled in the militia by the captain or commanding officer of the company within whose bounds such citizen shall reside, and that within twelve months after the passing of this act: and it shall, at all times hereafter, be the duty of every such captain or commanding officer of a company to enrol every such citizen as aforesaid, and also those who shall, from time to time, arrive at the age of eighteen years, or, being of the age of eighteen years, and under the age of forty-five years, (except as before excepted,) shall come to reside within his bounds; and shall, without delay, notify such citizen of the said enrolment by a proper non-commissioned officer of the company, by whom such notice may be proved. That every citizen so enrolled and notified shall, within six months thereafter, provide himself with a good musket, or firelock; a sufficient bayonet and belt; two spare flints, and a knapsack; a pouch, with a box therein, to contain not less than twenty-four cartridges suited to the bore of his musket, or firelock, each cartridge to contain a proper quantity of powder and ball; or, with a good rifle, knapsack, shot-pouch, and powder-horn, twenty balls, suited to the bore of his rifle, and a quarter of a pound of powder: and shall appear, so armed, accoutred, and provided, when called out to exercise, or into service, except that, when called out on company days to exercise only, he may appear without a knapsack. That the commissioned officers shall, severally, be armed with a sword or hanger, and espontoon. And that, from and after five years from the passing of this act, all muskets for arming the militia, as herein required, shall be of bores sufficient for balls of the eighteenth part of a pound. And every citizen so enrolled, and providing himself with the arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, required as aforesaid, shall hold the same exempted from all suits, distresses, executions, or sales for debt, or for the payment of taxes."

Now, sir, I assert that this law, passed in 1792, under Washington's administration, is still in force. Can any gentlemen dispute the fact? [No one denied it.] No one can controvert it. Besides, other portions of the act, which I will not consume the time of the Senate in reading, superadd other burdens, which are fully equal to all that has been proposed by Mr. Poinsett. Nay, more; a law, additional to this, which was passed under Mr. Jefferson's administration, and with his approval, repeated that every citizen duly enrolled in the militia, should be constantly provided with arms, accoutremen's, and ammunition, agreeable to the directions of said act," which has just been read. Neither of these laws has ever been repealed; they are both in full force; and it rests with the Legislatures of the respective States (as it would if Mr. Poinsett's plan were adopted) to say whether they will enfore them. Then the Secretary of War only proposed, in this particular, to embrace in his plan the re-enactment of the old law. Is it not just—is it not fair—that the country should know and understand this important fact, before they pass the sentence of condemnation, which is demanded against him? No just or impartial man will say no. So much for his startling parade of individual expenditures and burdens, which are just the same that every militiaman is now subject to, and no more.

That nothing which could possibly excite feelings of prejudice or indignation against the Secretary of War, or the Administration, might be omited, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] has brought to your view the 28th clause of Mr. Poinsett's projet, and has characterized it as one of its new and unprecedented features. Here, again, sir, the Senator is mistaken; the enactment proposed in that clause is not without high precedent. The Senator, I presume, will acknowledge that Wm. B. Giles of Virginia, was, throughout his life, one of the most distinguished Republicans of this Union. The gentleman will, doubtless, be surprised when I tell him that the Secretary of War but followed in his footsteps when framing this clause, as he did in those of General Knox, and General Harrison (one or both) in all the other important features of his plan. Having already consumed so much time, Mr. President, I will only read the clause of Mr. Poinsett's projet, which has been referred to, and the 6th section of a bill reported in the Senate by Mr. Giles, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on Saturday, the 5th of November, 1814.

The 28th clause in Mr. Poinsett's plan:

"28th. That every officer, non-commissioned officer, artificer, musician, or private of the militia, who shall fail to obey the orders of the United States, in the case provided for calling forth the active force, or parts thereof, (in the 17th head,) shall be fined, and forfeit a sum not exceeding three months' pay, nor less than half a month's pay, according to the circumstances of the case, as a court martial may determine: and that every officer, non-commissioned officer, artificer, musician, or private of the militia, who shall fail to obey the orders of the President of the United States, in any of the cases cited in the 18th and 19th heads, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one year's pay, and not less than one month's pay, to be determined and adjudged, according to the circumstances of the case, by a court martial; and such officer shall, moreover be liable to be cashiered by sentence of a court martial, and be incapacitated from holding a commission in the militia for a term of 4 years, at the discretion of said court; and non-commissioned officers and privates shall be liable to be imprisoned by the sentence of a court martial, on failure of the payment of fines adjudged against them, for one calendar month for every five dollars of such fine."

Section 6 of Mr. Giles's bill:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every officer, non-commissioned, or private, of the militia, who shall fail to obey the orders of the President of the United States, in carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding ——— years' pay, nor less than ——— months' pay, and such officer shall, moreover, be liable to be cashiered by sentence of a court martial, and be incapacitated from holding a commission in the militia for a term not exceeding ———, at the discretion of the said court; and such non-commissioned officer and private shall be liable to be imprisoned, by a like sentence, on failure to pay the fines adjudged against them, being respectively for one calendar month for every five dollars of such fine."

Now, sir, will the gentleman, can he, point out the difference? Let not the gentleman say that this bill, or the section I have read, had exclusive reference to the war—upon examination he will find that all the usual duties of enrolling, classing, and every other duty, almost, connected with the organization of the militia, may be found in this bill of Mr. Giles. The sixth section of the bill, as I have shown, proposed that the punishment of being fined, imprisoned or cashiered, was to be inflicted by a sentence of a court martial, for failing "to obey the orders of the President of the United States, in carrying into effect any of the provisions of that act." After the exhibition of this further precedent and authority for the plan of the Secretary of War, I hope the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] will not insist on ascribing to him such exclusive originality. I dare say, it is an honor, of which he is not now peculiarly ambitious.

Mr. Giles's bill was founded on the projet of Mr. Monroe, who was then Secretary of War; but neither the talents, high standing, public services, nor Republican virtue, of those two distinguished men, could save them from the vituperation and abuse of the Federal party, which was then in opposition to the Democratic administration of Mr. Madison. To show you how ready that class of politicians are to find fault with any and every Republican administration, and how unsparing and reckless they are in their denunciations, I beg leave to read you some remarks from the seventh volume of Niles's Weekly Register, showing the manner in which the Opposition then spoke of the projet of Mr. Monroe, and the bill of Mr. Giles. The article I shall read is in reply to the vituperation of the then Opposition; and I shall leave it to the Senate to judge how far a similar notice might not be justly taken of the denunciation heaped upon the present Secretary of War and the President. The following is the article to which I allude.

"Militia drafts—or 'Conscription.'

"The ghost of 'French influence' being laid in the sea that washes the shores of the little island of Elba—faction, at a loss for some noisy word, happily grasped 'conscription,' and wielded it with no little effect, on the minds of the people. It is astonishing how complete may be a delusion when a large body of men unite and act together, to mislead the judgment—and I dare say, there are tens of thousands of very honest men, who really believe that the plans for raising a military force, lately before Congress, had their origin with Napoleon Bonaparte, and never were embodied on paper but by him, except in the projet of the Secretary of War, or in the bill recently reported to the Senate by Mr. Giles.

"To undeceive honest men, and give our readers in general a document of high interest, we devote a great part of this number to the insertion of Washington's plan for organizing an army in 1790. That it was his plan, is undeniable from the assertion of General Knox, that 'it was modified according to the alterations you [Washington] were pleased to insert.'

"We heartily recommend it to the perusal of every one. Let Mr. Monroe's projet (page 137) and Mr. Giles's bill, (page 181) be also carefully read—and let the reader lay his hand on his heart, and say which looks the most like a 'conscription.'"

[Niles's Register, Saturday, January 7, 1815.

Thus, sir, we find the opposition to the Republican Administration of Mr. Madison crying out against the militia plan of the Secretary of War, and denouncing as "conscription" the bill reported on that basis by his leading Democratic friend in the Senate of the United States. In reference to the violent and extravagant denunciations which have been hurled by their political enemies against the present Secretary of War, and the President, we might exclaim, with the writer of the article you have just heard: "It is astonishing how complete may be a delusion, when a large body of men unite and act together, to mislead the judgment!"

Amongst other complaints made by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] is this—that the President warmly recommends the plan of the Secretary of War. As I understand much exertion has been used in elaborate addresses, as well as speeches, to fix this charge upon the President, whilst I am upon the subject, it may be well to show what he did say, in contradistinction to what he did not say. What he did say, and all he said, upon the subject, is to be found in this short paragraph:

"The present condition of the defences of our principal seaports and navy yards, as represented by the accompanying report of the Secretary of War, calls for the early and serious attention of Congress; and, as connecting itself intimately with this subject, I cannot recommend too strongly to your consideration the plan submitted by that officer for the organization of the militia of the United States."

Now, sir, the President does not say here, as may have been, and doubtless has been, represented, that he recommends the plan to the adoption of Congress. After alluding to the condition of the "defences of our principal seaports and navy yards" in a manner to indicate that they "required our early and serious attention," as intimately connected with that subject, he says he "cannot recommend too strongly to your consideration the plan submitted by that officer (the Secretary of War) for the organization of the militia of the United States." There is certainly a vast difference, as it must strike the mind of every one, between calling on us to adopt and calling on us to consider a plan. He could not well have said less, and have directed our attention to the report at all. Besides, at that time, he had nothing before him but the general outline of the plan, as contained in the Secretary's annual report. The details of the plan, which have been seized upon as unconstitutional and abnoxious, were not made out till about three months afterwards; the letter containing them bears date on the 20th of March last, responsive to a resolution of the House, and were never seen by the President till after they were presented. Hear what the Secretary himself says on this point in reply to the Secretary of the Central Democratic Committee of Virginia:

"The President concurred with me in opinion with regard; to the importance of reorganizing the militia at this time but had no agency in preparing the plan reported to Congress and no previous knowledge of its details. It was prepared, as has already been stated, at the request of a Committee of the House of Representatives expressed at the close of last session, and reported to this Congress upon a call of the House, made directly upon the Secretary of War, and, as is usual in all such cases, sent to that body without being previously submitted to the President. With it or its details he, therefore, had nothing to do."

Such is the deliberate statement of a man who could not be suspected of falsehood or prevarication by any man who is acquainted with his character. I will add this question for the consideration of every man of fairness and liberality: Is it possible for the President to perform the other duties of his high and reponsible office, and examine all the reports of the heads of departments and bureaus, during the session of Congress? Who will answer in the affirmative?

I trust, Mr. President, I have already said enough to excuse the committee for not having indignantly rebuked the President and Secretary, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] said we should have done. If any thing further should be necessary, however, I would only remind the Senator, that he and the committee have occupied positions, in reference to this matter, altogether different. The committee had duties of a somewhat judicial nature devolved upon them, and were bound to investigate and decide with fairness and impartiality—whilst the Senator has appeared, in much that he has said, rather more in the character and spirit of a prosecuting attorney.

Finding it impossible to urge the conviction of Mr. Pointsett successfully, sustained as he is by the reports of Gen. Knox and Gen. Harrison, the Senator from South Carolina has rather admitted they had gone too far, and has endeavored to excuse them, whilst he censured the present Secretary with so much acrimony. How does he attempt this exculpation? Why, sir, by reminding us that they were old soldiers, and, when their reports were made, still smarting under wounds received in their country's service, which were not then completely cicatrized! Whether Gen. Knox had received wounds I really do not recollect, he had, however, been out of military service some ten years, I suppose, when his report was made—and at least long enough to calm his feeelings, and moderate his military enthusiasm. Nor do I know whether General Harrison had received wounds in the military service of his country. He certainly did not at Lower Sandusky, for he was with his army, about seven miles distant, with his munitions and stores all piled up ready for the torch; with troubled pace, walking to and fro; wringing his hands and exclaiming, "his blood be upon his own head, I wash my hands of it"—while the youthful but gallant Croghan, with about one hundred and thirty men, and one six-pounder, in a fort he had been ordered by his General (Harrison) to abandon, as indefensible, achieved a most glorious and ever memorable victory over British and Indians combined, to the number of about two thousand. He received no wound at the River Raisin where the brave and patriotic Kentuckians, under Gen. Winchester, were overwhelmed by superior force, and massacred in cold blood by the Indian allies of Great Britain with the permission of British officers, whilst he [Gen. Harrison) reposed with his army at Camp Meigs, within some thirty miles, or one day's forced march. Instead of marching to the relief of those unfortunate men, he burnt his stores, and retreated to Carrying river. He received no wound at the seige of Fort Meigs, (of which I have ever heard,) for he remained securely in his fort, while the chivalrous Col. Miller (now a member of Congress from Missouri) by his brave and successful sortie, obtained a victory, which settled the difficulty, and entitled him to imperishable fame. Nor did he receive any wound at the battle of the Thames, having reluctantly pursued the enemy from Sandwich, and having been (if I am correctly informed) at a respectable distance from the threatre of conflict and danger. Talk of Gen. Harrison's wounds indeed! Why, sir, if I do not wholly misunderstand the history of his military career, he never has been personally engaged in any battle, (unless when a young man, while serving with Gen. Wayne,) except the battle of Tippecanoe, in which he was caught inadvertently, having shamefully followed the suggestion or advice of his savage enemy, to encamp in a position acknowledged by himself to have been favorable to such an attack; and even there I believe he escaped unhurt, whilst the courageous and dauntless Joseph Hamilton Daviess and his brave Kentucky friends, fell the victims of his indiscreet and ill-judged conduct. No, sir: General Harrison had no wounds of which I have ever heard, to excite or impel him to propose his extravagant and monstrous schemes, either to train 100,000 men for six weeks in the year, at the public expense, or "for the military instruction of all the youth of the United States." I have shown that his letter to Governor Scott, of Kentucky of the 10th of March, 1839, written three years before the war, contained both propositions.

Mr. President: I will detain the Senate no longer. I think I have said enough to satisfy all reasonable and fair men, that Mr. Poinsett's projet for reorganizing and disciplining the militia, does not contain all those startling features of monstrosity, which have been ascribed to it by the Senator from South Carolina, here, and by his political friends elsewhere. I have shown, too, that however objectionable the plan of Mr. Poinsett may be, censure comes with a bad grace from the supporters of General Harrison, who has outstripped all who have preceded or followed after him, in regard to the time he would require training and the expenditures he would make from the public Treasury—even "by laying on additional taxes"—independent of the enormous expense of his system of universal military instruction for our youth. And, sir, I have established (as I believe) by clear and indisputable documentary proof, that Gen. Harrison was a black cockade federalist during the administration of the elder Adams, and that he remains a Federalist, even unto this day.

I thank the Senate for the kind indulgence with which they have honored me.

NOTE.—Since this speech was delivered, I find the first section of the bill, reported by General Harrison in January, 1817 requires every private of the militia to "provide himself with a good musket," or "with a good rifle," and other equipments, as proposed by Mr. Poinsett, and as now required by the act of May 8. 1792. The same bill, in the 15th section, declared "That the officers and non-commissioned officers, when encamped, (as was required,) under the preceding provisions, shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, &c." Consequently, as regards the individual expense of the militia arming themselves, Mr. Poinsett but followed the example of General Harrison, as well as General Knox.

SPEECH OF MR. STRANGE,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE SENATE, May 19, 1840.

On the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. STRANGE addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The subject now under consideration has perplexed Congress, and divided public opinion, as much as any other since the foundation of the Government; and I should have been happy to have left its discussion entirely to abler hands. But, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, my peculiar situation (differing, as I do, in many particulars, with each of my colleagues) will excuse my troubling the Senate and the country somewhat at large.

I assume, for the present, that a bankrupt law of some kind is to pass during the present session of Congress, and that the question now is, under what form it will best commend itself to the favor of the American people. Whether in any bankrupt law the claims of justice and humanity can be so made to harmonize as that neither shall suffer, or, in case of irreconcileable hostility between them, which shall most command our regard, are grave questions, that ought not to be hastily or unadvisedly answered. For my own part, I have hitherto believed that Justice stood frowning in the pathway towards any bankrupt law, and have been thereby deterred from taking any step in that direction. But the wailings of distress coming, as I am told, from five hundred thousand of my fellow-citizens, have reached my ear, and their cries for relief have so wrought upon my feelings, that I am compelled to unite in an effort to devise some plan by which justice to the creditor and humanity to the debtor can be reconciled. Failing in this, the question must recur to be decided, on which side moral and constitutional principles preponderate. In the mean time, I stand unpledged upon this great question; for, although a member of the committee by which the bill was reported, I only expressed my preference for the amendment submitted by the chairman, [Mr. Wall,] on the part of the minority, over the bill, as presented from the majority, by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. Clayton.] I was not, however, satisfied with either plan; nor am I yet satisfied, as will be seen in the course of the remarks I am about to submit.

Several principal points suggest themselves in the consideration of this subject. 1st. What natural persons, and under what circumstances, may be constitutionally declared bankrupt? 2d. What natural persons, and under what circumstances, it is expedient to declare bankrupt? 3d. What is the answer to both these questions in relation to corporations?

The first two of these questions have been so fully and ably discussed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Webster] that I feel myself engaged in a heartless task in going over the same ground; but the importance of the subject and some differences in our views, will, I trust, excuse my doing so.

The authority, and the only authority which Congress has for legislating on this subject, is found in the 4th clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution of the United States. Congress shall have power "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." Here is as large a charter as the wind, so far as the subject of bankruptcies is concerned; and to ascertain our power, it is only necessary to settle the meaning of the terms used. No one acknowledges with more pleasure than myself, that this is a Government of limited powers, and that it can demand nothing that is not set forth in the bond. I am a State Rights man of the straitest sect. In conformity with these principles I hold that in general, if not invariably, every word in the Constitution is to be taken in its popular sense. In the English language, "bankrupt" has a well settled signification. Bankruptcy of course signifies the state of being a bankrupt. Many, I know, have entangled themselves by fanciful etymologies of the word by which they attempt to limit its signification. Some suppose it a compound of two Latin words, bancus—a bank, and ruptus—broken. It is to be remarked, however, that few Latin dictionaries give us the word bancus at all; and in Ainsworth's, where it is found, it is marked as bad Latin—coined doubtless to furnish a synonyme for our important word—bank. Others, more correctly, perhaps, but with quite as little utility, trace it to the Italian words banco and rotto, which do, in fact, signify broken bench; in allusion, it is said, to the practice in Venice of breaking the benches of the money dealers who became fraudulent or insolvent. Again it is by some brought down to us through the French word banque-route; banque, in French, being synonymous with mensa in Latin, or table in English; and routo with vestigium in Latin, and footstep or trace in English—a term, it is said, derived from the Roman mensarii, which were set up in public places, and when a trader slipped away, with an intention to deceive his creditors, he left only some vestigia or signs of his table or shop behind him. From this, it is argued that, as the persons concerning whom this term originated were necessarily traders, or they could have no bancus—banco—banque—bench or table, it can now be properly applied to traders only, and as the first legal proceeding in regard to them was compulsory, and so continued up to the adoption of the Constitution, that no other than a compulsory proceeding could be contemplated in the bankruptcies spoken of in the Constitution. The bare statement of such an argument is enough to excite a smile, and seems very like trifling with the gravity of Senatorial discussion. If we must have an etymology for "bankrupt" and "bankruptcy," why not content ourselves with one much more simple, and, for aught I can see, quite as probable as those before mentioned? One of the significations of our word "bank," is a heap or pile of any thing. It appears to me, then, to be a far better figure than that of the broken bench, to suppose a man's estate, wealth or fortune, to be typically spoken of as a pile or heap of money; and when this heap is broken or swept away, either by imprudence, calamity, or under the authority of law, according to a very common formation of English words, he may be very properly described as bank—rupt.

But whatever difficulties we may have about the etymology of these words, there is none in ascertaining their popular signification. Lexicographers, and good writers in past times, all show us that bankrupt was early used to signify one who was not able to meet his engagements. Johnson's definition of bankrupt, in his dictionary, is "one indebted beyond the power of payment." Shakspeare makes one of his characters to say: "Sir, if you spend word for word with me, I will make your wit bankrupt." And another, "Time is a very bankrupt, and owes more than he has wit to season."

Johnson, in his life of the poet Blackmore, says: "To hinder that intellectual bankruptcy, he affects to fear he will erect a bank for wit." Dr. Barrow, of whom that sprighlty monarch, Charles the Second, wittily remarked he was an unfair preacher, because he left nothing for others to say, in one of his charity sermons, observes: "The poor man's pocket is a bank for our money, which can never deceive us—all the rich traders may decay and break, but the poor man can never fail, unless God himself become bankrupt." Here, then, are some ancient instances of the use of the words "bank," "bankrupt," and "bankruptcy," in which it would be ridiculous, and, in one at least, impious, to suppose that there was any notion of an allusion to a bench, either whole or broken.

But it is insisted by some, that whatever may have been, or now is, the popular signification of the word "bankruptcies," it is a term of science known to the English law, having there an established technical meaning; and it is further urged that in that sense it was used by the framers of our Constitution; and consequently, in reference thereto are our powers upon the subject to be construed. That as known to the English law, "bankruptcy," ex vi termini, meant a compulsory process issued against a "trader," who had committed some one or more of certain acts; and that therefore, Congress can pass no bankrupt law including under its operation other persons than traders, or depending in any degree for its action upon any other motion than that of the creditor. I admit that the Constitution, like any other instrument, is to be taken according to the intent of those who framed it, provided they have used words fairly expressive of that intent. But I know of no rule requiring us, when a word has two meanings, the one technical and the other popular, to prefer the former, unless there be something in the instrument itself, or in the subject-matter, to indicate that preference. Where neither of these exist, common sense demands a precisely opposite course. What is the main object of a written Constitution? Is it not to secure the people at large against the tyranny of those in power? And to give effect to that object, must not the instrument be subject to the interpretation of the people? Must the people wait until some person makes the discovery for them, that their liberties are assailed, before they are to rise in their defence? It was a complaint against a Roman Emperor, that he hung his decrees too high for the people to read them. And is it to be supposed that the framers of our Constitution couched it in language which the mass of the people could not comprehend? Simplicity, and a readiness to be understood, are most essential qualities of a Constitution, and it can never be supposed, and strong evidence only should convince us that portions of ours require a thorough knowledge of abstruse branches of the law of a foreign land on the part of those who would understand them. It was never the intention of our political forefathers to keep us forever in leading-strings to Great Britain, and that every step taken by us, in law or politics, should be regulated by what she had done. But it is too much the fashion of those whose business it is to reduce our Constitution to practical results, to act as if this were so. Generally lawyers, they bring their professional habits of thinking with them into the National Legislature, and are forever recurring to those fountains for political, from whence they are accustomed to draw professional knowledge. It is a vice which I sincerely hope will ere long be corrected, and that we shall cease the unwise practice of putting new wine into old bottles, and piecing out new garments with shreds and patches from the old and threadbare.

When, then, we look to the general design of that sacred instrument, the Constitution, there is every thing pointing to its general use of words in the popular sense, and there is nothing in the passage under consideration indicating any exception in the word bankruptcies. The point of the argument with those who insist upon a technical meaning of the word bankruptcy, is, that there is a recognised and established distinction in the English law between bankruptcy and insolvency—that bankruptcy confines itself to traders, and is a compulsory process always instigated by the creditor, while insolvency embraces all classes of persons indebted beyond their ability to pay, and is a relief sought for by the debtor—and that our Constitution authorizing Congress to legislate on the subject of bankruptcies, used the word with these limitations. I have already said that I do not admit the obligation to resort to English law books for the meaning of words used in our Constitution, but if I did, high authority warrants me in saying that there is no such established distinction as that contended for between the two terms bankruptcy and insolvency. In the first place, the first English Bankrupt law, to wit: 34th Henry VIII, chap. 4, did not confine itself to merchants and traders, and the amended law of 13th Eliz. chap. 7, did not discharge the debt. In what, then, did these two acts differ from an insolvent law? If any thing can be considered the peculiarly distinguishing characteristic of a bankrupt, from an insolvent law, it is the discharge of the debt; and yet we find a bankrupt law has existed (and even in England, too, where nothing can be wrong) without that feature. It is true there are two forms of proceeding known to the English law: one by which the effects of the debtor are distributed according to fixed rules, and the debt forever discharged; the other by which the debtor himself distributes his effects according to his caprice, (provided there be no fraud,) and his person only is discharged. But there is no established wall of partition separating those two into distinct systems; neither is there any thing in the nature of either which would prevent their being resorted to in every case, mutatis mutandis. Chitty, an English law writer of the highest authority, in his third volume of Commercial Law, chap. 18, p. 687, says:

"We have now only to pursue our inquiries into the remedies of creditors, where the debtor is generally unable for a time to pay his creditors, or is absolutely bankrupt or insolvent."

He here uses those two words as equivalent. Those who insist upon the distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency, say that bankruptcy applies to an inability to pay with punctuality, and insolvency to an inability to pay at all. Now Mr. Chitty, in the same chapter, says, in treating of general insolvency, after speaking of time given by creditors:

"Secondly, where the debtor becomes bankrupt or an insolvent debtor. The term insolvency, (derived from the Latin word insolvendum,) when used in an act of Parliament, has been construed to signify an inability on the part of the debtor to pay with punctuality, and at the appointed day, the debt due from him."

Adopting the very signification for insolvency which the advocates for distinction give to bankruptcy, and thus establishing their identity. And further, at page 721, after referring to the various remedies which had been treated of for an individual creditor, he adds: "Upon a little consideration we shall perceive that when a party is bankrupt or insolvent, those remedies would be inadequate," still speaking of them as identical, and then goes on to speak of the peculiar advantages of the proceeding in bankruptcy as accruing to the benefit of all the creditors.

But to come nearer home, Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat, Rep. 194, says:

"But the subject is divisible in its nature into bankrupt and insolvent laws, though the line of partition between them is not so distinctly marked as to enable any person to say, with positive precision, what belongs exclusively to the one, and not to the other, class of laws. It is said, for example, that laws which merely liberate the persons are insolvent laws, and those which discharge the contract are bankrupt laws. But if an act of Congress should discharge the person of the bankrupt, and leave his future acquisitions liable to his creditors, we should feel much hesitation in saying that this was an insolvent and not a bankrupt law, and therefore unconstitutional. Another distinction has been stated and uniformly observed. Insolvent laws operate at the instance of an imprisoned debtor, bankrupt laws at the instance of the creditor. But should an act of Congress, authorize a commission of bankruptcy to issue on the application of a debtor, a court would scarcely be warranted in saying that the law was unconstitutional."

And again, at page 195:

"This difficulty of discriminating with any accuracy between insolvent and bankrupt laws, would lead to the opinion that a bankrupt law may contain those regulations which are generally found in insolvent laws, and that an insolvent law may contain those which are common to a bankrupt law."

Thus, I think, very clearly settling the question of any real distinction in the nature of the two things. For if one may be made at pleasure just what the other may, who can say there is any natural or invariable distinction between them? It seems, then, that the popular and technical senses of the word bankruptcy are so nearly the same, that it is a mere sticking in the bark of the tree to assume any substantial distinction them. I still insist, however, that if it were otherwise to the popular sense, we ought to attach ourselves. I do not deny that the immediate effect will be to extend the power of this Government upon this particular subject. But the general effect will be to keep the construction of the Constitution in the proper hands—those of the people, and not to deliver it over to experts, or a sort of priesthood, who, like those of the ancient heathen gods, will pronounce from it, with oracular solemity, whatever it may suit their own views to pass for truth. Lasting liberty is in the one system—inevitable and quick coming slavery in the other. Who, then, can hesitate in choosing between them?

I will not trouble myself with the question, to what extent the States may go on the subject of bankruptcy, should Congress decline the exercise of its powers, although I will remark, in passing, that, in my humble judgment, much error has issued from high places on this point.

Assuming, then, as I think I may safely do, that the Constitution gives to Congress the whole field of insolvency, in its widest extent, for the exercise of its powers, I propose to say a few words on the expediency of extending the provisions of any law which may be passed by Congress, beyond the limits embraced in the English bankrupt laws in 1789; and in so doing I hope to add a little strength to the positions heretofore assumed.

The relationship of debtor and creditor has probably existed from the earliest period of civilization. In almost all ages and all lands, the creditor classes have had much direct or indirect agency in their legislation, while the debtor classes have had little or none. The natural effect followed, and the rights of creditors were sedulously and promptly guarded by law, while those of the debtor, and his claims to mercy, have been overlooked or tardily considered. In Rome, the proud patricians were not only the governors of the realm, but owned all its wealth, and ever held as debtors, wretched plebeians, who, as common soldiers, toiled for a fame that they seldom shared, and by the law of the twelve tables, might, in case of insolvency, be cut into fragments to satisfy, in proportion, the conflicting claims of different creditors. By other laws of the same realm scarcely less cruel, the debtor might be imprisoned in chains, subjected to stripes and hard labor, or sold with his wife and children into perpetual foreign slavery (trans Tiberim) to satisfy the demands of a cruel creditor. Very similar regulations seem to have existed among other nations, and we are told that in some parts of the East Indies, the wife of the debtor was the lawful victim of the passions of a relentless creditor, and the debt was cancelled by the eternal dishonor of the debtor and his wife, without the consent of either. Such was the state of the world when the light of Christianity dawned upon it. The nonpayment of a debt was considered an inexpiable crime, while the most flagrant cruelties might be practised to enforce it without sullying the fame or disturbing the conscience of the creditor. But the Sun of Righteousness first gilded with its beams the fetters of the unfortunate debtor, and darted rays of consolation into his desolate dungeon, and then with a power unknown to any physical solvent, melted the chains from his limbs, and dissipated as a mist the walls that surrounded him, and sent him forth to breath in security the air of freedom. Laws were made at Rome under the Christian emperors, by which a debtor who ceded his property to his creditors, was freed from their power. Still this was no discharge of the debtor, and his future acquisitions were liable to be seized. Humanity, however, made a further appeal in behalf of the hapless debtor, and it was provided, that where a debtor was, by any unforeseen accident, reduced to low circumstances, and would swear that he had not wherewith to pay his debts, he should not be compelled to give up even what was in his possession.

This last provision is probably the true germ of the bankrupt principle. Exposure to unforeseen accident, it will be found, is the ground upon which, throughout the English laws, those claiming the benefit of the bankrupt law were entitled to their discharge. England was originally settled by a warlike people, and no laws seem to have existed there by which the body of the debtor was subjected to imprisonment for a debt, properly so called, until the statute 25, Edward III. chapter 17, when the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, which had previously been used only in actions where force was charged against the defendant, was allowed to a creditor to enforce the payment of a debt. We are here presented with a striking instance of the greater heartlessness and cruelty of Mercury than of Mars. We have reason to think that until Rome, in ancient times, and England in modern, became trading nations, no freeman was consigned to the common receptacle of felons, to enforce the payment of a debt. The laws, as well as the morals, of a country, are much more dependent upon her previous habits and existing interests, than is generally imagined; and in trading nations we find both the morals and laws ranking breaches of contract with the highest crimes; and, without intending a pun, from that influence the forger and the murderer are made to stand upon the same platform; a decision of corrupted justice, which unsophisticated humanity can never sanction. This, together with the previously stated fact that the lawgivers are generally of the creditor classes, has imparted a peculiar sternness to legislation in all trading countries, upon the subject of contract, and has even left some traces of it in that sacred charter, our Federal Constitution. But from time to time, for eighteen hundred years, a spirit of mercy has been struggling with it, and this sternness has relaxed. The genius of Democracy has brought the poor man into the halls of legislation, and the debtor is no longer friendless, but finds a sympathy in the bosom of the lawmaker and the judge, and the Legislature has become a mediator between the debtor and the creditor. This is among the proudest of the many trophies of which this benignant genius has reason to boast. This spirit, while it has left in our Constitution a rigid prohibition on the States from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts, has planted there the provision under which it is now proposed to legislate.

The first step taken in other countries was, as I have said, to accept the goods, and acquit the person, but to retain the liability, of the future acquisitions of the debtor. Thus far most of the States in this Union have gone, and many of them, it is believed, are disposed to go much farther.

The next step was to emancipate the debtor fully upon the surrender of all his present possessions, and allow him to make a new beginning in the world; and that is the example we are now asked to follow. Still this has been confined to those who, by unforseen accidents, were reduced to low circumstances, for although by the law of England a trader only was the subject of this provision, yet it was on account of his peculiar liability to these unforseen accidents, that he was to be dealt with differently from other insolvent debtors. It will be remembered that I am not now discussing whether any bankrupt law should be passed, but if any, what should be its cardinal provisions. We have now reached the point in this discussion that brings us to the principle on which the peculiar provisions of a bankrupt law are based. Is it a mere progression in the road where insolvency leads—a further amelioration of the condition of the debtor, or a step in the direction precisely opposite, providing more securely for the payment of the creditor? I have no hesitation in pronouncing it the former. The very reasons assigned by writers on the subject, for excluding all but "traders," shows that it was designed as a favor to them. Hear what one of them says:

Judge Blackstone, in his Commentaries, vol. 2, page 472, after speaking of the treatment of debtors under the Roman laws at different periods, says:

"The laws of England, more wisely, have steered in the middle between two extremes; providing at once against the inhumanity of the creditor, who is not suffered to confine an honest bankrupt after his effects are delivered up, and at the same time taking care that all his just debts shall be paid so far as the effects will extend. But still they are cautious of encouraging prodigality and extravagance by this indulgence to debtors: and therefore they allow the benefit of the laws of bankruptcy to none but actual traders; since that set of men are, generally speaking, the only persons liable to accidental losses, and to an inability of paying their debts without any fault of their own. If persons in other situations of life run in debt with the power of payment, they must take the consequences of their own indiscretion even though they meet with sudden accidents that may reduce their fortunes; for the law holds it to be an unjustifiable practice for any person but a trader to encumber himself with debts of any considerable value. If a gentleman, or one in a liberal profession, at the time of contracting his debts, has a sufficient fund to pay them, the delay of payment is a species of dishonesty and a temporary injustice to his creditors; and if at such time he has not sufficient fund, the dishonesty and injustice is the greater. He cannot, therefore, murmur if he suffers the punishment which he has voluntarily drawn upon himself. But, in mercantile transactions, the case is far otherwise. Trade cannot be carried on without mutual credit on both sides. The contracting of debts is, therefore, here not only justifiable, but necessary. And if, by accidental calamities, as by the loss of a ship in a tempest, the failure of brother traders, or the non-payment of persons out of trade, a merchant or trader becomes incapable of discharging his own debts, it is his misfortune and not his fault. To the misfortunes, therefore, of debtors, the law has given a compassionate remedy, but denied it to their faults: since, at the same time that it provides for the security of commerce by enacting that every considerable trader my be declared a bankrupt for the benefit of his creditors as well as himself, it has also, to discourage extravagance, declared that no one shall be capable of receiving the full benefit of the statutes, but only an industrious trader."

It is not then a system opposite to that of the insolvent laws, but carries still farther the spirit of benignity in favor of the debtor. It is true, while thus providing for the comfort of the debtor, it takes every means to compel him, as he avails himself of it, to do, on his part, faithfully what he professes, and all that machinery in the bankrupt system, which, in the eyes of some, have given it the frightful appearance of adding weight to the debtor's chains, and strengthening the walls of his prison, has no other design. If a benefit, then, while extended to one class of our citizens, shall it be denied to others?

But there is another fact which has been omitted in Mr. Blackstone's account of the reasons for extending the bankrupt laws to traders only; and that is, that traders were, at the time of the introduction of those laws, peculiar favorites of English legislation. It was her policy to attract foreign merchants to her shores, and special inducements were held out to them to come there. The privilege of bankruptcy was among the number. Have we any such policy in view? Heaven knows we have merchants enough for their own good, or that of their country, and need not infringe the principles of equality to obtain them. Since the period referred to, England has been gradually bringing within her bankrupt laws class after class, either as a favor to those so brought in, or to give wider extent to a remedy that was found convenient. Whether then considered as a remedy to the creditor or a benefit to the debtor, that nation has been gradually tending, in its application of it, to that equality which our forefathers deemed the very perfection of political institutions. Equality is an argument on the question of expediency difficult to overcome, for including all classes or none. I do not deny that modifications may be made suited to the peculiar circumstances and condition of each class. But it seems to me that the rights of the creditor and debtor should be correlative. While the debtor may, on his own motion, surrender his property, and have it divided among his creditors, it should be in the power of the creditor to compel him to do so. Such is the principle of the insolvent laws, now in force in the States. The debtor applies for the relief afforded by the law whenever he pleases, and the creditor may, by putting him in jail, force him to do so. I see no reason why the same principle may not justly and wisely be carried out in the law of bankruptcy. Most of the reasons which, in England, gave a specious claim to preferences in favor of the merchants, utterly fail in this country. Here the farmer's lands are subject to sale for debt: it was not so there: a landed debtor might fold his arms in his own castle and defy his creditor, and the policy of the law was with him. Here, employments are not, as there, so divided as to confine any man exclusively to one; and there is scarcely an individual in our country who, whatever may be his principal employment, is not more or less involved in the hazards of trade. But mainly and lastly, the paper system has drawn every one irresistibly into its vortex; it has made itself the precarious basis of all employments; it has undermined the firmest foundations, so that no man is now secure against those unforeseen accidents which were once peculiar to the trader. Let it be supposed that the most cautious person had due him, in the State of Mississippi, $10,000, upon some most responsible individual. It is actually in judgment, and execution levied upon property, relied on as doubly sufficient to raise the amonnt. Who would say that under these circumstances he would be a very rash man to contract a debt for $5,000 for a piece of property supposed to be valuable? He might well calculate on paying for the property purchased, and having $5,000 left. His debt is collected, but it is in Mississippi money; and by the time he gets it home, it is worth just fifty per cent. and will barely discharge the obligation he has incurred. But let us carry the supposition a little farther, and suppose his purchase to have been for $7,500. Here he had calculated on a surplus of $2,500, but instead of a surplus, it turns out that there is a deficit of $2,500. This the property must be sold to meet; and, in the mean time, it has fallen 50 per cent. One or two such operations, which the most prudent man, who ever goes in debt at all, might well have made, render him a hopeless bankrupt. Into this vortex of the paper system every man is drawn—if in no other way, as the holder of bank paper. But not only so; every article of property that he owns rises and falls with every bank expansion and contraction, like the mercury in the thermometer.

With the reason, then, let the law be extended, and if a bankrupt system is salutary for one class of men, it is so for all; and if it be proper for one class of creditors to have such means of securing their rights, I see not why it should not be available for all. Ours is a Commonwealth, not only in theory but in practice. We are all subject to the same evils. Our habits have made us so. What reason, then, can there be why we should not have a community in remedies?

The remaining question is, whether it is constitutional and expedient to subject corporations to the general law of bankruptcy? I confess I should be rather surprised at this being made a question at all, did not my respect for some who raise it, cause me to distrust the conclusions of my own mind, even in a case where they have been most unhesitatingly recahed, and undoubtingly held. Corporations are legal entities, and although they have no souls to be saved, or bodies to suffer, yet they are, in contemplation of law, persons, capable of suing and being sued, having capacity to use, and to be subject to every legal process where no physical law renders inefficient the laws of man. They are certainly not excepted by any words in the Constitution, and it is surely incumbent upon those who allege their claim to exemption from the incidents belonging to other persons and traders, to point out to us the foundation of that claim.

I have listened with attention to the Senators who have occupied this portion of the field of discussion, and have heard nothing that presents to my mind the semblance of a reason why they should not be included. Much ingenuity, I confess, has been displayed, but from the known ability of those who have offered them, the weakness of the arguments on the other side would have confirmed me, had I needed any confirmation, in the correctness of my first impressions.

It is not pretended that corporations are expressly excluded from the sweeping authority contained in the 4th clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution; but it is insisted that there could have been no intention to include them. The Senator from Massachusetts, with what seems to me a most marked inconsistency, while in the former part of his argument he contended for the most unlimited extent of power over this subject, and, as I thought, properly, in this part of the argument, unites himself with the advocates for restriction. Let us hear the reasons offered for excepting corporations.

With prejudice or passion there is no reasoning, and whenever I hear a man appealing to prejudices or passions, I am well assured that he is very bare of reasons. There is a sensibility with many in this country upon the subject of State rights, which I never wish to see diminished, and Heaven send us a rapid increase of the numbers by which that sensibility shall be felt. But it is a common feint of an enemy, by frequent false alarms, to blunt sensibility, and finally to take advantage of an apathy thus produced. The cry of wolf! wolf! often falsely repeated, will at length be disregarded, when the wolf really comes. There is, in my estimation, a dangerous resemblance between the cases put and the present appeal to State rights sensibilities, coming from the gentlemen who have addressed us in opposition to including corporations in a bankrupt law. Self-evident truths are the most difficult to prove by a process of reasoning, and a bold contradiction of what a man knows to be true, is one of most difficult things for a well regulated intellect to meet. There are some things so alarming, that the bare suggestion of them, as existing, disqualifies the mind for inquiring into their truth: and all these principles combine in rendering it difficult to meet the argument that the rights of the States would be infringed by meddling with corporations of their creation.

That the powers of the States are interfered with, is, in fact, true. And, alarmed at the fact, those who perceive it do not wait to inquire into the reason of its existence, or whether the interference be in truth an encroachment. Not a single power possessed by the General Government, but is so much taken from the power of the States, and the real question in every case, of the exercise of power by the General Government should be, Is it a power derived from its proper source, or is it a usurpation? If the former, it should be submitted to with cheerfulness, and if the latter, every tongue and arm should be raised against it. The power of taxation was a large limb lopped off from the power of the States, and conferred upon the General Government; and are we to stand aghast at the exercise of other conferred powers, while that one rests unquestioned?

It is too late for us to inquire whether it was a wholesome restriction upon the powers of the States, to take from them the right of passing bankrupt laws, by giving that power to Congress. This has been done; and every exercise of that power by Congress must, of necessity, so far interfere with and diminish the power of the States. But the question should not be, does an act of Congress diminish or interfere with the power of the States? It ought rather to be, is it a constitutional diminution or interference with the powers of the States that is proposed? Whatever may be the answer to the first question, if the second must be answered affirmatively, every thing is safe, and there is no cause for alarm. There is far more danger from a false interpretation of the Constitution, either way, than from any diminution of the power of the States, however vital, authorized thereby. Keep the Constitution to its proper limits, and the people see the extent of the charter they have given, in all its length and breadth. They can understand at once whether more has been assumed than has been conferred. But, stretch or contract—it is immaterial which—confusion is produced. The wall is broken down; and it will not be long ere it will cease to be remembered where it once stood.

And here, again, an alarming symptom is disclosed of that political disease which the banking system has produced in the body politic. It cannot be denied that, under any construction of the powers given to Congress upon the subject of bankruptcy, they extend to affixing the punishment of death to a violation of the provisions of such law as it may pass, and that any number of the citizens of any State may become its victims. Surely it is a morbid sensibility which feels so keenly an interference with its mere legislative creations, while it is unconscious of being touched by the destruction of any number of those who constitute the State herself, and, perhaps, even the constituents or creators of that very corporation over which she watches with such maternal and nervous solicitude.

The Senator from Massachusetts, who addressed us yesterday, [Mr. Webster,] asks a question, with a view to excite our alarm. "Have we the power," says he "to impose new duties upon corporations created by the States, and prescribe a punishment for disobedience?" Is it not quite as alarming a question, "Have we the power to impose new duties upon the citizens of a State, and prescribe the punishment for disobedience?" And yet the answer to both must be the same: yes! The Constitution has given us the power, trusting that we would execute it wisely; and can any thing but a most morbid, unnatural sensibility shrink back so instinctively from the bare touch of a State corporation, in the very act of legislating to bring her citizens within the grasp of a so much dreaded power? Capital punishments may be denounced against any number of individuals, and all is well; but the slightest exercise of authority upon corporations wakes up to agony the sensibilities of the whole country.

But it is said the State herself may be part or sole stockholder in one of these companies, and by declaring the company bankrupt, the State herself is declared bankrupt. This is a mere assumption. As well might it be said, that, when a man is declared bankrupt, all his creditors are declared bankrupt with him. It is true, whatever effects of the creditor may have been placed in the hands of the debtor to trade upon as his own, are seized upon, and the creditor only receives his pro rata dividend; but as long as he is himself solvent, the bankruptcy of his debtor does not make him a bankrupt; and any one who makes the imputation will subject himself to an action of slander. If the institution has an act of incorporation, any effects she may hold of the State, are just so much capital of the State in the hands of the corporation, trusted to it to trade upon, and if fairly and prosperously traded upon, of course no bankruptcy takes place; but if otherwise, why should not other creditors of that corporation have the same remedy against it that they would have against any other debtor? If there is no act of incorporation, and the State trades or banks, in person, so to speak, why then, whatever may be said of such act of trading in other respects, she would be altogether unaffected by a provision in the bankrupt law merely including corporations. The idea then, that the insertion of corporations might eventuate in subjecting a sovereign State to a commission of bankruptcy is a mere scare crow—a chimera existing, and which can exist only in the brain of those who conceive it. As well might it be said that a State was declared bankrupt, if one of her citizens who was indebted to her, had been subjected to a commission.

It is conceded on all hands, that this Government cannot be sued any where, and it is both a legal and political question as to the extent of liability of the States to be sued. But when this Government was a stockholder in the United States Bank, did any one question the propriety of that institution being a defendant in an action, or that her being so, compromitted the dignity, or affected the sovereignty, of this Government? Never. Has it not been expressly decided, and the propriety of that decision acquiesced in, in the case of the Bank of the United States against the Planters' Bank of Georgia, 9th Wheaton, 904:

"That when a Government becomes a partner in any trading company, it divests itself, so far as concerns the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character. Instead of communicating to the company its privileges and prerogatives, it descends to a level with those with whom it associates itself. Thus many States of this Union, (says the opinion of Judge Marshall,) who have an interest in banks, are not suable even in their own courts; yet they never exempt the corporation from being sued."

And what is a commission of bankruptcy but a legal process? And if the copartnership of the State does not exempt from one legal process, by what magic shall it exempt from another? No distinction can be broader than that between debtor and creditor; and that between States and corporations is just as broad.

It is further urged by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the State derives revenue from her corporations, and an interference by Congress with them would be an interference with the revenue of the State. I will venture to affirm that a capitation or poll tax is the most general form of taxation throughout the Union; and have we ever heard it offered as a reason against the execution of a man who had forfeited his life under a law of Congress, that his State would lose his poll tax?

But it is said we have no right to include corporations, because they had never been included in England previous to the adoption of our Constitution. This argument, I think, has already been fully answered; if not by me, at least by the Senator from Massachusetts, in discussing the question whether a bankrupt law must of necessity be confined to traders. It is further argued that this power might be so exercised as to annihilate entirely the State corporations—that this is but the fulcrum of a mighty lever which is to move the States from their foundations—that it is the assertion of the power of this Government to stretch forth its long arm and intermeddle with the affairs of the States. To show the dangerous character of this power, it has been said, that Congress under it might assume to declare that a bank issuing more notes than she had specie to redeem, might be treated as a bankrupt. This is a strange objection coming from the other side of the chamber. Have they not been urging us contiuually for years past to charter a United States Bank, mainly upon the ground that it would control the issues of the local banks? So important have they deemed such a control, that it has been looked upon as a gross dereliction of duty on the part of Congress not to charter a Bank for that very purpose, although they could find no authority for chartering such a Bank in any other way than as incidental to the power to regulate commerce. Not only so proper, but so necessary did they consider the exercise of this control, that they urged us to the assumption of powers which many think do not exist at all, which more consider exceedingly doubtful, and which they themselves can find only by implication. The establishment of the great regulator was by them considered as indispensable, and now, when an unquestionable power is found, they object to its exercise, upon the ground that one of its main results will be just that which they thought so very desirable, as to be willing to stretch the Constitution to obtain it. For my own part, this is with me one of the strongest aaguments in favor of the adoption of any bankrupt bill yet brought to my attention. I am not sure but we have found, in the power over bankruptcies, the very philosopher's stone of which we have been so long in search, by which the base material of bank paper shall be converted into substantial gold—that by this means we may regulate the paper currency of the country (if such a currency we must have) without transcending our constitutional powers.

Another instance in which it is said the power might be abused is, that if the banks should declare larger dividends than Congress thinks expedient, it might be made an act of bankruptcy. In reply, I can only say, that any power may be abused, and that it is a poor argument against the wholesome exercise of any power that it may be transcended in future. The conferring power always implies some confidence in the discretion of him on whom it is conferred. All the powers given to Congress are trusted to its discretion in their exercise, and the people are the proper correctors of their abuse. It is a weak reason for an existing Congress to decline the wholesome and needed exercise of a power, that a future Congress may abuse it. If experience should show that the declaration of large dividends tends to knavery, extravagance, and to ultimate insolvency of banks, it may be wise in Congress to declare it an act of bankruptcy; but under present circumstances, there is no reason to apprehend that Congress will do an act so unnecessary, and apparently so unjust.

But it is said bankrupt laws are not needed for corporations as for individuals. That when a bank fails, its property is gone and its existence with it; and consequently there is no person in being to take the benefit of the discharge, and begin a new course of business. This is only true in part. It depends upon the organic law of the corporation, and that plastic thing, a charter, may be made to confer vitality upon a corporation, even when the life blood, its property, has run out. But whether necessary or not for the corporations, it is highly necessary for their creditors and the country. Although, as I have already said, bankrupt laws were originally framed in mercy to the debtor, they have often proved the means of justice to the creditor. I believe it would be found a wholesome medicine to the banks; unpalatable perhaps, but nevertheless beneficial.

We are again told that it would be useless to extend a bankrupt law to corporations, because we cannot punish them criminally. It is true, we cannot imprison or hang them, but we can seize upon their property, which, by the argument last referred to, it is insisted is both the body and soul of the corporation. But is it any argument against giving the creditors of corporations all the power we can over them, that, after all, it does not amount to that which is given against individuals? It is, perhaps, unfortunate that there is no mode of enforcing the bankrupt law criminally against corporations, but that is surely no reason why we should leave them entirely unbridled. If we must give the remedy to the creditor, shorn of part of its efficiency, that is surely no good reason why we should withhold it altogether. Indeed, this argument brings to my notice a consideration that indicates a peculiar propriety in making banks the subjects of a bankrupt law. Most of the property of banks consists of choses in action, which cannot be reached by the ordinary executions of courts, and, in many ways, they have uncommon facilities in eluding the just demands of their creditors. Much more necessary, then, is it for their creditors to have this remedy, by which all the effects of the debtor, of whatsoever kind, are subjected to the payment of his creditors in equal portions.

We are next told that it would operate very injuriously upon noteholders of the banks. That while the commission was in execution they could only get, at intervals, small and inconsiderable dividends—that the notes would depreciate in their hands and cease to circulate. In the first place, these evils will depend very much upon the details of the law. But grant them to exist in unmitigated force, are they equal to the evils of a suspension? In the latter case, not a cent of the money for which the notes call can be obtained, and their value exists only in confidence, while the argument itself supposes, in the former case, the evil to be partial. The argument amounts to this: that we must bear a greater evil to avoid a less; for if a bank does not suspend, no bankrupt law will act upon it; and if it does, why should it not? But to convince us of the utility of allowing banks to suspend, and not rigidly exacting of them specie payments, we are pointed to the comparative prosperity of New York and Philadelphia at this time. In the one a rigid adherence to specie payments is observed, in the other it is altogether suspended. In the latter we are told trade is prosperous, and in the former depressed or prostrate. What is this but saying that honesty is less profitable than dishonesty, and that a man may make his interest and not his ability the measure of fulfilment of his engagements? Who doubts that stealing would be an exceedingly profitable business, if the laws of the country, instead of punishing, would license a few favorite thieves, while the prohibition upon stealing by all other persons continued? The Constitution prohibits any State from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts; and yet we here find the inclusion of the banks in a bankruptcy law resisted upon the ground of its interfering with the power of the States to allow these institutions to disregard their engagements.

Some difficulties about set-off are also adverted to by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Clayton] between a debtor and the assignees of a bankrupt. This is a mere matter of detail, and provision may be made for allowing or disallowing a set-off, as justice and policy may seem to dictate.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Webster] objects further to the inclusion of corporations, on the ground that a conflict would thereby be occasioned between the commissioners of bankruptcy and those authorized by some of the State laws to exercise supervision over corporations, and in certain cases to seize their effects. Does it not occur to that Senator that the same difficulty might arise between those same commissioners and the persons who, in case of insolvency, are, by the State laws, authorized to take charge of the effects of individuals? And does he not perceive that the security in both cases is the same, and that is, the paramount authority of those claiming under the law of the United States? Not, indeed, because the General Government has any actual control over the State Governments, or that the State Governments are not in fact the superior authority, but because, in all those cases where the States have conferred authority upon the General Government, they have taken just so much from themselves. It is impossible to give away and retain at the same time, and that which a man has given to another to use, cannot, while in the use of that other, be also employed by himself.

But the master argument of all, and that on which the gentlemen on the other side most rely, is from the old panic family—the distress and ruin that would pervade the country if the banks were all forced to wind up, as it is insisted they would be, should a bill of this kind go into operation. Let it be remembered that those banks, who fulfil their engagements, cannot be affected by a bankrupt law, and that it is only those that do not who can. What then is this argument but that the banks have mastered the country, and are too strong for us, and that it is better to submit to their irregularities, than attempt to control them? These banks have become what kings were, in former times—the Lord's anointed, and let no man touch them. Do what you will with the indvidual man—chain—fetter—imprison—hang him—but presume not to meddle with the corporations.

This argument is addressed by the gentlemen on the other side, as they say, with peculiar force, from the present condition of the country, when so large a portion of the corporations are in a state of actual suspension, and would, it is therefore supposed, go forthwith into the hands of commissioners. But this is, I conceive, a great mistake. There is no necessity for the law going into immediate operation as respects the corporations; time may be given them to prepare for it, and this, indeed, would, I think, be the proper course. As to any thing the banks may have done before the passage of the act, I doubt exceedingly our power to declare it an act of bankruptcy, subjecting them to the operation of the law.

The end of the argument is, that there are, in truth, many difficulties in the way of applying a bankrupt law to corporations. It cannot be denied there there are difficulties; they rise up like armed men, on every hand, and oppose our advance; but they oppose no less the passage of a bankrupt law operating upon individuals, than upon corporations. These difficulties have long prevented the passage of any bankrupt law, and terminated in a very short time the only experiment ever made by this Government upon the subject. I believe they will beset every similar experiment. They are, I fear, too many for us. But these difficulties, if they must be imposed upon any, ought to be shared by all. The principles of equity, and that great principle of equality upon which our institutions are all based, imperiously demand it. If a bankrupt system has advantages, let not the few appropriate those advantages to themselves. If it has disadvantages, let not the many impose them on the few. Let us not devise a system, of which it may with truth be said, which has been so often sarcastically remarked of all laws, that it will catch and destroy the weak and humble, while the strong and powerful will break through it.

I have thus, Mr. President, stated my general views of what any bankrupt law adopted by Congress ought in substance to be. But as I said in the outset, upon the main question, whether there shall be any bankrupt law at all, I have great difficulty in deciding. I can feel with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Webster] the deepest sympathy for the distressed debtor. I can hear the clank of his chain—I shudder at the gloom of his dungeon—I catch the deep sighing from a broken heart—the sobs of a despairing wife enter into my soul—the plaintive accents of his famished babes melt me into woman's weakness; and I am moved to sacrifice every thing for his relief. But the appeals of humanity come not from the inside of the dungeon only. The cry is heard also without its walls; not so loud, it is true; but the voice of justice mingles with the cry; it is in behalf of the creditor on the eve of ruin—of his wife—his little ones. I hesitate between conflicting emotions, and am at a loss how to act.

Mr. S. said he had announced, some days before, that it was his intention to offer some amendments to the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to the bill of the majority of that committee. That he had, in the remarks submitted to the Senate some days ago, stated the peculiar situation in which he stood—that of differing with every other member of the committee—not satisfied with the bill of the majority; and, although preferring the amendment offered in behalf of the minority, not fully assenting to that. He had waited to see whether any other member of the Senate was disposed to speak in the present state of the question; and, finding no gentleman inclined to proceed, he now rose for the purpose of offering his amendments. He proposed to amend the first section of the bill, by striking out of the sixth line the words, "that he hath been engaged in trading;" and of the eleventh line, the words, "as a trader liable to become;" and in the thirteenth line, the word "accordingly." It would be seen that the object of this amendment was to prevent the provisions of the voluntary portion of the bankrupt bill being exclusively applicable to traders. He had stated, on a former occasion, very fully, his objections to confining this part of the bill to traders, and would not now trouble the Senate with repeating them.

Mr. WALL objected to the proposed amendment and went into an argument to show that bankruptcy had a technical signification in the English law, which made it applicable to traders only, and was adopted as a technicality into our Constitution.

Mr. STRANGE, in reply, said that he had been aware that the proposed amendment would bring him in collision with the Senator from New Jersey, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary; that this consciousness had been to him a subject of deep regret. But he had felt it his duty to propose the amendment, and it was now his duty to defend its propriety against the attack of his friend from New Jersey. He had listened with much attention to that Senator, but was unconvinced. He had not displayed his usual strength of reasoning. To adopt a simile used in reference to another gentleman and on another occasion, he would say, without meaning to be disrespectful, that the Senator reminded him of a strong man struggling in a morass: all his exertions served but to plunge him deeper and deeper into difficulties, and to render more obvious the unsoundness of the foundation on which he attempted to rest.

He, Mr. S. had said, that in construing the Constitution, words were generally, if not invariably, to be taken in a popular sense. He still thought so. The object of a Constitution was to secure the people at large against the tyranny of those in power. The people at large must, therefore, be able to determine upon its provisions. Can it be supposed that it was intended that a people to whom is committed the defence of their own rights, should be dependent on others to inform them when those rights were invaded? That they should be compelled to resort to some English lawyer to inform them what rights they had before they were ready to raise their arms in defence of those rights? And that their rights must at last be just what that English lawyer should see fit to declare them? The thing was absurd. For his part, he was tired of being tied to the apron strings of Great Britain; of being obliged to look to her for examples as the only safe guides in our legal or political measures. And still more averse was he to the concession, that we could do just what she had done before us, and nothing more. He was for throwing off all badges of our former vassalage to Great Britain, and not for assuming such as indicated that it still continued.

The Senator, in proof that we must, in some parts of our Constitution, resort to the English law for the interpretation of its meaning, had referred him to the prohibition contained in it against suspending the habeas corpus act, or passing any bill of attainder. Suppose these to be exceptions to the rule he [Mr. Strange] had laid down; they were but exceptions. But he denied that they were in fact exceptions. It was true, habeas corpus and attainder were originally technical words, but they had lost their technicality to freemen long before the adoption of our Constitution. They were just as familiar to the citizens of this land as household words. Every citizen was apprised of, and knew substantially what was meant by the inestimable principles of the habeas corpus, and not a State in this Union but had, by adoption or express enactment, a habeas corpus law, long before the adoption of the Constitution. Attainder perhaps was not quite as familiar, and yet was perfectly understood by every man having the slightest pretension to education, although perfectly ignorant of the technicalities of the English law. The Senator insists that the word bankruptcy has no popular signification which will justify its application to any thing but traders. The Senator, in the course of his own speech, has furnished us with proof that it has such a meaning. He himself has spoken of men being in this country, and at this time "irretrievably bankrupt." He surely did not mean that they had been put under a commission of bankruptcy, for there is no law now in this country authorizing the issue of such a commission. What, then, did he mean? Just what ninety-nine men out of a hundred in common parlance would mean by a similar expression; that those men were ruined in their fortunes, and owed more than they could pay. He insists that even our common dictionaries recognise a marked distinction between "bankruptcy" and "insolvency," one of which is confined to traders, and the other not. Now, sir, said Mr. S. I happen to have Johnson before me, and he defines bankruptcy to be "the state of a man broken, or bankrupt," and insolvency to be inability to pay debts. The difference between these two states is, I think, hardly worth squabbling about.

But if I am to be forced into the regions of technicality, I deny, even then, the establishment of any such distinction as the Senator contends for. The very act to which he has himself referred, (34 Henry VIII, chap. 4,) furnishes an instance of a bankrupt law, in which this favorite provision of the Senator is not contained. The operation of that law is not confined to traders, but it includes other classes of persons. If, then, this be a bankrupt law, here is a bankrupt law which does not apply exclusively to traders, and consequently it is not of the essence of a bankrupt law to apply exclusively to traders. The Senator perceiving this, to escape from the difficulty in which it would involve him, denies that the statute of Henry VIII is a bankrupt law at all. Upon this point the Senator takes issue with the British Parliament. They have declared it is a bankrupt law. The Senator declares that it is not. Now which knows best what makes a bankrupt law in England, the Senator or the whole British Parliament, I will submit to his own decision. But as the question is what the English Parliament means by the word bankruptcy, their declaration upon this point, one might suppose, ought to settle the quettion.

The Senator admits that we are not limited to the English bankrupt law, just as it was when our Constitution was adopted, but he says we cannot alter that which is fundamental. Now what is fundamental? The Senator tells us that exclusive application to traders is fundamental in a bankrupt law; and so far as I understand him, nothing else is. How does he prove that to be fundamental? The Senator's whole speech has been a petitio principii. He has gone round and round, beginning with the declaration that exclusive applicability to traders is fundamental in a bankrupt law, and ends with the same declaration; but offers no argument or reason in support of his declaration Where (said Mr. Strange) would we naturally look for that which is fundamental? Surely that which is fundamental must be among the earliest constituents of a subject; and yet when we go back to the first English bankrupt law, that which is now claimed to be fundamental, is not to be found there at all.

In the course of his speech, the Senator himself asks a question which seems to me to settle this controversy. If you can make this law embrace involuntary bankrupts, why may you not dispense with its exclusive application to traders? If the Senator had not asked this question, I would. He has in his own bill provision for a debtor voluntarily seeking the operation of a bankrupt law. Was this ever known in England previous to the adoption of our Constitution? Never. And is not this a greater departure from that which is fundamental in a bankrupt law, than its extension to other persons besides traders? In his judgment a far greater; and the Senator brings himself within the range of the reproof against straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. But I understood the Senator to admit, that, by declaring them traders, we could bring many persons under the influence of the bankrupt law, who, without so declaring them, would not constructively be embraced under the word traders. For his own part he did not much approve this dictionary legislation. It seemed to him to be a much more dangerous power than any spoken of heretofore, that Congress might legislate words into new meanings, and thereby change the whole texture of the Constitution. It was idle to inquire whether constitutionally we must have the word traders in a bankrupt law, if Congress could make the word traders mean just what it pleased. He still insisted that the popular meaning was the true one in construing the Constitution. Take the case of the power to provide and maintain a navy; every one knows that, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, that man who should have spoken of a steam frigate, would have been deemed an idle visionary. Are we to understand, then, that a navy now must contain just the sort of vessels then known in the English navy, or that of other nations of the world, and that a steam frigate is totally inadmissible? A recurrence to the declared objects of the Constitution, in its preamble, might assist somewhat in this matter. What are those objects? To form a more perfect union, establish justice; insure domestic tranquillity; provide for the common defence; promote the general welfare, &c. These were the objects, and the accomplishment of all or some of these objects, we are bound to suppose, actuated the grant of power made to the General Government. In looking to this bankruptcy power, which of these objects may be supposed to have actuated its grant? It was well known that there would be international trading between the several States; that bargains would be made by the citizens of one State with those of another; that these contracts would not always be fulfilled, and that insolvency would sometimes prevent their fulfilment. Some States would probably have a larger proportion of debtors than others, and vice versa. This might give rise to partial legislation upon the subject, adverse to justice, and the preservation of domestic tranquillity. To establish justice, then, in this particular, and to promote domestic tranquillity, to Congress was confided the power of legislating upon this delicate subject, in all its length and breadth; and thus while, with equal hand, it meted out the same law for every State in the Union, a dangerous cause of quarrel would be removed, and harmony preserved.

But the Senator asks if we have no constitutional scruples about a bill omitting the magic word traders,—can we have any difficulty in voting for one with it in? and why, therefore, do we insist in striking it out? He answered that he placed himself upon the same high constitutional ground with the Senator from New Jersey, and as the advocate of State rights, urged his amendment. He thought there was as much danger to the States in constructively altering the Constitution one way as the other. It ought neither to be contracted nor expanded. It meant just what it did mean, and nothing more nor less; and our security depended on keeping it to that precise meaning. Now he could not consent to contribute to a misconstruction of the Constitution in deference to any gentleman, however much he might respect him; and to suffer those words to remain in the bill under a concession that it was doubtful whether we had the constitutional power to pass one without them, was consenting to what he undoubtingly believed to be a false reading of the Constitution.

Besides this, if any voluntary bankrupt law passed, he desired whatever benefits it might afford should be extended to every citizen of this land who needed it, whatever might be his occupation.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

IN SENATE.—JUNE 10, 1840.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the motion to print 20,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia,

Mr. PRESTON suggested that this subject had been postponed till to-day for the express purpose of having certain documents printed and on the desks of Senators. But they had not yet made their appearance, and Mr. P. was desirous that they should be in hand before proceeding in the discussion.

Mr. ROANE said his object, when he acquiesced in the delay, was to give the Senator from South Carolina time to examine the report proposed to be printed, and he had given him all he asked. The documents, he thought, had no connection with the printing of this report.

Mr. PRESTON admitted that the documents in question (from Generals Knox and Harrison) might have little relation to the project of the Secretary of War. But this report had represented them as similar in their character, and Mr. P. desired that the Senate might have the whole matter before them.

Mr. ROANE repeated his reasons for allowing delay, and urged that the vote on printing these 20,000 copies should be taken now, and, when the other documents should come before the Senate, Mr. R. would consent to the printing of 10,000 or 20,000 of them. He wished every thing on the subject to go to the people.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the sole and simple question now before the Senate was the printing of 20,000 copies of the report alone. After all the noise that had been made on Mr. Poinsett's project, Mr. C. thought gentlemen could not claim any indulgence on the plea of ignorance of that project.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said this report almost wholly related to the project of General Knox and three reports of General Harrison in regard to the militia, and compared them with the scheme of Mr. Poinsett; and Mr. C. would submit it to gentlemen whether it was consistent with fairness and candor to urge on the discussion without copies of these documents.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he would not object to give time for the debate, which might still go on after ordering this report to be printed.

After some further remarks by Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, ROANE, and CLAY of Alabama,

Mr. PRESTON expressed his regret at the want of the necessary documents, remarked on the absurdity of sending forth this report at a venture, and then sending the very documents on which it professed to be a commentary, lagging after it, far in the rear. It was like trying a man after hanging. Mr. P. however, proceeded to examine the report, in which the whole reference to the plan of Mr. Poinsett, on which it professed to treat, was four points of resemblance, and three of difference, with the project of General Knox. Mr. P. argued that, in its most offensive particulars, the project of Mr. Poinsett bore no resemblance to those of Generals Knox and Harrison, and had not of late been equalled in any portion of Eastern Europe. He argued also that it was unconstitutional in several respects, and was a real project for the establishment of a standing army, under the command of the President.

Mr. ANDERSON said: That he did not, at this time, design to trespass but briefly upon the attention of the Senate. And, in answer to the suggestions which had just been made from the other side, he took this occasion to say, no disposition was felt by his political friends to prevent the whole subject from being fully and fairly presented to the American people. This is precisely what was wanted. It was important to have the whole truth; and he should, with great pleasure, vote for the printing of every paper connected with this subject, and intended to be embraced in the motions made by the honorable Senators from Virginia and South Carolina. He had no wish, nor had any one, as far as he knew, the slightest desire to obtain any advantage of priority as to the time of sending them forth to the country. He preferred that every thing which would contribute to the information of the people, upon this subject, should go together. He had no doubt that the report of the committee, and the history of all the facts in regard to the action of the Government, as to the organizatton of the militia, from the earliest period, will present the whole matter in an entirely new point of light. The country would pass upon it an impartial judgment. It will be seen, that the propositions contained in the letter of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of the 20th of March, embraces substantially the plan of General Knox, in his report of 1790. The differences are immaterial. They present the same general features, and involve the exercise of similar powers, and the attainment of similar objects. A critical comparison of the details may exhibit occasional deviations; but it will be perceived by every man who investigates for the sole purpose of understanding the respective plans, that the practical results would not only be the same, but the questions of policy and of constitutional law, which are raised, are almost identical. The letter of details referred to, of the present Secretary of War, must be taken in connection with the subsequent communication made by him, in explanation of his views.

This subject must be considered as one occupying its own peculiar place in our history. It has never been treated as involving any political questions of a mere party character. The attention of General Washington was called to it by an anxious solicitute to place the national means of defence in the best possible position; and this has ever been the earnest wish of all his successors. The very objection which existed, from the foundation of our Government, against the exclusive employment, at all times, of a mere regular force, was not the least among the causes which gave to the organization of the militia a high importance. The laws upon this subject seem to be considered, by all, as exceedingly imperfect; and having passed through two perilous conflicts with one of the mightiest nations of the earth, and but recently threatened with a contest with the same power, the unprejudiced mind will perceive how great were the interests which produced the solicitude felt by the Administration, that the militia of the country should be organized and disciplined, as the most potent bulwark of our defence. Under such circumstances, to have neglected the earnest recommendation of the subject to the consideration of Congress would seem to have argued an indifference to the public safety. It will, also, be conceded, that there is a total difference between the recommendation of a mere general plan for the organization and discipline of the militia, and the expression of any wish for the adoption of a particular set of details. The first might be felt as a solemn duty of the President, enforced by the special examples of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson; while the second might be justly left as within the peculiar provice of the military department, and the final and controlling action of Congress. To those who are disposed to take a candid and impartial view of the question, the truth and justice of this suggestion must be fully admitted. That the whole subject well deserves our best reflections, there can be no doubt, whether to attain to attain the result of a better and more efficient organization, or, conforming ourselves to the habits, manners, opinions, and feelings, of our countrymen, to postpone it to the legislation of the respective States. In any view in which it can be presented, the statesman must desire that all the facts connected with it should be fully understood, and that it should receive, in some form, the expression of our opinions. That this has not hitherto been done, is very certain. In regard to every thing which has heretofore been presented to us on this subject, it has never entered into the mind of any one to class it with the party politics of the day; and the magnitude of the interests which are put at stake, would seem to have demanded, from all, that this rule should have remained unaltered. I believe that such will be the opinion of the great body of the American people. The letter of details of the Secretary of War has, however, been the theme of much animadversion; and it was certainly due to the public to be informed of the true history of the case. The report which has been submitted by the chairman of the Militia Committee does this in a lucid and condensed shape, and will, doubtless, be satisfactory to the country.

This discussion is founded upon a motion to print an extra number of copies, designed to distribute information to our constituents. The effect of this debate will be to act upon the public mind; and, therefore, the objections which have been made should be answered by a fair explanation of the facts.

Sir, said he, I do not design to enter into a minute review of every thing which has been said by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, but I was struck by the peculiar force with which every sarcasm he levelled against the Secretary, fell, also, by implication, upon the distinguished men who had first devised a similar plan for the organization and discipline of the militia. The plan which was presented by General Knox having the same atributes of power, it cannot be forgotten, received the sanction of that immortal man whose portrait adorns this chamber; and if, sir, the honorable Senator is free to condemn the present Secretary, he must, also, pass sentence upon those noble patriots. The full force of their authority was felt by him, and he invoked our judgment upon the committee, for having disturbed the repose of the old warrior, who first presided over the military department of the country. He complained that his ghost should be paraded here! If, Mr. President, there was any offence in this, the allusion was extremely unfortunate. The honorable chairman has not been the first to quote the authority of that distinguished man. His acts are part of the history of the country, and the political chief, who is now in the official lead of the party to which the honorable gentleman belongs, was in eighteen hundred and seventeen, at the head of the militia committee in the House of Representatives, and in a report which he then submitted to Congress upon this subject, disturbed the remains, for the first time, of the old warrior, and summoned his ghost before his country. That chairman, sir, was William Henry Harrison! He subjected the report of the first of the Secretaries to a more critical examination than it has now received. Surely, sir, that which General Harrison did, might now be done, without fault, is not without offence, by the honorable Senator from Alabama. The only difference which strikes me, is, that it now forms a part of the history which it illustrates, and has induced the action of the present Secretary; and, in the other case, that it was used for the purpose, in part, of adorning, by contrast, a luminous and classical report, replete with sage reflections, with profound schemes of gymnastic and military education, and the high blandishments of martial glory. The chairman has given to us the report of General Knox, as the very beginning in the great link of military projects. The resurrection, perhaps, would have been pardonable, except for that other ghost of a report, an opinion of record of General Harrison, which was made to take its proper place, and stand out at this unpropitious hour! Is this the "head and front of the offence?" While, then, we attend to the fierce denunciations of the powers proposed to be exercised by the present Secretary, it may not be inappropriate to inquire for what purpose General Harrison set so pernicious an example, as that of first calling into public notice the plan of General Knox. The observer, I think, can detect, among other things, the high sanction which was to be sought, under a project from a great military name, for a scheme of still more boundless power, because of more pervading influence; a scheme which, if carried out, would change the whole moral and political character of the country; recast its population, and train it, not for the peaceful pursuits of civil life, and the quiet enjoyments of liberty, but for conquest and renown. It was not enough that the adult and the youth of eighteen should be disciplined to assist in the defence of the country, but in the language of the gentleman, the seed must be dropped, whose future growth would be empire and military despotism. Sir, it was no common project, and that ambitious man, described by the honorable gentleman, who might conceive the vast project of wielding a mighty military power, if any were to be found, stands confessed in eighteen hundred and seventeen, in the profoundest scheme of mental, moral, social, and political revolution, that has ever been proposed to a Congress of the United States. I refer, sir, to the report of General Harrison, as chairman of the Militia Committee of the House of Representatives. That part of his report (the whole of which may be found among the printed documents of our library) is too remarkable to be disregarded. He says:

"The ancient Republics, from which we have drawn many of the choicest maxims upon which to found our civil institutions, will furnish, also, a most perfect model for our system of national defence. The whole secret of ancient military glory the foundation of that wonderful combination of military skill and exalted valor which enabled the petty Republic of Athens to resist the mighty torrent of Persion invasion, which formed the walls of Sparta, and conducted the Roman legions (influenced, indeed, by unhallowed motives) to the conquest of the world, will be found in the military education of their youth. The victories of Marathon and Platea, of Cynocephele and Pydna, were the practical results of the exercises of the Campus Martius and Gymnasia. It is on a foundation of this kind, and of this kind only, that an energetic national militia can be established."

He wishes to train our militia, and all our youth, as the youth and the militia of Sparta and Athens and Rome were trained. In one work, he proposes to convert us into a military Republic!

In the same report he declares that, "to secure this, the contemplated military instruction should form a branch of education in every school in the United States; that a corps of military instructors should be formed to attend to the gymnastic and elementary part of education in every school in the United States, while the more scientific part of the art of war shall be communicated by professors of tactics, to be established in all the higher seminaries."

General Harrison closes this part of the subject in very peculiar terms, as if conscious that he had proposed a dangerous experiment upon our institutions and our liberties. He says: "The committee are fully aware that the establishment of an institution which, from its nature, is calculated to produce an important change in the manners and the haaits of the nation, will be received with caution and distrust by a people jealous of their liberties, and who boast of a Government which executes its powers with the least possible sacrifice of individual rights." This was but a feeble attempt to propitiate the favor and deprecate the judgment of his countrymen. He was dazzled by the military glory of the ancient world. The Campus Martius and Gymnasium, looming brightly in the distance, fixed the gaze of his admiration. Visions of public games; the honors of an Olympiad; the glories of all the battles of Greece, with her military institutions and her warlike names, seem to have borne down and oppressed his love of our purer and simpler forms.

I rejoice that this report of General Harrison will be again published: it will be a more unwelcome ghost than the ghost of Knox.

In truth, it will be a ghost of no honored omen. It comes upon us breathing the love of glory and a military spirit through the land—the very last spirit that liberty will cherish! A classic hallucination incessantly plays before his imagination, and he does pious reverence again and again to the master states of Greece and Rome. Delighted with that military glory in their history, which debauched, despoiled, and finally subverted their freedom, with the flourish of their schools and the renown of Marathon and Platea, he ushers into the presence of the assembled Representatives of the nation this project for the gymnastic and military education of all the youth of our country, who have not yet escaped from the control of the maternal hand. While their minds are yet ductile, the deep impressions of military glory are to be indelibly made. They are to be ready prepared for the hand of some usurping conqueror. A corps of instructors is to be organized, and to take a part in the conduct of every school in the land. To complete the scheme, another corps is to be organized for all the higher seminaries of learning. Fathers and mothers are to behold their children suddenly converted into mimic soldiers, whose dreams are to be disturbed, even in the nursery, by the enchantments of fame and of conquest. The peaceful domestic rule must cease; the tamer hopes of rural joys and domestic life are to be banished by the magic influence of military gymnasia, and more than a million and a half of children are, at the same time, to undergo this mental, moral, and bodily training for a great military Republic. The author of this deep-laid scheme—of these gymnasia, to be scattered throughout all the land—is the man whom the honorable gentleman from South Carolina proposes to place at the head of this Government! Sir, if the report of the able and patriotic Secretary of War is an error—if in following the example of President Washington and General Knox he has in any wise mistaken the true line of policy, how much greater is the wrong perpetrated by General Harrison? The first is to be but a simple training of the militia, who have already formed political opinions, and of whom but a small part may be called into service, at fixed periods and places, and for a limited number of days. They are to be officered under the authority of the States, and in any conflict for power they would have to choose between the usurper, on the one side, and their wives, their children, and their country, on the other; but under this great gymnasia system of General Harrison, you have a million and a half, whose opinions are to be prepared, almost from the nursery, to be caught by pageantry and led captive by military successes. The danger, to my mind, is much greater in the latter case. You have nothing to oppose it—there is no repellant power within. It is the action of one pulse, one thought, one feeling—the same organized spirit and early taught love of glory. In one word, it is to be a regularly trained public opinion, invincible for good or for evil. Sir, if the honorable gentleman dreads the one, he must also fear the power of the other. If he censures the present Secretary, he must also censure General Harrison. If the propositions of the one are the least unconstitutional, those of the other are more violently so. If he refuses to pass condemnation upon this gigantic scheme of Gen. Harrison, and yet does so of the other, it is no longer a question of principle, but one of mere personalities. Of this let the public judge.

Sir, the honoral Senator was still more unfortunate, if possible, in stating his objections to the suggestion of the Secretary, that the militia should be considered in the service of the United States at particular periods of training. He drew a vivid picture of the danger of bristling bayonets, and the portentous array of the military to be stationed, at some future time, in the rotundo of this Capitol, while the House of Representatives might be deliberating upon the choice of a President of the United States. This danger was to spring from the militia being, at stated intervals, subject to the rules and articles of war! They might be marched to the point of action under false pretences, and, at an unwary moment, be brought to aid the fortunes of any usurper. It was in no measured terms of indignation that the honorable gentleman denounced this feature, which he was pleased to perceive, in the project of the Secretary, without any qualifications, with which it had been certainly, in another part of his letter, proposed to be limited by a separate set of rules, and by fixed places and periods of rendezvous. But, sir, I repeat, it was extremely unfortunate, for the cause in which the honorable gentleman is embarked, that he should have ventured upon the display of the imminent perils of exercising this power. Whatever may be contained in the letter of the Secretary, the mind is materially relieved that, like many other regulations, if it had been necessary, it could be disposed of with ease and promptitude by the simple process of a majority. But, Mr. President, what will the public think when they are told that General Harrison, although seeming to have no scruples himself upon the subject, if we judge by his report, was anxious to put it forever beyond the doubts, and beyond the reach of others, under any ordinary exercise of their rights. He proposed to engraft this very provision upon the Constitution of the United States. So important did he consider it, that he wished to make sure of its possession, and to place it above the impress of a mere majority. His proposition was, that the militia, while engaged in the service of training, "shall be subject to the rules and regulations prescribed for the government of the militia when in the military service of the United States!" Here we have, sir, a solemn proposition, not by mere ordinary law, but by a fundamental regulation, to place the militia in the very attitude—the attitude of obedience, of peril, and of power—so much dreaded and so much denounced by the honorable Senator from S. Carolina. This proposition is made by a man whom he wishes to be President; who will have the power and the patronage to put this question in a more imposing shape if he should ever attain that high honor. If the Secretary is to be questioned for this part of his plan, much more must be the condemnation of General Harrison, as the aspiration to the first office in the world is higher, in its tendency, than a seat in the cabinet—as constitutional law is higher than an ordinary act of legislation. By such an amendment, if it could have been consummated, the whole subject would have been placed beyond the reach of the people, without many and great struggles to retake the power. But, according to the proposition of General Harrison, the power once fixed, would have been marked by the blood of the citizen soldier long before the people could have dragged it to the dust. Sir, let this question be put to the people—let them understand who it is that has made a solemn effort to encraft a provision upon the Constitution, by which the citizen soldier—the militiamen—might be subjected to the punishment of death while engaged in the ordinary service of training, and their condemnation will be loud, and long, and universal. What! put that in your Constitution?—that you will try a militiaman, in time of profound peace, engaged in the mere service of training—try him by a court martial—march him at the point of the bayonet—seat him upon his coffin, and coolly, as an act of discipline, inflict upon him death? Such, sir, is the extent of the power proposed to be made a part of the Constitution of the United States, by General Harrison!

I confess, sir, that the facts presented in the progress of this inquiry have struck me with great surprise. From the fierce pursuit of the honorable Secretary, the public mind was naturally led to the conclusion that he had proposed something never heard of before in the history of Congressional proceedings. But it turns out, upon a scrutiny of the whole subject, that this policy, in all its substantials, had been proposed by General Knox, with the sanction of General Washington; and that General Harrison, in his schemes, has gone farther than any man, under any admininistration. His proposition was, in effect, to change the character of our whole institutions; to change our habits and manners; and this, he concedes, himself, would be the effect of his project, in the very report in which it is made. The history of this subject dicovers a continued resistance of the public mind against all military projects whatever. And even the authority of General Washington failed to produce any material change. Still, it remains a dormant power, to a certain extent; and, so far, considering the posture of affairs which existed in the Northeast, at the opening of this session, it was clearly the duty of the President to bring the subject to the consideration of Congress.

I repeat, that I am content the judgment of the country shall be passed upon all this. Hitherto, as I have stated, the delusion has prevailed that the report of the Secretary is, perhaps, the first and the only thing of the kind. A history of the subject, shows that others have also acted their part; and, upon the whole, there is every reason to believe that neither any admininistration, or any Secretary, ever thought of bringing forward military projects for party purposes. The true light in which to look upon them, is, unquestionably, that the recommendations of our Presidents, and the plans of our Secretaries, upon this subject, have been offered conformably to their official stations, with a view to consideration, comparison, and use, if any thing might be found suited to the circumstances of the country, and adapted to the principles of our Government. To suppose otherwise, is to arraign men whose patriotism is immortal, and treasured in the memory of the people. I refer, sir, among others, particularly to the Father of his country. The conclusion of the argument, therefore, must be, that all men, whose special duty it has been to examine the militia question in a military aspect, have gone almost equal lengths, if not precisely in the same direction. The condemnation of the one necessarily involves that of the other. The view which I take of it, is, to contrast the truth with the absurdity and delusion with which a political crusade, for party purposes, has been recently pushed upon this subject. With the publication of the whole history of the question, from the earliest period of our Governmental action, I have not the slightest doubt that the public mind will, in the progress of inquiry, become fully satisfied

With these remarks I shall leave the subject for the present, reminding, however, the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that if the detailed plan of the Secretary of War is exceptionable, the views and propositions of General Harrison are much more so; and that when he moves (as indicated by him) his resolution, expressive of the sense of the Senate upon the question, I shall be prepared to move an amendment to it, expressive, also, of the sense of the Senate in regard to the principles involved in the military projects of General Harrison, so that he may have the opportunity to extinguish the seed together.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then rose and commenced his remarks in opposition to the motion, by complaining of the want of time, and not having the necessary documents before them to enable them to discuss the subject understandingly, when

Mr. NORVELL moved that the further consideration of the motion be postponed until Friday next; which was agreed to.

And the Senate adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. SMITH, OF VERMONT.

In the House of Representatives, June 4th, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide for the collection, safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Mr. Chairman: Before giving my vote on the measure now under consideration—a measure in which my constituents, in common with the whole country, are deeply interested, I desire to submit briefly some of the reasons which have influenced me to give it my cordial support. But before I do so, the committee will indulge me while I refer to the resolutions of the Legislature of my own State in relation to this subject, and which claim from me a respectful notice. At the last session of the Legislature, resolutions were passed by that body, as I have been informed, (though not officially,) instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives in Congress, from that State, to oppose the adoption of this measure. Sir, I believe, as does my honorable colleague and friend from the Fifth District [Mr. FLETCHER] in whose behalf I am authorized to speak, in the doctrine of instructions, as held by the party with whom we have the honor to act; and were the instructions referred to applicable to us, we should stand in no doubt as to our duty. We should either obey the instructions, or at once resign.

It has long been the policy of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, to elect their Representatives to Congress by districts; and although the Representatives thus elected, may, with propriety, be regarded as the Representatives of the whole State, yet they are more especially so, of that particular portion of the people by whom they are elected.

But, sir, I may be permitted to say, that it would give me great pleasure to yield to the request even of the Legislature of my own State, could I do so without a palpable dereliction of duty—a duty which I not only owe to myself, but to my constituents. The measure now under consideration, and the one condemned by the Legislature of my State, was distinctly brought before my constituents during the canvass of 1838, and the convention of delegates of the Democratic party, who nominated me as their candidate, were the firm and decided friends of an Independent Treasury, and opposed to a National Bank.

[Mr. EVERETT rose and inquired of his colleague, if the excitement in his district, growing out of the troubles in Canada, did not operate to give him his election?

Mr. SMITH, in reply, said he was happy to give his colleague such information as he possessed, and especially as it would afford him an opportunity to correct impressions made on the public mind in relation to the subject.

It is well known, said Mr. S. that for some time prior to the election in his district, an excitement, to some extent, did prevail on the whole Northern frontier, growing out of the state of things in Canada; and he regretted that he could not be permitted to seize upon this occasion to correct another erroneous impression, and one touching the conduct of the community among whom he resides. For, although there was much feeling and interest manifested in behalf of those who were making a feeble effort in Canada for an independent and free Government, and in behalf of those who had been driven from their homes and families, and compelled to seek protection in this land of freedom; yet the community were not justly subject to the charge of violating their obligations to their own, or any other Government. It is true, said Mr. S. that the law of Congress, passed in 1838, commonly called the neutrality law, and the vote given by his predecessor in its favor, were to an extent unpopular with all parties, and that he was among the number who disapproved of the measure, and if not mistaken, his colleague not only disapproved of the law, but voted against it. That about the time his predecessor was nominated, for re-election by the Whig party, a portion of the same party in the same county where his predecessor resided, held a meeting, and put in nomination another gentleman of the same party, whose views in relation to Canadian affairs and the neutrality law differed from those of his predecessor. Mr. S. further remarked that it was out of his power to say how many of the Opposition party (if any) voted for him on account of the difference of opinion between himself and his predecessor in relation to the neutrality law. He had no doubt, however, but that he did receive some votes from that party; but whether on that account, or from considerations of personal friendship, it did not become him to say—he would leave his colleague to form his opinion from the facts to which he had alluded.]

Mr. SMITH resumed. If, Mr. Chairman, it is right and just that the political parties in the State should be represented here according to their relative strength, then there can be no good reason why my colleague from the fifth district and myself should be even requested by the Legislature to vote against this measure.

At the last election in the State, there were polled a little short of fifty thousand votes, and the candidate of the Whig party for Governor received a majority of about twenty-two hundred. In the House of Representatives the Whigs had five or six majority, and the same number in the Senate, giving them, in joint ballot of about two hundred and sixty votes, a majority of about twelve. The Opposition have now five Representatives in Congress, including the two Senators, and the Administration party have but two.

Mr. Chairman, having said thus much in relation to the resolutions of my State, and my duty to myself and my constituents, I shall now proceed to submit a few remarks in reference to the bill now before the committee.

The subject is one which, although it has long agitated the whole country, does not yet seem to be fully understood. From the moment it was proposed by the President in 1837 to the present time, it has been denounced and misrepresented to an extent that has no parallel. But, sir, in the same degree that it has received the sober consideration of the people, it has won their confidence and support.

The principles involved in this bill are not only fundamental, but essential to the permanency of our free institutions; and, if rightly understood by its friends, are destined to exert a lasting and salutary influence, not only upon the CURRENCY and BUSINESS of the country, but upon our POLITICAL and SOCIAL CONDITION. The contest now waging, had been, with great propriety, styled "the second war of Revolution," and in which are involved the same great and fundamental principles that characterized the first. That, sir, was a struggle for power, and for the aggrandizement of the rich and privileged orders on the one hand, and for self-government and equal rights and privileges on the other. The enemies of civil liberty and equal rights, were not made friends to free institutions when the charter of our rights was adopted and published to the world. There were, no doubt, many actually engaged in the fearful struggle, and sincerely desirous of casting off foreign rule and domination, who nevertheless retained a fixed attachment to the splendor and aristocracy of the English Government; and who believed that power, rank, property, and influence, were never designed for any but "the well born"—that the great mass of mankind "were made to live in servitude, to walk prone and cowering, to till the earth and bear its fruits an offering to a fellow worm." Sir, there are still multitudes in this land, so highly favored, who practically deny the great and fundamental truth that all men are created equal, and who, for sordid wealth and self aggrandisement, would barter away our Government of equal laws and equal privileges, and bind their fellow men fast in the chains of a hopeless and degrading servitude. Since the days of our Republican fathers, there has grown up in this land of freemen, a moneyed aristocracy of giant power, and alien to the great interests of the laboring class of our fellow citizens, making every thing of the nobility of wealth, and little or nothing of intellectual or moral worth; aiming to control the currency, capital, and trade of the country, and boldly aspiring, by corrupt appliances, to legislative and governmental control. Sir, this power is every where awake to the great contest now waging—it is in ambush and on the battle field, marshalled under skilful and veteran leaders, and aiming to seize the reins of Government, and control the future destinies of this great Republic.

The great antagonist measure to that of an Independent Treasury, and the one which the Opposition are aiming to establish, is a National Bank, an institution which has done so much for its friends, and which was the darling measure of Mr. Hamilton and his coadjutors, who struggled long and hard for a Government modelled to a great extent after that of the English.

If, sir, the people are worsted in this contest, this second war of revolution—another National Bank will be chartered, and made the "high tower" of the aristocracy, from which mandates to control the vast associated and individual wealth of the nation are to emanate.

It is not my purpose to discuss the question, whether Congress has the constitutional power to charter such a bank; it is sufficient for me to be assured that such an institution is inexpedient in a Government like ours, and dangerous to the liberties of the people. That a similar institution exists in England, and may be, as it probably is, adapted to the genius of that Government, is no reason why such a one should be established in this country any more than that Church and State should be united. The Bank of England is virtually a part of the machinery of the Government, and like every other part, lends its whole influence to sustain the prerogation of the Crown, a titled nobility, and a moneyed aristocracy. In England, as in all the nations of Europe, the moneyed power and the Government are in firm alliance to OPPRESS THE PEOPLE, and thereby to sustain and perpetuate the power of the one, and the wealth of the other. But for that alliance, the oppressed millions would no longer live in abject and degraded servitude, but according to the laws of their own being, and fully enjoy the birth-right of their creation.

The Government under which we live does not rest upon the ARISTOCRACY OF WEALTH, AND THE STRONG ARM OF POWER, but is sustained by the virtue, intelligence, and patriotism of the great mass of the people, whose will, indicated and expressed through the ballot box, moulds the policy of those who are called, as their servants, to administer it.

In our Government of equal rights and privileges, based as it is on the will of the people, those who administer its affairs should never be in alliance with, or under the influence of, any irresponsible power, but should look for support to the people, the true source of all political power; and on the other hand, if we would preserve in its purity, the elective franchise, the people should be left free to judge of men and measures, uninfluenced by Executive power, or sordid appliances.

A National Bank, to answer the object of its friends, should have a capital of from fifty to one hundred millions of dollars; nothing short of that sum would make it what its friends desire it should be—a great regulator. Such a bank would, beyond all doubt, effectually control the nine hundred local banks in the country, having, in all, an active capital of about four hundred millions of dollars. Sir, let such a bank, with a money king at its head, be made the fiscal agent of the Government, and give it the entire revenue of the country, amounting to thirty or forty millions annually, as so much capital, it would be invested with a power to control, not only the currency and business of the whole country, but the Government itself.

But, sir, the evil does not stop here. Let the stock of such a bank pass, as most of it would, either directly or indirectly, into the hands of English capitalists, and become allied to the great central moneyed power in London, and England, through this medium, and the debt of two hundred millions due to her capitalists from the States, corporations, and merchants of this country, would as effectually control the business and destinies of this nation, as she would were we, in fact, recolonized.

Who, sir, can look upon this country, thus humbled and degraded, without the most painful and stirring emotions. Of what avail was the vast amount of toil and suffering, of blood and treasure, which was the price of our liberties, if this glorious inheritance, bequeathed to us by our fathers, is now to be bartered away?

Against the charter of the first National Bank, in 1791, Mr. Jefferson was opposed, not only on the ground that Congress had not the constitutional power to charter such an institution, but because it would be injurious to the people, and dangerous to their liberties.

In a letter written by him to General Washington, in 1793, two years after the charter of the first Bank by Congress, speaking of the effect and influence of that Bank and the banking system, he said:

"That it furnished effectual means of corrupting such a portion of the Legislature, as turns the balance which ever way it is directed; that this squadron, deciding the voice of the Legislature, have manifested their disposition to get rid of the limitations imposed on the General Legislature—limitations, on the faith of which the States acceded to that instrument—[the Constitution,] and the ultimate object of all this is to prepare the way for a change from the present form of Government to that of a monarchy, of which the English Constitution is to be the model."

"Again, Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to Albert Gallatin, in 1803, speaking of Col. Hamilton's 'MACHINE,' says:

"From a passage in the letter of the president [of the Bank] I observe an idea of establishing a branch bank of the United States in New Orleans. This institution is one of the most deadly hostility existing against the principles and form of our Constitution. The nation is, at this time, so strong and united in its sentiments, that it cannot be shaken at this moment. But suppose a series of untoward events should occur, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a Republican Government to meet a crisis of great danger, or to unhinge the confidence of the people in the public functionaries; an institution like this, penetrating, by its branches, every part of the Union, acting by command and phalanx, may, in a critical moment, upset the Government. I deem no Government safe which is under the vassalage of any self constituted authorities, or any other authority than that of the nation, or its regular functionaries. What an obstruction could not this Bank of the United States, with all its branch banks, be in time of war? It might dictate to us the peace we should accept, or withdraw its aid. Ought we, then, to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? That it is so hostile, we know: 1. From a knowledge of the principles of the persons composing the body of directors in every bank, principal or branch, and those of most of the stockholders: 2. From their opposition to the measures and principles of the Government, and to the election of those friendly to them: and 3. From the sentiments of the newspapers they support. Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest duty we owe to the safety of our Constitution, to bring this powerful enemy to a perfect subordination under its authorities."

Against such an institution, sir, I am, and have long been opposed; and I cannot believe that the enlightened and patriotic people whom I have the honor to represent, can understandingly be in favor of an institution so anti-Republican and dangerous to our liberties; for, sir, if there be a people on earth distinguished for their Republican simplicity and devotion to the great cause of civil liberty—for their opposition to all monopolies and special privileges—to all distinctions founded on wealth, and that seek most of all the common good, it is the people of the Mountain State.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] admits that a National Bank would be powerful for good or for evil. Sir, whatever of good such an institution may be able to accomplish, cannot outweigh, in my mind, the consideration that it has power to spread distress and desolation through the land; but, what is more than all, to bring the Government, whether in peace or war, into a degraded subjection to its power. It seems to be well settled that the State banks cannot be used with safety to the Government, or to the business of the country, as the fiscal agents to receive and disburse the public revenue. The project has been fairly tried, and proved so disastrous to the financial operations of the Government, and so ruinous to the business of the country, that no resort will be again had to them for such a purpose. Sir, it is a National Bank or an Independent Treasury. These are the great measures on which public sentiment is now dividing, and to doubt as to the result would be to doubt the capacity of the people for self-government.

It is not my intention to enter into a particular examination of the details of this bill; that has been done by gentlemen on both sides, who have preceded me, and the several provisions are well understood. No amendments are offered to make the bill more perfect, and the Opposition, by moving to strike out the enacting clause, virtually admit that the bill contains all the necessary provisions to make it effectual for the collection, safekeeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue. It is against the principles of the bill that the opposition is made, and not against its details.

The great object of the measure is to put the Treasury of the nation on a footing independent of either the business of the banks, or of individuals who are not responsible to the people; to leave the business of the country to flow uninterrupted, according to the laws of trade, and uninfluenced by the pecuniary affairs of the Government, and, on the other hand, to leave the Government uninfluenced, as far as may be, from the derangements and fluctuations which are of such frequent occurrence in the trade and business of this and of all other nations.

This measure is in strict accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, and the law of Congress of 1789, making provision for the appointment of a Treasurer, and defining his duties. Had no National Bank ever been chartered, the revenue of the country would always have been collected and disbursed in a manner corresponding to the mode provided by this bill.

The project of an Independent Treasury is no new thing. It was suggested by Mr. Jefferson as early as 1803: in a letter to Mr. Gallatin, he says:

"But in order to be able to meet a general combination of the banks against us in a critical emergency, could we not make a beginning towards an independent use of our own money, in all the deposites where it is received, and letting the Treasurer give his drafts or note for payment at any particular place, which would give us the same facilities which we derive from banks."

A project similar to the one now before the committee, and the one suggested by Mr. Jefferson, was proposed a few years since, when what was called the pet bank system was in operation, by General Gordon, a member of Congress from Virginia, and received the support of the same party, that now denounces the measure as fraught with so much disaster and ruin to the country. In my own State, Mr. Chairman, there has been an Independent Treasury from the organization of the Government. The revenue for the support of the Government in that State, is raised by a direct tax on the people, and the money, when collected by the officers appointed for that purpose by the several towns in the States, is paid to the Treasurer, and by him disbursed. The system there in operation, is substantially like the one proposed by this bill, except, that for the convenience of the Treasury Department, and of those to whom disbursements are to be made, four receivers-general are to be appointed in different sections of the Union. Necessary provisions are also made for drawing drafts on the depositaries in favor of those to whom the Government is indebted, and for the purpose of transferring the funds from one place to another. There is also a provision in the bill making it an offence punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, for any person employed in the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the revenue, to use, for any purpose, the money belonging to the Government. This is a most salutary provision, and well calculated to prevent frauds and peculations. It is difficult to perceive how any greater degree of security could be given by way of legislative enactment, than is provided in this bill. That frauds on individuals, and on Governments, have been committed in all ages and in all countries, is what all know to be true: and that they will continue to be committed, is what no one doubts. All that can be done by way of legislation to prevent crime, is to provide certain and adequate punishment for offences when committed.

Mr. Chairman, there is another provision of this bill, to which strong objection is made by the Opposition. It is what is usually called the "specie clause." Sir, it will be seen that this is but a necessary provision to disconnect the Government from the banks. For if the revenue is to be collected in bank bills, the banks may as well have the custody of them, as to have them in the vaults of the Treasurer. They are but the promises of the banks, and the Treasurer may as well have a certificate of deposite as to have the bills. One is as good as the other.

The 19th section of the bill provides that from and after the 30th of June, 1840, one fourth part of all the dues, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money accruing or becoming due to the United States, shall be collected in the legal currency of the country, and an additional fourth part annually, until the whole of the revenue shall, on the 30th day of June, 1843, be collected in gold and silver. Heretofore, and until the banks suspended payment in 1837, the revenue was collected agreeably to the provision of a resolution of Congress, of April 13, 1816, by which the Treasury Department was authorized to receive the dues to the United States in bills of specie paying banks. By this resolution Congress authorized to be received such a currency in payment of the revenue, as could not legally discharge a dollar of the liabilities of the Government. None but the banks were, in the least degree, benefited by that provision. The people have, however, sustained a loss in the collection of the revenue of six millions, five hundred and eighty thousand dollars, which, with the interest on the same from the time it was received into the Treasury, to the present, would amount to more than thirteen millions. If the people have sustained such a loss in the collection of the revenue by the receipts of paper money, what must they have lost in the transaction of their own business?

If, sir, Congress had the constitutional power to authorize the receipt of bank paper in payment of the dues to the Government, it was manifestly unjust to the people, who sustained the loss which that measure occasioned. If this bill shall pass and become the law of the land, as I trust it will, the people will be saved from a repetition of such losses hereafter, and the Government be enabled to discharge its own liabilities, whatever may be the condition of the banks.

This, Mr. Chairman, is substantially the measure which has called forth such violent opposition, and produced so much excitement through the country. And from whence does all this fierce and tireless opposition come? Sir, there is but one answer to this inquiry. It comes from that party who are in favor of a National Bank, and for a strong and splendid Government. It comes from the presidents, cashiers, directors, and stockholders of the nine hundred banks, and their dependents, who, as a class of the community, are no doubt intelligent and respectable; yet feel like other men the impulse and promptings of self-interest. In short it comes from that class of the community who are not, to any considerable extent, the producers; but who live and amass their fortunes from profits on the labor of others.

But, sir, although the object of this great measure is, as I before remarked, to divorce the bank and State, and to put the Government in a condition wholly independent of the banks; yet it is believed that it will, in many respects, produce indirectly and incidentally a salutary influence upon the whole interest of the country. It will impart a healthy action to the currency by infusing into the circulation a large specier basis. This is admitted on all hands to be necessary, inasmuch as the specie now in circulation bears no just proportion to that of bank paper. In France no bank notes are issued of a less denomination than about ninety dollars, and in England none less than about twenty-five dollars; while in this country, most, if not all the banks, issue bills of the denomination of one dollar. The consequence is, that there is but little gold and silver in circulation in this country.

On this subject we have the opinions expressed, at different times, of some of the most able and distinguished gentlemen in the Opposition. In 1824, when the country was suffering to a degree almost without a parallel, Mr. Webster, in speaking of relief to be gained by the isssue of paper money, said:

"The committee will not fail to observe that there is, this moment, much the loudest complaint of distress precisely where there has been the greatest attempt to relieve it by systems of paper credit, and on the other hand, content, prosperity, and happiness are most observable in those parts of the country where there has been the least endeavor to administer relief by law—in truth nothing is so baneful, so utterly ruinous to all true industry, as interfering with the legal value of money, or attempting to raise artificial standards to supply its place. Such remedies suit well the spirit of extravagant speculation, but they sap the very foundation of all honest acquisition."

Again, in a speech delivered in Congress in 1832, he said:

"Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none have been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community, compared with fraudulent currencies, and the robberies committed by depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and intolerable oppression, on the virtuous and well disposed, of a degraded paper currency, authorized by law, or in any way countenanced by Government."

In 1834, the Hon. John Davis, the other Senator from Massachusetts, and then Governor of that State, stated in his message to the Legislature—

"That experience has long since proved that a metallic currency is least liable to fluctuations, and it is hoped that the earliest opportunity will be seized to return to it, so far at least as to rectify the present credit system of paper currency, and prevent its fluctuations."

He says again:

"The disastrous fluctuations which we experience, are to some extent to be imputed to the fluctuations of the currency. The most obvious remedy against the recurrence of this calamity, and the most certain method of saving the active industry of the country from the devouring vortex of this almost periodical disaster, is to increase the quantity of specie in circulation."

"Fluctuations visit all who have property, and all who work to acquire it, with injury, and compel them to submit to severe sacrifices. What is called a scarcity of money, only means that the banks do not discount. Under pressures thus occasioned, we have seen good estates dwindle until their possessors were left bankrupt; we have seen laborers thrown out of employ, or their wages greatly reduced, and business either suspended or dragging those engaged in it towards ruin; we have seen, also, great anxiety and dismay pervade the whole public."

Again he says:

"It is in vain to look for prosperity without a circulating medium which commands the public confidence; if the currency is fluctuating, business will participate in its character, and the fluctuations bring disaster upon the seller or the buyer. Commerce must necessarily languish, property sink in value, and the general prosperity be greatly abated; it is therefore the dictate of sound policy to maintain a currency which will remain firm."

Here, Mr. Chairman, you have the views of the two able and distinguished Senators from Massachusetts on this great question of the currency. One, as early as 1824, and again in 1832; and the other as late as 1834. And, sir, it should be remembered by the whole country, that the gentleman who promulgated the sentiments just referred to, as Governor of Massachusetts, in 1834, is the same gentleman who has lately sent out a speech through the whole country, purporting to be an answer to the speech of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, in favor of the Independent Treasury bill, in which he repudiates the sentiments which he, as Governor, promulgated in 1834. At that time, it was indispensably necessary, in his opinion, that the specie basis of our circulating medium should be increased. Now, the slight tendency of this measure to produce such a result is, in his view, but little less than treason to the business of the country, and especially to the laborer. Sir, what is the extent of the influence that this measure will have to increase the specie basis of our circulation? It is estimated, that of the eighty-five millions of specie in the country, only five millions will be required for the fiscal use of the Government, at the period when the whole revenue, under the operation of this bill, shall be collected in the legal currency of the country. This would not give us as great a proportion of specie in our circulating medium as there is in England, that greatest of commercial nations, the Government and policy of which so command the admiration of gentlemen opposed to this bill. It is, sir, sincerely hoped and believed by the friends of this measure, that it will have a tendency in some good degree to check and restrain the banks in their loans and discounts, and thereby prevent the excessive and ruinous expansions and contractions of the currency, which are so injurious and so fatal to the enterprise and business of the community.

Sir, we want, most of all, a stable, sound, and uniform currency. It is that which will give stability to the prices of property and labor, it will restrain the spirit of wild and extravagant speculation—quench the feverish thirst for getting rich, as by magic art, without submitting to toil and honest industry, and turn again the energies of an ever active, enterprising, and intelligent community, towards those callings and employments, so favorable to moral and intellectual culture, and, in the pursuit of which our fathers accumulated, slowly but surely, their fortunes, and trained their children to habits of industry, sobriety, and economy.

Who, Mr. Chairman, has calmly and soberly looked out upon the wreck of fortune and of character which has marked the history of the last ten years, but has sickened at the thought that the restless wave of presumptuous speculation and wild extravagance must still dash onward in its desolating course?

I cannot forbear alluding to the very singular position taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who opened the debate on this bill. If I understood him right, he professed to be in favor of a protective tariff, and expressed his determination to give his vote for such a measure when the existing revenue laws should be revised by Congress.

And yet he makes a distinct objection to this bill, on the ground that it is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it indirectly and incidentally operates as a protection to the manufacturing interests of the country. To sustain this position, the gentleman cited as an authority in point the South Carolina ordinance, and the opinions of distinguished gentlemen of that State. All this must have been said in the vain hope of driving from the support of this measure some of its Southern friends.

If it be true, as contended by the gentleman, and by others friendly to the measure, that its influence will be favorable to those great branches of industry—agriculture and manufacture—in which my constituents are so deeply interested, it will be an additional reason why I shall give it my support. Our foreign commerce, until lately, was mainly founded on an exchange of commodities, including the precious metals, and leaving in its transactions but little of foreign debt against us; but under the operation of the late extended and extravagant system of credit, produced and sustained by over banking, importations have greatly increased beyond our exports, involving us in an enormous foreign debt, which produces periodical disaster, by the drain of specie from the country, and ruin to our manufacturing interests.

In 1830, our exports and imports were about equal.

From 1831 to 1839, inclusive, the average annual amount of importations exceeded one hundred and thirty-six millions; and during this period, the annual balance of trade against us was about twenty-six millions. It appears that the whole balance of trade against this country, for the last twenty years, amounts to two hundred and eighty-seven millions; and that by far the greater portion of it has accrued since 1831. Deduct from this sum the fair profit and difference in valuation, and there still remains a foreign debt against us, either State, corporate, or mercantile, of at least two hundred millions of dollars, on which we are annually paying interest, in gold and silver.

Up to 1834, and shortly after the banks had greatly expanded their circulation, the annual amount of importations seldom exceeded the sum of one hundred millions.

In 1834, importations increased to about $126,000,000, leaving a balance of trade against us of $22,000,000.

In 1835, importations amounted to $140,000,000, leaving a balance of trade against us of $28,000,000. In 1836, importations amounted to $189,000,000, leaving a balance of trade against us of $61,000 000. In 1837, importations amounted to $146,000,000, leaving a balance of trade against us of $23 000,000. In 1838, importations amounted to $113,000,000, leaving a balance of trade against us of only $5,000,000.

In 1830, the circulation of the banks was $61,323,898; in 1834, $94,839 570; in 1835, $103,692,495; in 1836, $140,301,038; in 1837, $149,185,890; in 1838, $116,138,910.

In 1838, importations fell short of those of the preceding year $33,000,000, and the bank circulation in 1838 fell short of that of 1837, $33,046 980.

In 1839, after the banks had resumed specie payments, and had again expanded their circulation, importations rose from $113,000,000, the amount in 1838, to $157,000,000, and leaving a balance of trade against us of $39,000,000.

In the fall of 1839, the great regulator, with most of the banks in the country, suspended payment, and the whole of them commenced a rapid process of contraction—the result has been, a great diminution of importations in the first two quarters of the present year. From this we see the connection between an expanded and bloated currency, and excessive and ruinous importations; and, sir, should our foreign debt, now so enormous, continue to increase for the ten years to come as it has for the last ten years, it would require most of our exports to pay the annual interest.

Under the operation of the present tariff, the deranged condition of the currency, occasioned by over banking and a bloated credit system, our manufacturing interest at the North must languish, if not go down: it cannot be sustained against such adverse influences at home, in addition to the ruinous competition of the foreign manufacturer, who pays so much less for labor than is paid in this country. The difference in the price of labor in England and in this country is not mainly occasioned by the difference of the currency in the two countries; it is so nearly alike in both, that the effect on the price of property and labor is hardly to be perceived. Sir, the low price of labor in England is the legitimate consequence of the very frame work of the Government as it bears on the political and social condition of the people, by exalting one class, and degrading and oppressing the other. According to Marshall's statistics of the British empire lately published, it appears that twenty-four millions and thirty-one thousand souls, out of the whole population, are doomed to a condition of unremitting labor for a bare subsistence, to sustain in pride and luxury, two hundred and seventy-five thousand, belonging to the rich and privileged orders. This has always been the condition of the laboring class in England, with all the blessings of a National Bank and a paper currency; and it will remain such, until the very foundations of that Government shall be broken up, and equal rights and privileges be secured to all. In this widely extended and fertile country, and so long as we shall enjoy the blessings of a free Government, the condition of the laboring class here, can never, no, never, be reduced to the condition of the great mass of laborers in England or in Europe. Nothing will ever be wanting in this country but virtue, intelligence, industry, and economy, to secure to all the blessings of competency and wealth.

Sir, if the influence of this measure in restoring to the country a sound and uniform currency, and by requiring as it does, that the duties on imports be paid in gold and silver, shall not check and restrain excessive and ruinous importations, and thereby yield an adequate protection to our manufactures against foreign competition, it must be obtained, if at all, in the revision and adjustment of the tariff, which will, no doubt, engage the early attention of Congress.

Before resuming my seat, I will briefly notice some of the objections which have been urged against the practical operations of this system of collecting, keeping, transferring, and disbursing the public revenue.

It is said that it will greatly diminish the amount of currency; that gold and silver, equal to the amount of the revenue, will be drawn from the banks and from the channels of business, and locked up in the vaults of the Treasury. This objection is without foundation, for the whole amount which will be required for the fiscal operations of the Government, out of the eighty-five millions of specie in the country, will not exceed five millions. This sum will, no doubt, be drawn from the banks, but it will not be locked up in vaults and safes, but thrown out and kept in circulation. The evil suggested and apprehended can only be realized when there shall be a surplus revenue in the Treasury. But who, I ask, can seriously apprehend that we are ever to suffer any inconvenience from an overflowing Treasury? Nothing can be more certain than that, under the existing state of things, our revenue from imports, as well as from the public lands, will constantly diminish. The time will probably never again come when the annual receipts into the Treasury on account of the sale of our public lands, will be as great as they have been for the last ten years. Beyond all this, we have reason to apprehend that the day is not far distant when the public domain may cease to a great extent, if not wholly, to replenish the Treasury. That section of the country in which the public lands are situate, will soon send to this hall such a representative influence as will enable them to control the whole of that great source of revenue. But, Mr. Chairman, who can look abroad upon our widely extended territory and our increasing population—upon our extended and extending commercial relations—upon our almost defenceless seaboard and extended frontier—and not feel assured that all the revenue that can be realized from our present resources will be needed, and that the country has more reason to fear a resort to direct taxation for the support of the Government, than that we shall have a surplus revenue. But should there at any time be a surplus in the Treasury, it will always be at the disposal of Congress.

Another objection urged against this measure by the Opposition is, that it will increase Executive patronage and influence. Sir, if there was the least foundation for such an objection, this bill could not receive my vote, however desirable the measure might otherwise be. But the very reverse of this is the fact, as can be demonstrated to every honest and unprejudiced mind.

By the provisions of the bill, four receivers general are to be appointed by the Senate upon the nomination of the President, whose compensation is fixed by law, who are under adequate bonds for the faithful discharge of their duty, and subject to severe penalties for every delinquency. No person employed in collecting, safekeeping, and disbursing the public revenue, can use in any way, or for any purpose whatever, a single dollar of money belonging to the Government, on pain of imprisonment in the penitentiary. Money thus in the hands of the public agents, deprived, as they are, of any use of it, cannot confer upon them the power to exert any influence, either in behalf of themselves or of any other person. This mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue, so far from increasing Executive patronage, actually lessens it to a great extent, as must be evident to every person when contrasted with the system heretofore in practice, of depositing it with the banks, and making them the fiscal agents of the Government. By that system the revenue, amounting to thirty or forty millions annually, was at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, who had the power to select for that purpose such of the nine hundred local banks as he saw fit. The whole amount of the revenue was, to the selected banks, so much additional capital, which they were authorized by their charters to loan, and annually pocket a profit on the people's money, but little, if any, short of a hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Through the Secretary, the Executive could, if he saw fit, operate on the deposite banks, and, through them, reach to a great extent those dependent on them for accommodations. Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING,] was compelled in candor to admit that by the provisions of this bill, the Executive did not have as much patronage and influence as he had under the deposite system; and I think no intelligent and candid person can fail of coming to the same conclusion.

Much has been said by the Opposition (and no doubt for effect on the popular mind) about a union of the purse and sword in the hands of the Executive. Who, sir, is so ignorant that he needs to be informed that the President has not the keeping or the control of a single dollar of the people's money. He cannot get his own salary without an appropriation by Congress. He has no power to declare war, nor can he enlist a single soldier, without being authorized by Congress for that purpose.

It is urged as a further objection to the Independent Treasury system, that it will greatly increase the expenditures of the Government. Sir, there is nothing of this objection—the whole amount of compensation provided for officers and clerks to be employed in this branch of the public service, is comparatively very trifling, and will not probably exceed the interest on the amount which the Government has lost by the banks.

We are told by the gentlemen in the Opposition, and it is but a repetition of an objection which has long dwelt on the lips of partisans, that this bill provided a superior currency for the Government, and an inferior currency for the people. This bill provides no new currency, either for the Government or for the people; neither does it provide any currency, superior or inferior, for the people in their individual capacity—Congress has no power to do so. It simply provides that the revenue shall hereafter be collected in progressive proportions as provided in the 19th section of the bill, in the old and constitutional currency, gold and silver, and which is the only currency that will enable the Government, or individuals, to discharge their liabilities.

With what propriety do gentlemen talk about a superior currency for the Government, and an inferior currency for the people? What, sir, is the Government but the action of the people through their duly constituted and authorized agents? If this bill passes, who wills it should be so, but the people?

Sir, the "specie clause" in the bill, as it is called, amounts to nothing more than a repeal of the resolution of 1816, by which the Treasury Department was authorized to receive in payment of the revenue, and dues to the United States, the bills of specie paying banks, and thereby placing the Government on the same footing with the people, who are at liberty to exact and demand, on all their dues, the legal currency of the United States. If individuals voluntarily receive in payment of money due to them, and for property sold, that which is an inferior currency, and which the law does not, and cannot, compel them to take, and on which they are subject to suffer loss, can they, with propriety, complain that others, or the Government even, demands the legal currency in payment of its dues? The General Government is one of limited powers, so restricted as not at all to infringe on the sovereignty of the States. Over the Legislatures of the States which form the Confederacy, and the banks by them chartered, the General Government has no control whatever. If the States, in the exercise of their sovereignty, charter banks, and make a currency with which they are satisfied, it is not for Congress to interfere; but if they are not satisfied with the currency of their own creation, the remedy is in their own hands, and they must apply it.

Sir, is it not strange, that while the friends and advocates of the banks admit that bank paper is an inferior currency, they still insist that the Government ought to receive it in lieu of the superior, the legal currency of the country?

Let the banks throughout the country make their paper good, DOLLAR FOR DOLLAR, and for just what the borrower pays for it, and we shall hear no more about a superior and an inferior currency—nothing more about "one currency for the Government and another for the people."

It is true, sir, as some gentlemen of the Opposition have admitted, that neither the President or the friends of the Administration have any hostility to well regulated and safe specie paying banks. They are not, as charged by the Opposition, in favor of an exclusive metallic currency. Their object is to reform, not to destroy the banks.

It is said by Opposition gentlemen here and elsewhere, that great distress and embarrassment prevail throughout the departments of business and industry in the country, and that the whole of it is chargeable to the Independent Treasury system, which they say has been practically in operation from 1837 to the present time, and but for its ruinous influences, the people would have been prosperous and happy. That the country is now suffering to a considerable extent, no one is disposed to doubt; but whether from the measures of the Administration, or from the conduct and mismanagement of the banks, is another question. If the President of the United States, elected by the votes of the great mass of the laboring community, and against the will and efforts of the banks and the moneyed aristocracy of the country, has, through ignorance or design, brought ruin upon that class of our fellow-citizens, or, in fact, of any other class, he is no longer deserving of the confidence and support of his friends. But if all the ruin and distress which the country has suffered since his election, is justly chargeable to the banks; and if to turn off the indignation of an injured people from their own conduct, they have combined to charge it all to the Government, then surely it is due from the people that they should sustain the Administration of their choice against such a foul conspiracy.

Mr. Chairman, a brief reference to a few facts cannot fail to satisfy every honest and candid mind on the subject.

Immediately after the recharter of the Bank of England, the unprecedented expansion of the currency, which took place within a few years, greatly involved that whole country in debt, and the flood of paper money which was issued by the Bank, drove from circulation, and to a considerable extent from the country, an unusual amount of gold.

In 1837, the Bank of England, in order to recall the specie which had been driven from the country, suddenly contracted its circulation, and the result was, that the price of produce and labor was reduced from twenty to fifty per cent. and thousands were involved in ruin, and other multitudes were reduced to beggary and starvation. By this operation, so ruinous to the fortunes of thousands, and so calamitous to the laboring class, the Bank regained the specie which had passed out of the country. Again, in 1838–'9, the Bank expanded its circulation to such an extent, that it was obliged, before the close of the year 1839, to borrow millions of specie of the Bank of France, and to contract again its circulation. The consequence of this operation was still more ruinous than the one of 1837, prices of labor and property fell from thirty to fifty per cent. multitudes were plunged, as in a moment, from affluence and a prosperous business, to the lowest depths of poverty and wretchedness; beggary and starvation again visited the abodes of the thousands of the poor, who were thrown out of employment. Such, sir, has been the condition of England, for the last few years, with her great regulator in full operation. I now ask the attention of gentlemen to the history of disasters in the business of this country, in connection with the management of the banks. The expansion of the currency which took place in 1818, in which the Bank of the United States, with its new charter, took the lead, is familiar to all. The whole community then rushed into debt, the price of property and labor suddenly rose, the country was rife with speculation, and all was apparently prosperity. But, sir, how sudden, how great was the change? In 1819 all the banks suspended, and the great regulator was on the very verge of bankruptcy. A sudden contraction took place, the necessary result of which was an almost total stagnation of business and universal bankruptcy. Jails were filled with unfortunate debtors, and poor-houses with paupers. In 1823 and '24, a like disaster of 1819 visited the country, and still, none of this evil was charged to the Government—all agreed that it was the effect of overbanking and overtrading, and the want of a greater specie basis in our circulating medium.

From 1829 to 1832, the Bank of the United States greatly increased its loans, (and very liberally to editors of newspapers, and to members of Congress,) no doubt with a view to obtain a recharter. In 1832, the President of the United States vetoed the bill rechartering this Bank, and instantly it changed its course, and entered upon a rapid process, contracting its circulation, which caused such universal suffering and distress in 1833 and '34. That which could not be gained by favor so liberally bestowed, the Bank now sought to obtain by oppression, and through the sufferings of the country. But it did not succeed; the people would not yield. In 1836, the Bank of the United States obtained a charter from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, with larger powers (as Mr. Biddle, the president of it said) than it ever before possessed. Thus invested, it commenced its course of speculation in stocks, in buying up State banks; trading in flour, cotton, and beef; and expanding its circulation beyond all former precedent. This stimulated the local banks to expand their circulation, and the combined influence of all, was to produce overaction in all the business transactions in the country, and wild and extravagant speculation. But in 1837, the day of reckoning came, and all the banks suspended specie payments.

In 1838 the banks resumed payments, and to regain their losses, entered at once, regardless of all the experience of the past, into the broad field of expansion, speculation, and financial operations, which only lasted till October, 1839, when the bubble again burst, and most of the banks in the country suspended; since that time they have lessened their circulation about thirty millions; a necessary consequence of which has been a stagnation of business, and a reduction of the price of property and of labor.

Mr. Chairman: In view of the present and past condition of the country, it is not at all surprising that the people are deeply excited, and anxiously inquiring for the cause of those bitter calamities which have come upon them year after year From this inquiry they should not—they will not be diverted. If we would address them on the subject, we should address their reason, and not their passions. Sir, let the Opposition do as they may, I am happy that the party with whom I have the honor to act, have no disguise, no catch words, no tricks—no reasons or motives to address to one class of men, or to one section of the country, that they do not address alike to all. They cast their broad banner to the winds of heaven, and whether it floats in the Northern or Southern, the Eastern or Western breeze; the eye of every beholder sees inscribed on its ample folds the great principles for which they are contending, and on which they stake the great issue now before the people. And, sir, in conclusion, let me say to all the friends of this great measure of reform, never doubt, never fear the people—they will vindicate their own sagacity, integrity, and competency for self-government.

REMARKS OF MR. MCKAY,
OF NORTH CAROLINA.
CONCLUDED.

As nearly allied to this, is the loss which the Government sustained in the collection of the revenue, either by the failure of merchants to pay their custom-house bonds, or by the defalcations of collectors or receivers. It will be seen in document No. 10, for the present session, that the losses from the first cause, that is, on custom-house bonds, "were the highest from 1825 to 1829, of any term since the commencement of the Government, doubtless, in a great measure, growing out of the excessive mercantile speculations and failures of that period; and the next largest were from 1821 to 1825, resulting, probably, from like causes; while from 1829 to 1833, a period of comparative regularity in trade, the losses were smaller than in any other term since 1809, and less than even from 1793 to 1797, and from 1797 to 1801." As to the second cause, it is stated in the same document, that—

"Among collecting officers, if looking to the amounts collected, the largest losses were from 1797 to 1801; next, from 1809 to 1813; next, from 1817 to 1821; and next, from 1805 to 1809. The most numerous defaults, compared with the whole number of that class in office, were from 1809 to 1813; next, from 1805 to 1809; next, from 1821 to 1825; next, from 1817 to 1821; and next, from 1825 to 1828. The ratio of them, from 1829 to 1833, and from 1833 to 1837, was not one-fourth as large as in some of the periods just enumerated. Indeed, it was less than in any previous terms from the foundation of the Government, except four: and the number of such defaulters was less than in any presidential term since 1804."

And while on the subject of the losses suffered by the Government in the collection and management of the public revenues, it will be as well, at once, also to notice the losses, either by deposite or disbursing officers, though they would be more appropriately introduced into his subsequent remarks. The same document says:

"Losses appear to have occurred, from defaults amongst officers, in every Administration or presidential term, from the formation of the Government. Thus among disbursing officers they are found in every term since 1789; among collecting officers, in each since 1793, and among deposite officers or banks, in all since 1817. The largest amount of loss from each class, within the period described, has been by deposite officers, consisting of banks, and including, as the resolution requires, the depreciation on such of their notes as were taken for the public dues. The loss by this class, at the lowest estimate, has exceeded six millions and a half of dollars, and adopting a computation made by a committee of the House of Representatives in 1832, would equal thirty-five millions. The next largest amount of loss, as ascertained and computed by the proper bureaus, has been by disbursing officers, and has been a little under five millions; and the least loss has been by collecting officers, not much exceeding two millions. The aggregate of all these losses, taking the lowest estimates for banks, is about thirteen millions and a half. If, in connection with this subject, were considered the losses in collecting the revenue by the non-payment of bonds for duties, on which credit was given to merchants, something over seven and a half millions of dollars must be added, increasing the aggregate to more than twenty-one millions. The proportionate losses by these classes have been thus: Those by the banks and by the duty bonds amount to more than two-thirds of the whole. The losses, either by the banks alone, or the merchants' bonds alone, have been nearly as great as by both disbursing and collecting officers; and either is more than threefold as great as by collectors and receivers, and several millions more than by them, not only from 1789 to 1837, but from 1789 to the present moment."

"The particular losses in each Presidential term being also desired by the resolution, they have been ascertained; and as they furnish a striking solution of some of the general causes of those losses, the periods in which the largest and some of the smallest ones happened among each class of public agents, may be usefully designated here. Among the banks, the largest losses were from 1813 to 1817, then consisting entirely in depreciation of notes taken; and next from 1821 to 1824, consisting then chiefly of deposites, while from 1829 to 1833, and from 1833 to 1837, they were smaller than in any period since 1813. Among disbursing officers, looking to the amount disbursed, the largest losses were from 1821 to 1825; next, from 1817 to 1821; and next, from 1809 to 1813; and they were smaller from 1829 to 1833, and from 1833 to 1837, than in any other term whatever, except from 1789 to 1793. The loss on each $100 from 1829 to 1833, was only nineteen cents, and from 1833 to 1837, only twenty-six cents; while in some previous terms, it was as high as two dollars and sixteen cents. In this class the most numerous losses compared with all in office, were from 1817 to 1821; next, from 1821 to 1825; and next, from 1813 to 1817. The smallest proportion in this respect, except during the first two terms under the Constitution, was from 1829 to 1833, and except these, and the third term, the next smallest was from 1833 to 1837."

Such are the extraordinary results exhibited by that document. After all the clamor made by the Opposition respecting the number of defaulters during Jackson's administration, and the losses growing out of their defalcations, who would have believed that both as to the number of defaulters and the amount of losses by them, that the two terms of that administration would compare so favorably with any that preceded them? And yet such is the fact. Gentlemen cannot escape from this conclusion by impeaching or doubting the verity of the document. All the charges which they make against the Administration, are founded on the official documents, and as the latter are unsparingly used for the purpose of attack, it is surely nothing more than justice that they should be employed also for that of defence. But he would not press this any further, as he was not aware that the accuracy of the statements and tables in this document had been questioned by any one, or that there was any reason to do it.

It is true that the cases of Swartwout and Price, happening at the time they did, and the former startling in amount, being upwards of a million of dollars, gave confidence to the Opposition in pressing their charges on this ground, and caused many good men to confide in the exaggerated statements concerning these and other cases of defalcations; yet when the circumstances, under which those two officers became defaulters are fairly considered, though there may be some cause of complaint against the accounting officers of the Treasury, there can be none against either the head of that Department or the President; but he would not go into the investigation of that now. In his own State, and indeed district, the collector of the port of Wilmington, in the year 1820, became a defaulter for the sum of $143,722 58, a sum, it seemed to him quite equal in magnitude to that of Swartwout at New York, considering the amount of business at the two ports respectively; and he was not aware that any thing had been said about the case. He was certain that it had not formed the ground of attack against the President, Mr. Monroe.

And it must not be forgotten that there was another circumstance which had done much to mislead the public mind on this subject. In the last Congress, the House of Representatives had ordered the publication of an extra number of copies of documents Nos. 111 and 297, each presenting a very unfair view of the matters to which they related. The first, No. 111, contained the names of all collecting and deposite officers who were in default, including all whose accounts were unsettled on the books of the Treasury, whether from accident, death, informality in vouchers, or actual indebtedness. The second, 297, which was most extensively circulated, contained copies of all letters written by the Secretary of the Treasury to collectors and receivers, having reference not only to defalcations, but to omissions to comply with the laws and regulations established for their government, and other irregularities. None of the letters received from the officers, offering reasons for the irregularities and delays complained of by the Department, were given, as they were not called for by the terms of the resolution, and thus, by this one sided correspondence, faithful public officers were reported as defaulters. But enough of this.

Let us resume an examination of the purposes to which the money in the Treasury had been applied. He had already said that Congress alone could appropriate. A great deal had been said in this debate about the estimates annually sent in by the Secretary of the Treasury, as fixing the responsibility of either Congress or the Executive, in regard to the amount of appropriations. The estimates were nothing more than mere statements of the sums of money, which, in the opinions of the heads of the several departments, would be required for the branches of the public service entrusted to their management, commonly providing pay for the employees of the Government, and the purposes authorized by existing laws. Nothing can be inferred from the fact that the appropriations exceed the estimates. On recurrence to our past history, it will be found that this has been usually the case, and it would be strange if it were not so. For as Congress alone can appropriate, it is unquestionably a part of that power to designate the objects to which the appropriations shall be made. It is customary to confine the estimates to purposes authorized by law, or which had before, in some form or other, received the sanction of Congress. It is true that the Executive may include in them appropriations for new objects, or the recommendations of the Executive may, if adopted, render additional appropriations necessary; or if from any cause the public moneys, after being appropriated, are either wasted or misapplied, in all such cases the Executive is clearly responsible for any increase in the expenditures, which may be thus occasioned. He had no wish, of course, to see the appropriations go beyond the estimates. Yet he must protest against the doctrine uttered here by some gentlemen, that they will not vote any money, unless it is asked for by the Executive. The practical effect of that doctrine would be to concede to the Executive all power over the purse of the country; at any rate, to give to him the initiation of all money bills.

Why, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] a few days ago, when a motion was pending before the House for the committal of the bill from the Senate making an appropriation for the removal of the raft in the Red river, argued with great ingenuity, that the Senate could not originate an appropriation bill; while others say that even this House must not appropriate, unless the money is asked for by the Executive. They have not, it is true, used such language, but such are the consequences that would flow from the doctrines they maintain.

There is another aspect in which these estimates must be viewed, in order to judge rightly the responsibility of the Executive in making them, and which will also shed some light on the causes of the increase in our annual expenditures. These estimates vary from year to year, and from causes either of a permanent or temporary kind. In the first place, they are affected by the legislation of Congress. For example: In the year 1832, an act was passed, authorizing the employment of a regiment of mounted men. Of course, in the next year, the estimates of the Secretary of War would have to be increased to an amount sufficient for the pay, subsistence, &c. of the new corps. And the same remark will apply to the acts subsequently passed, making additions to the army. In the year 1835, the pay of the naval officers was increased. In the next year, the Secretary of the Navy would have to increase his estimates for the pay of the navy accordingly. Another case: Congress passes an act directing the building of several new light-houses, in different parts of the Union. When this is done, it is obvious that the annual charge for the maintenance of the light-house establishment will be increased, as other keepers must be employed, and more lamps, oil, &c. will be required. These additional charges will continue in the estimates until Congress changes its laws creating them. Take another case of a temporary character: Congress directs the building of a custom-house at New York, Boston, or other port, or commences the Treasury, Patent, or Post Office building, in this city. Now, in all these cases, unless the first appropriations were large enough, additional ones will be asked for in the estimates, until the buildings are finished, when these items will no longer appear in them.

Again: the public expenditures may be divided into two classes; first, those not affected by administration, such as the salaries of officers, &c. pensions, &c. fixed by law; second, those which are constantly affected by administration, depending not only upon the capacity and fidelity of the public agents, but also upon the state of the markets, &c. This latter class is a numerous one, and it is in this that there has been a large increase. Take, for example, the subsistence of the army and navy. Flour, beef, pork, &c. have to be purchased for their use. Do not all, at once, see that the amount of appropriation for this purpose will be regulated, in a great degree, by the prices at which those various articles can be purchased, and that those prices are constantly fluctuating? The same remark may be applied to the timber that has to be procured for the gradual improvement of the navy; to the materials which enter into the construction of our fortifications, arsenals, and other public buildings, and the labor employed upon them; the cost of all, of course, depending upon the market value of the materials and labor. He would not pause to inquire into the causes of this fluctuation in prices. He was aware that there were many, and not the least potent among them was the state of the currency, the prices of almost every thing rising or falling with its expansions and contractions. Be the cause what it may, the effect was the same, in producing, when the prices were high, a corresponding increase in the expenditures. The following table* will show the variations in the prices of beef, pork and flour, as ascertained from the prices paid for those articles, as component parts of the army and navy rations; and every one must observe that the prices were highest when the currency was known to be most inflated; for instance, in the years 1836, 1837, and 1838. The first part of the table exhibits the average prices paid on account of the navy ration at the three stations of Boston, New York, and Norfolk. The other part of the table shows the prices of the same articles, as component parts of the army ration at New Orleans, New York, and Boston.

In further proof of what he had said, he would refer to a table prepared in 1822, showing the average cost per annum of each officer and soldier of the army, including the academic staff and cadets, from the year 1818 to 1822, inclusive, calculated upon the average strength of the army in 1818, and the actual expenditures in each year:

NOTE.—I learn on inquiry at the Third Auditor's Office, that the average price paid in Florida, during the years 1836, '7, '8, and '9, for corn for the use of the troops, has been at least $2 50 per bushel; fodder and hay at the same rate. The average price of the army ration has been about twenty-five cents.

It will be seen that there was some reduction in 1819; and, continuing in 1820 and 1821, the average cost in the latter year was $160 55 less than in 1818—which would make a very material difference in the annual expense of maintaining an army of any strength. Now, it may be true, that some of this reduction was owing to the improved administration of the War Department about that period; yet it is believed that more of it was produced by the commercial revulsion which commenced in the early part of 1819. Mr. Crawford, in his celebrated report of February, 1820, estimated that the circulation of the country in 1813 amounted to seventy millions, and that in 1816 it had risen to $110,000,000; and he then remarks: "Such an increase will be followed by a general rise in the value of all articles, especially of those which cannot be exported,"

"If those prices could be maintained—if they could be even protected against sudden reduction—they would be cause of gratulation, rather than of complaint. But the expansion of the currency, by the issue of bank paper, in a period of prosperity, will inevitably be succeeded by its contraction, in periods of adversity." Mr. Crawford further estimated, that, at the close of the year 1819, the circulation had been reduced to $45,000,000; and then says, that "a change so violent could not fail, under the most favorable auspices in other respects, to produce much distress, to check the ardor of enterprise, and seriously to affect the productive energies of the nation." In confirmation of these views, he would again refer to a table, showing the prices of the principal articles forming the army ration, in those different years:

It was time to return to the point from which he had digressed. What had been done with the money in the Treasury, notwithstanding the successive efforts that were made to reduce its amount? In the first place, the whole of the public debt was paid off. The amount of that debt on the 1st of January, 1829, according to the Treasury report, was $58,416,418 06, and as there were no payments on account of it between that day and the 4th of March following, it follows that that sum was the amount of the debt on the latter day, when Jackson's administration commenced. Of the principal thus due, $51,405,385 17 were paid before the 31st of December, 1832, being more than double the amount of payments in any previous term of four years. The balance was paid off as fast as it became due, or the certificates of it were presented at the Treasury, and the whole of the public debt, excepting a very small sum unclaimed, was thus extinguished before the 31st December, 1836. The amount of payments during the four years, from 1825 to 1828 inclusive, on account of the principal of the public debt, was $25,304,154 55, being at the rate of $6,326,038 63 per annum; whereas the payments for the same purpose, from 1829 to 1832 inclusive, were $12,851,341 29 per annum. Even spread the payments made during the administration of Jackson over both terms, and there will still be a larger annual payment than was made by any of his predecessors. It was true that as the principal of the debt was larger before 1829, that the payments on account of the accruing interest, prior to that year, would be necessarily greater than they were subsequently.

[Here Mr. McKay was interrupted by Mr. White of Kentucky, who said that the statements made by the gentleman from North Carolina were so extraordinary that he could not permit him to proceed without at once noticing them. Here Mr. White read from a document which he held, the amount of payments on account of the public debt in each of the four years from 1825 to 1828 inclusive, showing an aggregate, during that term, of $45,303,533 83.

While Mr. White was on the floor, he was called to order by Mr. Vanderpoel of New York, and the latter, by Mr. Stanly of North Carolina.]

Mr. McKAY resumed. The gentleman from Kentucky has not been attending to my remarks very closely, or he would not have misapprehended them as he seems to have done. When interrupted by him, he [Mr. McKay] was speaking of the payment of the principal of the public debt. He expressly admitted that the accruing interest was larger prior to 1829; and the learned gentleman from New York, [Mr. Barnard,] who sits just before him, will recollect the admission, as he signified his assent to the remark at the time, to be sure, for the reason, as he understood from a question now asked by him, that payment on account of the interest was equivalent to payment of the principal. Indeed it was so obvious, that the interest would be more during the one period than the other, that he did not think it necessary to enlarge upon it. He certainly had no wish or intention to misrepresent any thing on this subject. The simple truth alone was sufficient for his purpose. But even the tables, from which the gentleman read, are calculated to mislead, unless very carefully examined.

As a proof of this, the gentleman read from one column of the tables, that in the year 1825, there was a payment of $12,095,344 78, on account of the public debt, principal and interest. He forgot, or did not read from another column of the same tables, showing that $5,000,000 was borrowed that year for the purpose of that payment, and thus the apparent payment of $12,095,344 78 was reduced to $7,095,344 78. He presumed that many of the various loans, authorized at different times, had been applied in the same way; but what proportion of them he had not the means of ascertaining. It may also be remarked here, that a part of the payments on account of the public debt from 1812 to 1822, consisted merely of the redemption of Treasury notes issued during those years. There was another view that might be taken of the public debt, which would contrast the administration of General Jackson, in regard to it, still more favorably with any that preceded it. It, was presented by the following statement, showing its increase or decrease during the term of each four consecutive years, from the commencement of the Federal Government to the 31st December, 1836, by a comparison of the amount of the debt as exhibited in the public records at the beginning and close of each term. The amount of the public debt on the 1st January, 1791, being the first period at which it was stated, according to the Treasury report, was

Amount on 1st Jan.	1793,	77,587,997 93	increase	$2,418,023 72

do	1833,	7,001,032 88	do	51,405,385 17

And the balance of seven millions was paid off prior to the 1st of January, 1837, excepting a very small sum, say $127,807 55, not applied for. Thus, according to this statement, and supposing that there were no material payments between the 1st of January and the close of each of those terms and the 4th of March following, the commencement of the several Presidential terms, or if there were any payments between those days, that they were equal in the different terms, the debt was either increased or decreased, during each Administration, as follows:

It was increased during Washington's administration - - - -	$5,764,049 33
During the four years of the elder Adams - - - -	1,066,143 82
It was reduced during Jefferson's eight years - - -	25,267,787 55
During Madison's 1st term - -	824,927 58
It was increased during Madison's second term - - -	59,900,353 58
It was reduced during Monroe's eight years - - - -	32,097,232 88
During J. Q. Adams's term - -	25,304,154 55
During Jackson's eight years -	58,416,418 05

And to this latter sum might be added upwards of a million of dollars, paid in satisfaction of Virginia Revolutionary claims. Also, between six and seven millions, or more, paid to the Cherokees and others, to procure a cession of their lands within the limits of Georgia, as the Government was bound by its compact with that State, made in 1802, to extinguish the Indian title to the same as soon as practicable. He would not include the large sums that had been paid during the same period to the States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, North Carolina, and South Carolina, either for services or supplies during the late war with Great Britain, as similar payments had been made during former Administrations. This was a short history of the payment of the public debt. He did not intend to claim for Jackson's administration any extraordinary merit in effecting its total extinguishment. Much might be conceded to the operation of the sinking fund, first established in 1795. Indeed, it might be admitted that, "through every change of administration, and amidst all the revolutions of parties, the extinguishment of the debt was a fundamental maxim in the system of public credit of the United States." But, after all these admissions, he still thought that the country would accord to General Jackson high praise for the distinguished fidelity with which he had, during his administration, applied all the means at the disposal of the Government to the extinction of the national debt. The venerable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] in the report to which he had already so often referred, with equal magnanimity and justice, says: "To the Congress of the United States, and, in a particular manner, to the Representatives of the people in this House, the period of the total emancipation of the nation from the thraldom of a public debt, will be a moment of intense interest and of heartfelt gratulation. To have co-operated in the accomplishment of this event, is a laudable object of ambition. To have witnessed and contributed to its accomplishment, during his own term of service, is a legacy of honor and integrity, which any public servant may be desirous of leaving for the memory of his children and the gratitude of posterity. As a monument of good faith, active industry, and strenuous exertion for the fulfilment of public engagements, it is an example of morality, well worthy of that community which was also the first among the nations of the earth to lay the fouundations of her Government upon the basis of freedom and the inalienable rights of human kind." The next application of the money, which he would notice, was the deposite with the States, by the act of 23d June, 1836, of $28,101,644 94. To this may be added about $3,500,000, given either to the States or their corporations, in the form of remission of duties on railroad iron. Mr. McKAY said that he would go on to show that while the Government was doing all this—reducing the revenue—paying off a vast public debt, and depositing, or rather giving thirty-two millions to the States, it had made liberal appropriations to public works and establishments, armories, arsenals, fortifications, navy yards, &c. that large sums had been appropriated to laying in materials for our navy—fitting out some of the noblest vessels in the world—arming our fortresses—rebuilding public edifices, and other objects assumed to be of a useful and national character. Also, that many millions had been paid in extinguishing the Indian titles to lands within the States and Territories—an acquisition which will, in time, restore, by tenfold, the sums paid out of the Treasury—which will give birth to a population which will refund annually, and forever, much more than the cost of the territory. But let us proceed to the proofs of this, which will be best afforded by a comparative review, either of the condition of various branches of the public service before and since 1829, or the amount of expenditures in them, and in this way we may ascertain the principal items upon which there has been an increase.

He would begin with the navy, which has been a favorite with the nation generally, since the last war with Great Britain. The amount of efficient naval force afloat, on the 1st of October, in each of the years 1829 and 1839 was as follows:

	Vessels.	Line.	Razee.	Frigates.	Sloops.	Steamers.	Small vessels
1829	2	0	6	11	0	4
1839	5	1	6	19	1	9

And according to the estimates, the number of persons that it was proposed to employ and pay in those two years respectively, was as follows:

Years.	Officers.	Petty officers, seamen, &c.	Total.
1829	1,066	5,236	6,302
1839	1,184	6,631	7,815

From this it appeared that the number of vessels in service had been nearly doubled—that the number of officers had been increased since 1829, about 11 per cent. and of the petty officers, seamen, and others, about 26 per cent. or a general increase of about 23 per cent. of the number of persons employed; and it is proper to mention here, that by the act of 30th of June, 1834, "for the better organization of the marine corps," which is an arm of the navy, that the number of its privates was increased from 750 to 1,000; and also the appointment of several additional officers, commissioned and non-commissioned, was authorized. Of the navy yards, of which there are seven in the United States, being one at Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Norfolk, and Pensacola; each it is supposed that the improvements made at all of them, before 1829, were in value about $1,100,000 only. The improvements made since that year, "includes the completion of the dry docks; the adjacent wharves and the buildings and machinery necessary for their convenient use at Boston and Norfolk; of buildings for the preservation of timber, which are from 60 to 65 feet in width; sixteen feet high, and which collectively measure about 4,800 in length, or sufficient to shelter about 3,500,000 cubic feet of timber; some of those building are so constructed as to furnish additional room for joiners and other work-shops, sail, mould and rigging lofts; a very extensive rope walk and spinning house; turning house, with the most approved machinery for their convenient and advantageous use; store house for hemp; four general store houses; four large mast and boat houses and work shops; twenty dwellings for officers' quarters; two new building slips of masonry and two of wood, replaced with masonry. A new ship-house, with the materials for a second. Extensive quay walls of stone. The surface of the yards, by removing elevated parts and filling up others, which were formerly covered with water at ordinary tides, together with many other works of minor importance, but essentially useful for the convenient construction and equipment of a naval force, and for the preservation of materials and stores." The value of the aforesaid improvements made at the different navy yards between the years 1829 and 1839, being estimated at $4,890,000. The official reports of survey, in 1829 and 1839, show that the value of materials and stores in the several navy yards, exclusive of provisions and clothing, which is wanted for current use, and of stores on foreign stations, was as follows: In 1829, $4,498,917; in 1839, $6,546,655, showing an increase of nearly fifty per cent. Now, all this could be effected by liberal appropriations only, and of course made by Congress. The growing commerce of the country, penetrating into every sea, had, in the opinion of many, required an additional naval force for its protection; and hence Congress did, by various acts, provide for it. Now it must not be forgotten, that, in 1835, the pay of the navy was increased; and in 1836, the exploring expedition was authorized, and both those acts contributed to swell the expenditures for the naval service. He did not know that any one of the Opposition complained of those expenditures, for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] told us the other day, that if he had his way, he would vote twenty-five millions per annum for the use of the navy instead of five. He would pass on to the other public establishments, which have been provided for the purpose of national defence. Of these, the most prominent are the fortifications on the Atlantic and on the lake shores, sixty-three in number, of which fifty-one are finished, and twelve are now building. In the erection or repair of those works, there has been expended, from 1789 to 1838 inclusive, $24,542,552 25; of which $9,690,878 30 were in the ten years from 1829 to 1838. He did not include in the number of fortifications, the ten or eleven posts on the Western frontier, and in the interior, nor did he include in the aggregate of expenditures the amount that had been expended upon those posts or upon the numerous barracks, quarters, storehouses, and other needful buildings which are under the superintendence of the Quartermaster's Department.

Before 1829, there were two armories and fourteen arsenals in different parts of the Union, the grounds, buildings, and machinery of which were, in that year, valued at about $1,871,745. Since that time there has been constructed (including one or more that are building) eight other arsenals, and the two armories and the first fourteen arsenals have been greatly improved by the enlargement of their sites, construction of workshops, quarters, barracks, and buildings generally, with the erection of machinery, by which the estimated value of the whole has been increased to $3,723,336. The following statement will exhibit the amount of the several kinds of ordnance and ordnance stores on hand on the 4th of March, 1829; and also the additions that have been made thereto since that year:

There has been issued to the States under the law of 1808, for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia, since the 1st of January, 1829, to the 31st of December, 1839, ordnance and ordnance stores amounting in value to $2,405,715. And as explaining in part the cause of the increased expenditure for military service, he would barely allude to the additions which had been made to the army of the United States during the late and present Administrations. The first act that was passed for that purpose, was in the year 1832, on the motion of a member from Illinois [Mr. Duncan] then and now in the ranks of the Opposition, by which authority was given to the President to raise a regiment of mounted rangers, subsequently converted into a regiment of dragoons. The other acts of 1836 and of 1838 are so recent, that their provisions are likely familiar to the committee.

He would next pass to the works which have been executed to facilitate the commerce of the country, such as light-houses, roads, and the improvement of harbors and rivers. An official statement before him shows that in the erection of light-houses from 1789 to 1838, there had been expended $6,474,775 45, of which nearly one-half, say $3,085,145 42 was from 1829 to 1838; and the consequence of this large expenditure has been an increase in their number. Thus, in 1828, there were 133 light-houses, and 16 floating lights; in 1837, 192 light-houses, 24 floating lights; and in 1840 there were 237 light-houses, of which 17 were double lights, and one treble, and thirty floating lights. It must be obvious to all that this increase in the establishment would necessarily involve greater expense for its support. Hence in 1829, the total amount paid for salaries of keepers, superintendents and contingencies, was $123,623 93. In the same year the cost of lamps, oil, &c. was $43,615 65. In 1837, the first class of expenditure was $230,573 43; the second was $69,428 58. In 1839 the first class had increased to $323,154 68, and the second to $108,856 26. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Cushing] admitted a few days ago that his party generally voted in favor of appropriations for light-houses as well as those for purposes of internal improvement. This was a fair and candid admission, but the gentleman endeavored to neutralize the effect of it, by stating at the same time, that at the session of 1835 and '36, two bills had been reported by friends of the Administration, one by the chairman of the Military Committee for fortifications, and the other by Mr. Gillet of New York, from the Committee on Commerce, for custom-houses; which, if they had passed, would have caused appropriations to the amount of ten millions or more. Now what were the facts? Mr. Gillet had not reported a bill for such a purpose from any committee, but had merely submitted an amendment, to be offered to a bill that had been reported to the House by a colleague, [Mr. Phillips,] of the gentleman from Massachusetts the amendment simply designating a number of places where custom-houses should be built, without naming any appropriation at all. With respect to the bill reported by the chairman [Colonel Johnson] of the Committee on Military Affairs, it was a copy of one that had also originated in the Senate, and passed that body, a majority of the opposition Senators, including the two from Massachusetts, [Messrs. Webster and Davis] voting for it, and he appealed to the honorable gentleman, as he knew that he had re-examined the facts, to say if this is not a true statement of them.

[Mr. CUSHING said that he believed the gentleman from North Carolina had fairly stated the facts, according to his recollection of them. He added, that at the time spoken of by Mr. McKay, there were in the House of Representatives, three fortification bills, one reported by Mr. Cambreleng, from the Committee on Ways and Means, for (he believed) about $1,900,000; a second, by Colonel Johnson, from the Committee on Military Affairs, for about $1,000,000; and a third, from the same committee, in place of the second, for about two and a quarter millions. These were the fortification bills to which Mr. C. had referred on a former occasion. There was a Senate bill at the same time, of substantially the same tenor as the last mentioned. Mr. C. believed it was true, as Mr. McKay suggested, that a majority of the Opposition Senators, including the two from Massachusetts, had voted for the bill on the question of its final passage; but so also, in addition, had, in general, the friends of the Administration in the Senate.]

Mr. McKay resumed. Now in regard to internal improvements, he had already stated that the power to make them had been first exercised by Congress between the years 1809 and 1812, commencing with the Cumberland road, and though the power had been since constantly opposed, yet it embraced, at this time, within its limits, works in almost every part of the Union. In the years 1825 to 1828, the average annual expenditure was about $500,000. In the years 1833 to 1836 it was $1,500,000. And the whole amount of expenditure by the General Government for this purpose was $18,540,183 87; of which $14,533,355 has been within the last ten years. Indeed it is almost certain, as he had before said, that had it not been for the firmness of the late President, the expenditure, within the latter period, would have been much larger, and that the Government now might have been burdened with a heavy public debt, mainly contracted in the prosecution of an extensive system of internal improvements. He would not attempt a description of the various works which had been executed, but would merely show that the money which had been appropriated by Congress to make them had been faithfully applied by the Executive; and, to do this, he would quote the admission of a distinguished opponent of the Administration. Mr. Clay, in his reply to the Recorder and citizens of Buffalo, assembled to receive him, in July, 1839, said:

"I have been very glad, during my voyage upon this lake, to find that an erroneous impression has existed in my mind as to the improvement of harbors. I had feared that the expenditures of public money had been often wasteful and unnecessary upon works on the lake shores. There are probably a few instances in which it might have been properly avoided; but I am now fully persuaded that, in the general, the expenditure has been necessary, wise, and salutary."

And here he must notice a remark that was made last night by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Corwin,] that his party voted in favor of appropriations for those works, as they were for the use of the people, but that the friends of the Administration voted money for the benefit of the office holders only.

To say nothing of the character of this remark, how is it supported by facts? Did not the gentleman and many of his friends vote for several of the propositions that have, from time to time, been made, to increase the compensation of the office holders? Did not a majority of his party vote for the "Act to regulate the pay of the navy of the United States," approved 3d March, 1835, by which an addition of from three to five hundred thousand dollars* was annually made to the aggregate pay of the naval officers? Did not the gentleman's party, or at least many of them, vote for the "Act to regulate the compensation of certain officers of the revenue cutters? and, also, for the amendment to the general appropriation bill of 1837, granting additional pay to the clerks in the several public offices? Sir, the journals of the House will show that they did, for in looking over them a few days ago, (he trusted from no idle or impertinent curiosity—certainly from no invidious motive,) he observed that the name of the able gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Evans,] who sits near him, was generally in the affirmative on these and various other propositions of a kindred character.

*The Fourth Auditor has since informed me that the act of the 3d of March, 1835, referred to, has caused an annual charge on the Treasury of abou $500,000.

And here he must notice the very large sums which have, within the last few years, been expended in the construction of durable and other buildings, such as those for the Treasury, Patent, and Post Office, and branch mints, &c. In the erection of custom-houses alone, there had been expended, up to March, 1829, $648,764 25 only; since that year $1,836,474 92. It was true that a considerable proportion of the latter sum had been laid out upon two magnificent structures in Boston and New York, yet he recollected perfectly well, that when a motion was made in the session of 1836, by an honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. Underwood,] to limit the cost of the former, it was defeated by the votes of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Cushing,] and others.

In the Indian Department there has been a great deal done; and the treaties which have been negotiated with several of the tribes, have formed a chief object of expenditure during the late and present Administrations. The policy in which those treaties originated, was always a part of the fundamental policy of the Government, from Washington's administration down. A new impulse, however, was given to it by the act of the 28th of May, 1830, which provided "for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the Mississippi river." He believed that the Opposition generally were opposed to that act, though the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Bell,] who is now acting with them, was at that time a supporter of the Administration, and took an active and leading part in carrying it through. In the execution of that act, twenty-two millions nine hundred and fifty-three thousand five hundred and five dollars have been expended, in the purchase of one hundred and sixteen millions five hundred and sixteen thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven acres of land from the Indians residing in the States and Territories, and in the removal of those Indians to the new homes provided for them west of the Mississippi. There had been expended for similar purposes, prior to 1829, three millions six hundred and ninety-five thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight dollars only. He presumed that the representatives of the States in the South and West—from which the Indians had been removed, would not object to the expenditure, as the object of it had been to ameliorate the condition of the Indians themselves, to rid those States of a troublesome population, and to acquire for settlement within their limits, a large body of rich and valuable land. Indeed his own State had been benefited by these acquisitions, as by the Cherokee treaty she obtained possession of a territory about forty miles in length, with an average width of from twenty-five to thirty miles, and is supposed to contain about 700,000 acres.* Judge White of Tennessee, who was chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs during the time that those treaties were negotiated, when speaking on this subject in the Senate on the 16th of February, 1835, said:

"Sir, the honorable Senator from South Carolina, in some of his remarks, has not done justice, as I think, to the Chief Magistrate. He says he came into power on the principles of reform and retrenchment, and that he was bound to carry them out; instead of which the expenditures of Government are doubled. Sir, he was not bound to do more than man could perform. One cause of an increase of expenditure in the Indian Department, has been fairly stated by the Senator from Missouri. It furnishes matter for praise—none for censure." And that we may estimate properly the responsibility of the Executive for the increase of the public expenditures, he would present to the committee a few more details, in that class of them, the amount of which is regulated almost entirely by the legislation of Congress. Take the case of pensions of all kinds—for which there had been paid from 1789 to 1838 inclusive, $41,595,117 57; of which, $22,244,507 44 were within the last ten years. In the four years from 1825 to 1828, the payments for pensions were $4,692,116 53. In the years 1833 to 1836 they were $12,790,946 98. Now this enormous increase was occasioned principally by the "Act supplementary to an act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution," approved 7th of June, 1832, introduced by an Opposition Senator, [Mr. Foote of Connecticut,] and voted for generally by his party, and the act of 1836, also introduced by an Opposition Senator, [Mr. Tomlinson.] The only agency which the Executive had in making those payments, was to see that the laws in regard to them were faithfully executed, and that the claims for pensions should be fairly and fully examined and decided upon, in conformity to the laws allowing them. When the bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions was before the House, some weeks ago, gentlemen of both parties united in the expression of an opinion favorable to the character of that officer, [Mr. Edwards;] so that, in all probability, the Government has suffered no loss from the manner in which those laws have been executed. Take another item of expenditure—the three and two per cent. funds, as they are called, payable to the new States, or for their benefit, out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, within their respective limits, according to the several laws admitting those States into the Union. In the years 1825 to 1828, the amount of this 5 per cent. fund was $695,100 19 only. In the years 1833 to 1836, it was five hundred per cent. larger, being $3,874,876 03. Surely the Executive is not responsible for this, as the expenditure is directed by law, and the increase of it in these latter years resulted from the very heavy sales which then occurred. He might here speak of the large sums which, within the last few years, have been paid out of the Treasury on account of trust funds—that is, moneys received in trust for Indians, &c. and also of the moneys recovered from foreign Governments as indemnities, neither of which were properly expenditures, but as they were received into the Treasury, they had to be paid out again when called for, and this served to add to the general aggregate of expenditures; but as they had been fully explained by others, he would not say any thing further about them. He would proceed to another class of expenditures, over which the Executive has a greater control, and for the amount of which he is, therefore, more certainly responsible; for instance, the diplomatic expenses. In the years 1825 to 1828, they were $575,776 03. In the years 1833 to 1836 they were a little less, being $573,464; and although those expenses have continued nearly stationary, all will agree that the late and present Administrations have conducted our foreign relations with ability and success. In addition to the many commercial treaties and conventions, which have been formed, there has been received into the Treasury, within the last ten years, from foreign nations $7,173,016 71 as indemnities to our citizens for spoliations on their property and rights. The whole amount received for the same purpose, from the organization of the Government, up to 1829, was $9,954,960, including the amounts which the United States assumed to pay to her citizens, under the convention with France, of the 30th April, 1803, for the purchase of Louisiana, and also under the treaty with Spain, for the purchase of Florida. With respect to the additional clerks in the Executive Departments here, about which a great deal has been said, it is clear that the necessity for their employment arises from the new and increased duties devolved upon those departments. Take the case of the Post Office Department. Can any one suppose that the same number of clerks, which in 1828, examined all the accounts of the deputy postmasters, when they were 7,651, could do it in 1839, when the number of postmasters had increased to 12,780? Again: can any one suppose that the same number of clerks would be necessary in the Pension Bureau in the years 1828 and 1839, when in the former, the pensioners were 16,177, and in the latter year, 43,974. The same inquiry might be made in regard to all the other Departments, and particularly as to the War Department, and the bureaus attached to it. He would examine another class of expeditures, over which the Executive has no control whatever; those appertaining to the Judiciary and Congress, co-ordinate and independent departments of the Government. In the years 1825 to 1828, the expenditures for the Judiciary were $915,417 07. In the years 1833 to 1836, they were $1,491,262. Here is an increase, ocasioned by an extension of the system; the establishment of new circuits and districts, and of course additional offices, besides the augmenting business of the country. As to Congress: first take the per diem pay and mileage of members fixed by law. The amount of compensation received by them in the years 1825 to 1828 was $1,566,122 80. In the the years 1833 to 1836, it was $1,963,209, and in the two years 1837 and '38, it had risen to $1,307,500 60. Here also is a very considerable increase, and in explanation of it, is to be stated the facts, that the number of members in both Houses had been increased; that the sessions have been longer, from various causes, and that the expenditures in the last two years were affected by the extra session holden in 1837. The same or a greater rate of increase is exhibited in the contingent expenses of the two Houses.

In the years 1825 to 1828, they were $387,530 29. In 1833 to 1836, they were $967,916, and in 1837 and '38, they were $786,287 98. The contingent expenses of the Senate in 1829 to 1832, were $105,758. In 1833 to 1836, when the Opposition had, in that body, a clear and undisputed majority, they rose up to $267,966. The increased expenditure for stationery alone, in this House, is extraordinary. In 1837, it was $33,786. In 1839, it was $76,287 98. Surely no one will hold the Executive responsible for this increase in the expenses either of the Judiciary or of Congress. But he would quit these details, as a further enumeration of them would merely show to what purposes the money had been appropriated by Congress. He had heretofore observed that the money had been collected from the people, and must be spent. Members of Congress might reasonably differ as to the purposes to which it should be applied. He had himself opposed many of the appropriations, on the ground that they were improvident, and some of them were for unconstitutional and unworthy objects. He was satisfied that the expenditures were larger than they ought to be—that an annual saving of perhaps several hundred thousand dollars might be effected in the expenses of Congress alone—and he would seize the first favorable occasion that would occur, to present to the House at large his views on the subject of retrenchment. He had heretofore stated that the late President, and at least a majority of his friends, had been in favor of bringing down the revenues of the Government to its wants, economically administered. Is it true, then, that they alone have made these appropriations? Did those gentlemen in the Opposition, who now clamor so much about extravagance, vote for none of them? Sir, the journals of the two Houses will show conclusively that, on the passage of all bills and resolutions involving an expenditure of money, that a larger majority of the opponents of the Administration voted affirmatively. He had intended to have prepared and exhibited a statement of the yeas and nays on most of the leading questions upon which they were taken, arranging the names of the members according to party divisions, but he had been anticipated on this point by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. HOPKINS,) and would therefore decline it. It cannot be pretended that the late President had a majority in the two Houses, during his administration, and is thus to be held responsible for what was done in the way of the appropriations of the public moneys. It is notorious that, in 1830 or 1831, in the secession from his party of some Southern and Western politicians, the President was left in a minority in the Senate, and continued so until the winter of 1836—indeed, that he "never had a majority in both Houses, frequently a majority in neither." In support of this, he would quote the opinion of a venerable Senator, whose death has just been announced to the country. Judge White of Tennessee, on the occasion before referred to, after speaking of the expenditure in the Indian Department in the manner already quoted, said:

"How is it as to others? He has been against a tariff for protection merely; he has been opposed to the system of internal improvement; he has been against the bank; in short, he has been against the exercise of those constructive and doubtful powers which create so much discord among ourselves, and such heavy drains upon your Treasury. He has enforced his opinions with an ability and zeal seldom either equalled or surpassed. Why then, it is asked, has he not succeeded according to his wishes? Because he alone could not accomplish his wishes. I fearlessly appeal to every man who hears me, that, from the time he first came into power, to this moment, he never had, at any time, a majority in both Houses, frequently a majority in neither. Members come into Congress under one set of colors, and, when here, fight under another. At elections they get votes under the Jackson colors; when here, they are independent, and act upon such principles as they approve. Every man brings with him his vial of Kalesa's vegetable acid, and all he has to do is to touch his collar, as it is called, with a few drops, and off it falls. When he is called to the Jackson ranks, he is called in vain. Sound the Jackson whistle in Congress, and the Jackson men do not spring, as it were, out of the ground, to their posts, like those of Roderick

*Of this land, one hundred and ninety-five thousand four hundred and four and a half acres, together with eight town lots of half an acre each, were sold in 1838 from $332,591 93.

Dix. They will not come; no note can be sounded so loud as to make them hear and attend. Instead of this, in defiance of his known wishes, they vote appropriation upon appropriation for roads and canals, and, not being able to vote enough to intimidate him in the course of six days of the week, they spend Saturday night, and until after sunrise on Sunday morning, apparently to create an influence they think he dare not resist. Firm as a rock, he stood upon his principles; he used his only powers, the veto, again and again. What then? He is charged with being a tyrant, a despot, for no other offence but using his only powers to check these very expenditures now complained of.

"I appeal to those in Congress, from 1829 till now, whether, among the most able advocates for internal improvements, there were not some professing to be, and I have no doubt sincerely, decided friends of his Administration? Why, then, should he be censured for an increase of expenditures which he had most anxiously endeavored to prevent, and which, to a very great extent, he has actually prevented, under circumstances where no other man would have dared to set up his individual opinions against the expressed will of the majority of the Senate and House of Representatives?

"Sir, his friends in Congress have been all shades, colors, and names; Jackson-tariff and anti-tariff; internal improvement and anti-internal improvement; Bank and anti-Bank; and, although he had, at the election grounds, a party large enough, in his name, to bear down all before them, yet here he never had a party large enough to do any thing. I remember once, when one of those great questions was deliberating, I was walking behind the colonnade where now you sit, and a brother Senator of different politics joined me: he asked me how I thought the question under discussion would be decided. I told him I did not know. Why, says he, don't you know how your party will vote? I answered that I did not; when I tried to count them, I was reminded of an anecdote I had heard of a black man, who had been sent by his master on a cold morning to feed the pigs. When he returned, his master addressed him: "Peter, were all the pigs up to be fed?" "Don't know, massa," says Peter. "Why, did't you count them?" says the master. "I did count 'em all, massa, but one little spotted fellow, and he kept such runnin about I could'nt count him."

"Mr. President, I hope to hear no more such complaints. Gentlemen on this floor are not aware of the credit to which the Chief Magistrate is entitled for the stand he took against friends and opponents, in maintenance of the great principles upon which he was brought into power."

And as a further proof of the assertion that the late President "never had, at any time, a majority in both Houses," he would appeal to the election of Printer to the two Houses, during the whole of his administration. Every one knows the excitement which that election usually produces. Of the sum of $1,208,888 17, paid by Congress for printing, including books for the use of the members, from the 4th of March, 1829, to December, 1839, $219,725 25 only was received by Blair and Rives; $321,246 53 by Duff Green, and the greater part of it while he was opposed to the Administration; and the remainder, $667,916 39, by Gales and Seaton, including what was paid to them in the name of Thomas Allen.

But he must bring his remarks to a close. He had already extended them much further than he intended when he obtained the floor to address the committee.

As the charge of extravagance, which he had been examining, was a general one, as no specifications had been attempted, he might have met it by a general denial. Gentlemen in the opposition had sought to alarm the country by the cry of waste and profligacy in the public expenditures. The time would come when the people would require them to substitute facts for assertions. He had designed, in the review which he had taken of the course of the late and present Executive upon the subject, to show that, during the whole of their Administrations, no new duty, tax, or charge of any kind had been laid; that, on the contrary, many of the old ones had been repealed, and all of them greatly reduced, and in the progress of further reduction; that while some of the expenditures may have been improvident, and others upon unworthy objects, yet that the whole of the public debt had been paid off; that thirty-two millions had been given to the States; that all the public establishments had been strengthened and improved; that large bodies of valuable land had been purchased in several of the States and Territories; that upwards of sixty thousand Indians, consisting of small, but independent tribes, had been emigrated to the west of the Mississippi; and that although the receipts and expenditures have been large, that the losses sustained by the Government, either in the collection, safekeeping, or disbursement of the money, was less than during any previous period. Such was the showing on the part of the late and present Administrations. He would not anticipate the verdict of the country, but he thought that a virtuous and intelligent constituency would award to the President, and his immediate predecessor, and at least a majority of their political friends, a triumphant acquittal on this charge of extravagance.

Statement of votes in Congress on various objects of extraordinary appropriations, from 1831 to 1837. It is believed that an examination of all other votes, upon which the yeas and nays were taken, would exhibit the same result.

The act authorizing a subscription to the Documentary History of the American Revolution, was rejected in the House of Representatives in the session of 1831-'32, (see journal, p. 934,)—yeas 88, nays 94. The number of anti-Jackson members voting in the affirmative, was 72, and, in the negative 11. The act was subsequently passed, and involves an expenditure of at least five hundred thousand dollars, according to the rate at which the first volume has been paid for. The amount already expended under it is twenty-five thousand six hundred and two dollars for one volume. The number of volumes is not limited by the contract, though the publishers have proposed that it shall not exceed twenty.

The "Act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution," approved 7th June, 1832, passed the House of Representatives—yeas 128, nays 45. Of those who voted in the affirmative, 60 were opposed to the Administration, and 67 friendly to it. Of the negatives 20 were opposed to the Administration, and twenty-five friendly to it.

In the Senate, the same bill was passed—yeas 24, nays 19. In the affirmative there were 15 opponents of the Administration; and in the negative there were but two, at that time, ranked with the Opposition.

REMARKS OF MR. ANDERSON, OF TENNESSEE,

In Senate, June 16, 1840—In reply to Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, upon the motion of Mr. PRESTON, to print the letter of Mr. Poinsett, and the motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, to amend it by printing also the report of General Knox, and the reports of General Harrison, as chairman of the Militia Committee of the House of Repretentatives, in 1817 and 1818.

Mr. ANDERSON said: He rose for the purpose of replying briefly to some of the suggestions of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. He understood him as defending the constitutionality of the plan of General Harrison, to establish a corps of military instructors for every school in the United States, upon the same ground that we maintained the military academy at West Point. That the honorable Senator believed the one to be as constitutional as the other. Sir, said he, I differ entirely from this view of the case. I believe that the propositions of General Harrison are wholly unconstitutional. There is no analogy between the establishment at West Point, and that vast scheme for the infusion of a military spirit throughout the United States, which was the design of General Harrison to effect. That academy is a part of the army of the United States, so created by our legislation; and I call the attention of Senators to the rules and regulations established by law, which I conceive settle this question. The cadet takes an oath of enlistment for the term of eight years, and is subject to the rules and articles of war. That oath is that—

"I cadet ———, of the State of ———, aged ——— years and ——— months, do hereby engage, with the consent of my guardian, to serve in the army of the United States for eight years, unless sooner discharged by the proper authority. And I, cadet ———, do hereby pledge my word of honor as a gentleman, that I will faithfully observe the rules and articles of war, the regulations for the army, and the regulations for the military academy; and that I will, in like manner, observe and obey the orders of the President of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the rules and discipline of war."

In addition to this, the professors of the academy are declared by law to be a part of the corps of engineers; which I beg leave to read for the consideration of the Senate:

"ART. 12. The professors, teachers, and cadets of the military academy being a part of the corps of engineers, are by law subject to the rules and articles of war."

Here, sir, we have the question settled, and no analogy whatever exists between that institution and the plan of General Harrison. The first constitutes a part of the army of the United States—the latter is a vast scheme for acting upon the rising generation, and preparing it, at an unprecedented expense, for military power of the most dangerous character. The views which General Harrison entertains upon this subject are utterly subversive of our free institutions. His report is marked by the most earnest anxiety to engraft an insidious martial system of education upon our civil institutions, and which, in after times, would become too powerful for our control. It is nothing less than fitting to the hand of some usurper the means of indomitable despotism.

The honorable Senator admires the sentiments and language of the report, and denies that it contains any thing dangerous. The specific details are not made out, but the plan is distinctly laid down. It is to appoint a "corps of instructors to attend to the gymnastic and elementary part of education in every school of the United States," and "professors of tactics to be established in all the higher seminaries." It is obvious that he was conscious of the nature and extent of this power, and his appeal to the ancient Governments of Greece and Rome, for the illustration of the excellence of his project, can neither afford it support or protection. They were prostituted by its vices, and stripped by its power of their liberties; and it is remarkable that the Grecian system of gymnasia and military instruction, entered Rome about the period that Cæsar crossed the Rubicon, and planted the standard of his despotism in the eternal city.

Sir, I consider the plan of General Harrison as more dangerous to our freedom than any thing I have ever known in our history. It proposes to take charge of all the youth of our country; to educate them for military purposes, and early imbue them with ambitious hopes, and a restless spirit for warlike action. A mighty revolution is to be effected in our system of Government, equally adverse to the feelings, wishes, habits, customs, manners, and pursuits, of the people.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky seems to entertan no difficulty as the constitutionality of the military views of General Harrison. Permit me, Mr. President, to call your attention to the remarkable proposition which he makes in his report of eighteen hundred and eighteen. In that he says, that "the President should, in all cases, address his orders immediately to some officer of the militia, and not to the Executive of the State. The Governor of a State is not a militia officer, bound to execute the orders of the President; he cannot be tried for disobedience of orders, and punished by the sentence of a court martial." Here, sir, is a direct attempt to consolidate military power in the person of the President, by separating the militia from the Governor—by setting aside the authority of the States. If this could be done, you might soon put an end to the present structure of our Government. The independence of the States would cease to exist in that most vital arm of their power—the control of the militia. Connect this with the other schemes of General Harrison, and the system of usurpation would be easy, having the path most obsequiously pointed out by our legislation. His design was to separate, for ever, the militia from the Governors of the States. No identity of feeling, of interest, or of official relation, was to be permitted to exist. They were to become, in effect, as well as in name, in peace and in war, the militia of the President of the United States, and not of the States. This was not a rule to be merely applicable to some particular officer, but was intended to extend to the entire organization! When, sir, and by whom, except by General Harrison, let me ask, was such a power as this, striking at the corner stone of the independence and the safety of the States, ever dared to be proposed for the deliberate adoption of this Government? Every man who knows any thing of the nature of our Constitution, and can foresee the effect of great causes, will perceive that this proposition would utterly have changed its character; and, certainly, perhaps lastingly, placed the sword and the purse in the same supreme hand! If we connect with this recommendation, made by him, his plan of universal military education of the youth, by which he proposed to revolutionize "the manners and the habits of the nation," we are astonished at the cool deliberation with which a system of changes is planned, that would, in the end, not only give us the classic, but a corrupted and military resemblance to the Governments of Greece and Rome. Considering the propositions as the most dangerous ever made in our legislative councils, I should look upon their adoption as fatal to our liberties!

But the honorable Senator excuses General Harrison for his first great project, (not this last,) by stating that, after consideration for a short time, he proposed that his vast plan of education, and military training of the boys, should be engrafted upon the Constitution by amendment. It unfortunately happens, however, that the General has given us a proof of his own opinions upon this subject, although he might have moved an amendment of the Constitution to allay the scruples of others. It seems he had none himself; for he renewed his great plan of appointing a military corps of instructors for every school in the United States in eighteen hundred and nineteen. This act, so repeated, was utterly inconsistent with any doubts in his mind, of the constitutionality of the measure.

To many other unanswerable objections to the mighty schemes of General Harrison must be added, also, the immense expense at which they would be carried into effect.

I have before me the very able and luminous report of General Dix, the superintendent of common shools in the State of New York, in the year eighteen hundred and thirty seven. I have adopted from that the standard ratio, by which to ascertain the number of schools necessary for the instruction of all the youth of the United States, estimating New York at a sixth part of the whole population. In that State there were, in eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, nine thousand seven hundred and eighteen schools, and the number of male children about three hundred thousand. Deducting any excess for a variation of the ages required under a system of military education (which should commence, according to General Harrison's opinion, "as soon as their mental and bodily powers have acquired sufficient strenth,") the number to be so educated and trained would be one million, five hundred thousand The number of schools to be established in the United States, according to the proportion now existing in New York, would be not less than fifty-eight thousand. If we suppose each instructer to have charge of two schools, which is very ample employment, their number would be more than twenty-five thousand. Men qualified for this business could not be obtained for less than five hundred dollars each, annually; which would create the vast expense of twelve millions five hundred thousand dollars for that service alone. The contingent expenditures would likewise be large; and the professors of tactics for the higher seminaries, numbering at least one thousand, who could not be obtained at less salaries than a thousand dollars annually, for each, would increase the sum by the addition of one million.

In every aspect in which the scheme of General Harrison can be viewed, it would be alike destructive of our habits, subversive of our free institutions, and obnoxious to the feelings of the American people.

APPENDIX.

I annex for the information of the people, General Harrison's gigantic scheme to convert our free Government into a military Republic. To exhibit this within the smallest space, I have reduced his propositions to a practical calculation of the results.

It will be kept in mind that those propositions are in the following words:

"That a corps of military instructors should be formed to attend to the gymnastic and elementary part of education in every school in the United State, while the more scientific part of the art of war shall be communicated by professors of tactics, to be established in all the higher seminaries."

The calculation is founded upon the ratio as to the number of schools and children, adopted from the report of General Dix, of New York, the talented superintendent of common schools for that State, made in 1837. New York is estimated to contain about one-sixth part of the population of the United States.

The expense of the grand project of General Harrison for a military Republic, exhibited.

The number of boys who might be annually under the control of officers appointed by the United States, may be safely assumed at 1,500,000.

The number of schools to be established so as to include all the youth, taking the data of 9,718 now in New York, as the one-sixth part for the whole Union, would be not less than 50,000.

If we suppose each instructor to be appointed by the United States would be placed in charge of two schools, the number of instructers would then be 25,000.

Able instructers, qualified for the business, could not be had for less than $500 each, per annum, which would require a sum equal to	$12,500,000
Contingent expenses for each school, annually, such as arms, books, &c. would be at least $100, equal to	5,000,000
Total amount of the expense to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, by taxes upon the people, for primary military schools, annually, would be -	17,500,000
The number of higher seminaries ould be, at least, 1,000. For ach of these there would have to be, at least, one professor of military tactics, making 1,000 professors. The salary of professors, well qualified, would have to be, for the high seminaries, at least $1,000, annually, making the total sum for that branch - -	1,000,000
The contingent expenses for the higher seminaries, annually, would be, probably, not less than $200 for each, making - - - -	200,000
Total expense for schools, if the project was faithfully carried out	18,700,000
To this enormous expense Gen. Harrison, in the same report, proposed to add the plan of training and paying the officers. He annexed a table to his report, and set down the day for each brigade, and estimated the militia then, in 1817, to be 1,000,000, the total expense - - - - -	1,565,000
To this should be added about half a million of militia men, probably, at this time, if we suppose the plan of General Harrison in full operation, and the sum would be -	787,500
The grand total	$21,052,500

Making a grand total, which it would take to carry out General Harrison's two great plans of military instruction and discipline, of twenty-one millions fifty-two thousand five hundred dollars; a sum more than equal to the whole of the ordinary expenditures necessary for our Government!

These schemes of General Harrison, to convert this pure Republic into a great military Government, training all its boys, by a military education, for war and conquest, and also to discipline all the militia officers at an immense expense, are the most stupendous and dangerous of any ever proposed to the American people!

Let the people beware how they venture to make such a scheming military man President! What security will they have against him? These projects of his are filed in the archives of Congress, and have been reprinted at this session, by order of the Senate!

There can be no doubt that such mighty projects would, if carried into effect, destroy the liberties of the people in the end, and subject them to the heaviest taxes ever borne by a nation of freemen. Consolidation and despotism, the ruin of the peace of families, the destruction of religion, the total overthrow of morality, foreign and domestic wars, the rivalry of ambitious military men, and the final extinction of the last hope of freedom for the world, would follow this terrible system of Grecian military law!

Let the people put an end to the possibility of such a scheme, by rejecting General Harrison at the pending Presidential election. If they pause, and reflect for a moment, they cannot fail to come to this result. The present Chief Magistrate is a man whose policy is pacific, whose principles are Republican, and who has guided our affairs, at home and abroad, with a skill and firmness unsurpassed by any of his predecessors.

Will you exchange such a man for a military President, who is anxious to convert this great Republic into one wide theatre of military trainings and discipline, to prepare all the youth of the country for the pomp and pageantry of war, its vices, its honors, and renown, and to despise the gentler and happier arts of peace? The people will remember, in connection with all this, that General Harrison was in favor of the standing army of John Adams.

It is also an important fact that General Harrison, in his late letter to the Louisville legion, declares that his military views, as to the militia, &c. have undergone no change. If this be so, and he should be made President, he might, probably, attempt to carry into effect this vast scheme of converting our Government into a great military Republic! Is it not safe to pause in contemplation of such a mighty revolution, which would certainly put at hazard the liberties of the people!!!

I subjoin an extract from General Harrison's letter addressed to Governor Scott of Kentucky, and inserted in Dawson's Life of Harrison, at page 119, chap. 16 This shows he is for taxing the people in order to maintain an army of disciplined militia of one hundred thousand men!!

"VINCENNES, March 10, 1809.

"DEAR SIR: Instead of the few days now appropriated to training, and the very few hours of those days actually employed, some weeks, at least, must be devoted to the purpose, and the men must be taught in camps of discipline, those duties which, representing a faithful image of actual war, form the best school in which it can be taught.

"I have recommended camps of discipline for instructing those who are already capable of bearing arms; but the career of military instruction for our youth should commence as soon as their mental and bodily powers have acquired sufficient strength. Professorships of tactics should be established in all our seminaries, and even the amusements of the children should resemble the gymnasia of the Greeks.

"It will, no doubt, be urged as a reason for continuing the old plan, that the poorer class of our citizens cannot spare five or six weeks in a year from their farms to learn military duty I know that they cannot without being paid. But is not our Government able to pay them? If not, they ought to make themselves so by laying on additional taxes. But I am persuaded that the money which is devoted to other objects might be more usefully, and certainly more consistently, applied to this purpose. Under our present circumstances the six thousand regular troops we have are very proper; but I think one hundred thousand disciplined militia would be better, and the money which is spent in the former, would soon effect the discipline of the latter.

"WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON."

SPEECH OF MR. RAMSEY,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, Saturday, June 6, 1840—On the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. RAMSEY rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The bill under consideration has been so fully discussed, that I can scarcely hope to influence the deliberations of the committee by better or sounder arguments than have already been advanced. But, as a Representative of the people, holding an important trust, and accountable to a generous and confiding constituency for its proper discharge, a sense of duty to myself impels me to ask indulgence whilst I briefly assign the reasons that govern my action in relation to this great financial measure.

The law presented to us for adoption is plain and simple. It proposes the establishment of depositaries for the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public moneys, at different points in the Union, in the legal currency of the country. In other words, the bill provides for the separation of the Government from the banks, and requires the collection and disbursement of the revenues in gold and silver, instead of paper.

It will be perceived at once that an important change is contemplated in the fiscal action of the Government, and, as it is my intention to point out the advantages likely to result from the adoption of this system, it will be necessary, from the intimate connection of the subject with the operations of banks, that I should recur to their history, for the purpose of exhibiting the legitimate influence exercised by them over industry, commerce, and the affairs of State.

Banks are usually divided into two great classes—banks of deposite and banks of circulation. The term banks of deposite is meant to designate those that keep the money of individuals, and circulate it only; while the term bank of circulation is applied to those that do not thus confine their circulation, but issue notes of their own, payable on demand. The Bank of Venice seems to have been the first banking establishment in Europe. It was founded so early as 1171, and subsisted till the subversion of the Republic in 1797. It was essentially a deposite bank, and nothing else. The Bank of Amsterdam was established in 1659. It was a deposite bank, and payments were made (according to authors) by writing off sums from the account of one individual to those of another. According to the principles on which this bank was established, it should have had at all times in its coffers, bullion equal to the full amount of the claims upon it. But the directors privately lent 10,500,000 florins to the States of Holland and Friesland. This circumstance transpired when the French invaded Holland, and caused the ruin of the bank. The Bank of Hamburg is a deposite bank, and its affairs are managed according to a system that ensures the fullest publicity. Thus the Banks of Venice, Amsterdam, and Hamburg, were all simply banks of deposite; and the Bank of Hamburg continues such to the present hour. The Bank of France was founded in 1803. The exclusive privilege of issuing notes payable to bearer was granted to it for forty years. The capital of the bank consisted at first of 45,000,000 francs, but it was subsequently increased to 90,000,000 francs. The only notes issued are for five hundred francs, and one thousand francs. The Bank of England was founded in 1694. It was established upon a loan of £1,200,000 to the Government. In 1708, the Bank, having advanced an additional sum of £400,000 for the public service, the charter was continued, and the capital increased to £4,402,343. It subsequently became £15,000,000. This institution issues bills, receives deposites, and discounts. As a consequence, its history presents a series of expansions and contractions, with all their attendant ills. It has frequently been affected by panics amongst the holders of its notes. In 1745, the alarm occasioned by the advance of the Highlanders under the Pretender, as far as Derby, led to a run upon the Bank; and in order to gain time to concert measures for averting the consequences, the directors adopted the device of paying in shillings and sixpences. In 1792, an overissue of paper caused another run upon the Bank; and on the 25th of February, 1797, it had only £1,272,000 of cash and bullion in its coffers, with every prospect of a violent run taking place. In this emergency, an order of council was issued on the 26th, prohibiting the directors from paying their notes in specie. Early in 1810, the paper of the Bank was at a discount of thirteen and one-half per cent.; and this extraordinary fall having attracted the attention of the legislature, the House of Commons appointed a committee to inquire into the circumstances by which it had been occasioned. The report, which was drawn up with great ability, justly ascribed the fall to the overissue of bank paper, and recommended that the Bank should be obliged speedily to resume specie payments. It did subsequently resume. On the 15th October, 1839, this Bank had notes in circulation, and deposites, to the amount of twenty-four millions of pounds sterling, and but two millions five hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds in specie in its vaults, showing a proportion of about ten to one between its liabilities and bullion. As a consequence, it was upon the eve of suspension, and was obliged to resort to the Bank of France for a loan.

It is very true that the Bank of England conducts the whole banking business of the British Government. "It acts not only," says Dr. Smith, "as an ordinary bank, but as a great engine of State. It receives and pays the greater part of the annuities, which are due to the creditors of the public, it circulates exchequer bills, and it advances to Government the annual amount of the land and malt taxes, which are frequently not paid till some years thereafter." This Bank advanced to the British Government, in 1814, £30,000,000; in 1815, £26,000,000; in 1816, £23,000,000; in 1817, £27,000,000; and in 1818, £23,000,000. In point of fact, however, a very large part of these advances has been nominal only, or, what has been the same thing, has been virtually cancelled by the balances of the public money in the hands of the Bank. Thus, from 1806 to 1810, both inclusive, (says, McCullogh,) the average advances to the Government amounted to £14,000,000. But the average balance of the public money in possession of the Bank during the same period, amounted to about £11,000,000, so that the real advance was equal only to the difference between these two sums, or to about £3,500,000. The Bank being enabled to employ the greater part of the balances of public money in her hands as capital, they have formed one of the main sources of the profit she has derived from her transactions. It will thus be perceived that the charter of the Bank of England was built upon the necessities of the Government, and, in fact, exacted for a loan of £1,200,000, subsequently confirmed by another bonus in the shape of a loan, and at the present time she continue the agent of the Crown, in the manner of an exacting creditor towards a spendthrift debtor.

This is a hasty glance at some of the principal banking establishments of Europe. Until a very late period, however, commerce and the arts seem to have flourished almost wholly without the aid of these institutions. Egypt, under Alexander and the Ptolemies, became the emporium of the world. Phœnicia, with a sterile soil and a confined dominion, built up the magnificent cities of Sidon and Tyre, "whose merchants were princes, and whose traffickers were the honorable of the earth." Carthage, the proud rival of Rome, owed her greatness to the frugality and industry of her citizens, combined with an extensive commerce. Venice, the humble owner of a few insignificant islands in the Adriatic, became the mistress of the seas, and at one period, besides several extensive, populous, and well cultivated provinces in Lombardy, was possessed of Crete, Cyprus, the greater part of the Morea, and most of the islands in Ægean Sea. She had also secured a chain of forts and fortifications that extend along the coast of Greece from the Morea to Dalmatia. In the beginning of the fifteenth century, the annual value of the goods exported from Venice by sea, exclusive of those exported to the States adjoining her provinces in Lombardy, was estimated by cotemporary writers at 10,000,000 ducats; the profits of the out and home voyage, including freight, being estimated at 4,000,000 ducats. At the period in question, the Venetian shipping consisted of 3000, from 100 to 200 tons burthen, carrying 17,000 sailors; 300 ships with 8,000 sailors, and 45 galleys of various size, kept afloat by the republic, for the protection of her trade, having 11,000 men on board. In the dock yard, 16,000 laborers were usually employed. Their trade seems to have been conducted principally by ready money. So completely were the pretensions of Venice to the sovereignty of the Adriatic maintained, that when, in the year 1630, just before the conclusion of the Mantuan war, a princess of the Spanish dynasty wished to pass by sea from Naples to Trieste, to espouse the son of the Emperor, the Senate refused to allow the Spanish squadron to escort her, as an infringement upon their right of excluding every foreign armament from the gulf; but they gallantly offered their own fleet for her service. The Spanish Government at first rejected the offer, but the Venetians, says Giannone, boldly declared that if the Spaniards were resolved to prefer a trial of force to their friendly proposal, the infanta must fight her way to her wedding through fire and smoke. The haughty court of Madrid was compelled to yield; and the Venetian Admiral Antonio Pisani, then gave the Princess a convoy in splendid bearing to Trieste with a squadron of light galleys. Such was Venice without the assistance of paper money; Venice for whom the whole habitable globe was ransacked, for whom the caravans of the East were continually in march, and whose ships covered the remotest seas.

Genoa, the city of palaces, rivalled Venice in her extensive commercial enterprises. Portugal, Spain, and Holland, afterwards successively contended for the trident of the ocean, carrying on the trade of the world, causing obscure fishing villages to rise by degrees into splendor and magnificence, and pouring the wealth of the Indies into their coffers, almost wholly through the medium of hard money.

At the present day, have we not a continuation of this commercial system to a great extent in almost every country on the face of the globe? In Russia, Austria, Prussia, the German and Italian States, France, Spain, Portugal, and Holland, there is but an insignificant circulation of bank paper, when compared with that of Great Britain and the United States; indeed, in some of these countries, and gold and silver is the only currency recognised, and yet the condition of Holland has always been more prosperous than that of any other nation, as history will prove, in despite of their limited territory and the unproductiveness of the soil. In 1690, Sir William Pelty estimated the shipping of Europe at about 2,000,000 of tons, which he supposed to be distributed as follows: England, 500,000; France, 100,000; Hamburg, Denmark, Sweden, and Dantzic, 250,000; Spain, Portugal, and Italy, 250,000; that of the Seven United Provinces, amounting to 900,000 tons, or to nearly one-half of the whole tonnage of Europe! The foreign commerce and navigation of Holland during the seventeenth century was, of course, greater than that of all Europe besides; and even at this present moment, after being trodden under foot by the invasion of hostile armies, the Dutch are amongst the most commercial and opulent people of the world. Their territory not larger than one of our smallest States, reclaimed in a great measure from the sea, sustains a population of 2,000,000, has maintained wars of a bitter and sanguinary character against the most powerful kingdoms, and has been enabled to loan hundreds of millions to foreigners, after constructing her immense dykes and canals. Holland is, and always has been, a country of short credit; and, in consequence of the preference given (says a distinguished writer) to ready money transactions, it is not a country in which adventurers without capital have much chance of speedily making a fortune: but this austerity is not a disadvantage, but the reverse. It prevents commerce from degenerating, as it has too often done in other places, into gambling adventures, and places it on a comparatively solid foundation. And it should be mentioned to the honor of the Dutch, and as a proof of the excellence of this system, that, notwithstanding the distress and loss of trade occasioned by the invasion and occupation of their country by the French, the bankruptcies in 1795, and subsequent years, were not, comparatively, so numerous as in England in ordinary seasons! Holland, too, has always maintained free institutions, and was the first to sympathize with us in our Revolutionary struggle.

From these historical reminiscences, it may be inferred that long credits are not necessary to trade, and that despotic countries are not the only nations that carry on their commerce through the medium of gold and silver, as asserted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Cushing.]

Such is the dull and hazy atmosphere through which we are permitted to glance at the operations of banks, that their prerogative would seem to be ranked, like that of the King of England, amongst the arcana imperii, and their mysteries, like those of the bona dea, are not suffered to be pried into by vulgar mortals. With profound reverence, nevertheless, for the mighty power they wield, I purpose continuing my examination into the nature of these institutions, by the aid of the few glimmering lights I have before me.

It appears that, prior to the twelfth century, gold and silver constituted the currency of Europe; but at a still earlier epoch, cattle are mentioned by Homer, as the measure of value. He says the armor of Diomede cost only nine oxen, but that of Glaucus one hundred oxen. Salt is said to have been a common medium of exchange in Abyssinia; a species of shells in some parts of India; hides, or dressed leather, in other countries; iron in Sparta; and copper amongst the Romans. Money, however, being the standard or measure by which the worth of all other commodities is estimated, it being essential, too, that its own value should be invariable, and the precious metals possessing this quality to greater perfection than any other commodities, they were adopted by civilized nations. Paper (says a learned writer) possesses only conventional, not intrinsic value. Coin not only measures the value of commodities in exchange, but is the real equivalent for them; it is the veritable substance of which paper currency is only the representative. Whether paper money is worth any thing or not, depends on the guarantee under which it is issued; but coined money depends on no such contingency—it is its own guarantee, the universal medium of commerce, and in every market in the world will be accepted as an equivalent for merchandise in proportion to its weight and purity. Such conditions do not attach to a currency of paper. A parcel of bank notes, if they are not valuable as money, are valuable as nothing. No one can make a profit by converting them into any thing else. If the bank becomes worthless that issued them, they become worthless too, and they cannot be transmuted into any thing of value. It is different with a piece of gold or silver; if it cannot be returned to the mint, it can be taken to the goldsmith or dealer, where it can be exchanged for coin of another sort, or for some article of use or ornament.

Until within these few years, banking and money making have been most improperly confounded. No two business, however, can be more distinct. One may be safely left to individual competition, the other can only be safely confided to the State. The chief business of a banking establishment is to expedite the making of payments, to discount bills, to make advances by loan, and to form a secure deposite for cash. The object of money making is very different; it is to establish an invariable standard of value for the general convenience of the community; and this is a duty it is incumbent on the Government to discharge, as itis for it to establish a standard weight, or a standard measure of length and capacity. What confusion and mischief would ensue if these were left to the caprice of individuals, more especially if they had an interest in gradually elongating the yard or enlarging the bushel, and then again, without notice or responsibility, restoring them to their former dimensions. The consequences have been precisely similar in leaving banks to issue money, or its representative, without check, security or responsibility.

The most essential requisite in money is stability in value. Where the power to issue is vested, is vested the power to alter its value, to alter the rate of wages, and the terms of contracts. Can a power so universal in its operation, touching every one, from the richest to the poorest, be safely wielded by any other authority less than that of the State, whose interests, it may be supposed, are not partial, but identified with those of the whole community? In the management of our monetary system, there has been singular inconsistency. The guarantee of the value of the coinage is the purity and weight of the bullion it contains, and the public stamp impressed upon it, authenticates both. But a banker's note, which represents the coin, executes all its functions, and on which a profit is realized, has been suffered to circulate without any other guarantee than a promise, that might be valid or illusive, according to the folly or knavery, good or ill fortune of the issuer.

The profit arising from the issue of a national currency should not be conferred by acts of legislation upon private corporations. Is there any reason that the bankers should share the whole, or any portion of this revenue, any more than the manufacturers, farmers or merchants? Most assuredly not; it is not a commercial profit, arising from the risk and trouble of buying and selling commodities—it is a perquisite appertaining to the people in their national capacity. The privilege of making and issuing money is one of the oldest prerogatives of State; it may be delegated, but it never can be alienated, and forms a legitimate source of public income, not of individual emolument.

But the bill under discussion does not propose any restrictions upon commerce or the banks, as has been alleged. It simply provides for the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the revenues of the Government, which no one will pretend to say should be converted into capital for speculation, either in trade or banking. The bill maintains the principle that the money of the public is to be held sacred—that it is to be set apart for the support of Government, and is not to be diverted into other channels? Is there any thing wrong in this? Are we violating any privilege belonging to individuals or corporations? No. But the argument is, that under its operations commerce and the banks will be prostrated, and the wages of labor reduced. I meet this issue most fearlessly, and will prove conclusively that no such results can ensue. I deny that sound trade or legitimate commerce can be injured by the passage of this law. It is true that a check may be given to the ruinous expansions and contractions of the banks, and to the insane system of gambling that has characterized the trafficings of our merchants; but this salutary effect will, in a great measure, be unfelt, in consequence of the antecedent operation of the natural laws of trade, which have, within the last year, reduced the bank circulation of the country from $135,000,000 to $106,000,000, and, as a consequence, ruined thousands of those, who, without capital, and prompted by a vain desire of suddenly amassing wealth, embarked most rashly on the wide sea of speculation, without compass or chart to guide them in their perilous navigation. It seems, however, inherent in man to censure the whole world, rather than himself, for the misfortunes that result from his own stupidity, folly, or ignorance; and whilst the unerring principles of political economy point out the causes that have produced disasters that ought to have been foreseen by every well regulated mind, gentlemen shut their eyes to self-evident truths, and continue to quaff intoxication and delusion from the Circean cup. The Administration is denounced for all the disappointments that have resulted from multitudinous speculations in town lots, wild lands, and foreign merchandise, whilst the United States Bank and its thousand auxiliaries repose on the laurels they have achieved, contended that the Government shall be made responsible for every species of swindling and extortion practised under the "broad seals" of their charters.

We are gravely informed that the country never suffered pecuniary embarrassment to the same extent with that which now weighs upon her. This may be so, but the magnitude of a present evil is always felt at the moment to be greater than that which preceded it, and I deny that such is the fact. For the last twenty-five years the history of the United States has presented but one continued series of expansions and contractions by the banks, followed periodically by distress and commercial prostration. Even at the close of the Revolutionary war, when relief was sought from the disasters of the continental currency, we discover the issue raised by the illustrious Washington between paper money and specie, in a letter to a member of the Legislature of Maryland, in which he declares his hostility to bank bills as the "shadow and not the substance" of a sound currency. In 1814, that wise and virtuous statesman, Simon Snyder, Governor of Pennsylvania, being importuned by the Legislature of that State to co-operate with them in the passage of a law creating forty-one new banks, with a capital of seventeen and a half millions of dollars, for the benefit, as was asserted, of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, responded as follows, in a message to the two Houses:

"The bill entitled an act to regulate banks, was presented to me for my approbation on the 9th inst. I have given to its consideration all the faculties of my mind, and the feelings of my heart, and regret to say that my conviction of duty to the community will not permit me to approve of its passage into a law. I cannot divest myself of the fear that its passage would tend only to enrich the wealthy and the speculator, while it would, in various forms, heap burdens on the poor and industrious.

"I ask a patriotic Legislature, is this an auspicious era to try so vast an experiment? Shall we increase this pressure? Shall we individually aid our internal and external enemies to destroy our funds, and embarrass the Government? Is there at this time an intelligent man in Pennsylvania who believes that a bank note of any description is the representative of specie? Is there not just ground for fear? I may confidently say, that industry is the only permanent source of wealth; it secures subsistence, and advances our interest by slow, yet sure and regular gains, and is the best preservative of morals. Not so speculation, which this bill seems to invite. It has the direct contrary effect; depending on no fixed principle, it opens a field for the exercise of ingenuity, ever on the alert to take advantage of unwary in the accidental variations of things. The success of the speculator by profession tempts the farmer and mechanic to forsake his accustomed honest pursuits: launched on the wild sea of speculation, ever exposed to deviations from rectitude, his moral principles become weakened, and eventually all sense of commutative justice is destroyed."

Thus do we find Governor Snyder forewarning his countrymen of the disasters that were to follow the creation of this swarm of new banks. The bill, however, was passed into a law by the constitutional majority of two-thirds of the Legislature, and, in addition, two years afterwards, the Bank of the United States was chartered. The prostration and embarrassment that ensued is thus described in a report of a committee of the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, made through their chairman, William J. Duane, on the 28th of January, 1820:

"As to the extent of the distress, it might be answered, in the language of the resolutions under which your committee act, that it is general; it extends, indeed, to the pursuits and habitations of the former capitalist, as well as to those of the more humble farmer and mechanic; there is no part of the Commonwealth into which calamity has not penetrated, or in which numerous victims have not been found. But with regard to the extent of the loss which the State has suffered from the destruction of capital, the emigration of our citizens to the wilderness, the stagnation of business, the deterioration of landed property, and the prostration of manufactories, and, above all, in the change of the moral character of many of our citizens by the presence of distress, your committee are utterly unable to decide; the extent of the mischief, they believe, defies scrutiny and surpasses the power of calculation.

"From the numerous petitions which have been presented at the present session, your committee quote the following extracts, which describe scenes of distress, such as have been seldom, if ever, before beheld on this side of the Atlantic:

"Sundry citizens of Northumberland county declare—

"'The currency is so diminished as scarcely to suffice for the transaction of the most ordinary business; the produce of the country has met with an unprecedented reduction; the greater part of the citizens of this once flourishing Commonwealth, even with the utmost economy and industry, are scarcely able to obtain sufficient articles to sustain life; real and personal property are daily sacrificed, and become the prey of speculators; debts are unpaid, creditors are dissatisfied, and the prisons are crowded with honest, but unfortunate persons, whose wives and children must be a burden on the township, or suffer for want of the mere necessaries of life.'

"Sundry citizens of Wayne county represent—

"'From the fall of every kind of produce, the scarcity of the circulating medium, and other causes, the general distress in our part of the State hath become so great and alarming, as to call for the attention and wisdom of the Legislature. Our most industrious citizens are no longer able to meet their engagements, but their hard-earned property is daily sacrificed at a nominal value, and falling into the hands of a few speculators.'

"Sundry inhabitants of Pike county assert—

"'At no time, since the Revolution, has greater distress been felt than at the present moment. We consider the banking system to have been the principal cause, instead of becoming, as was predicted, blessings to the people, banks have become like the scorpions among the children of Israel, perfect beasts of prey. The property of the great portion of our industrious people is brought to sale at one-fourth of its value, and struck off to speculators, leaving honest creditors unpaid, and families reduced to beggary.'

"Sundry inhabitants of Huntingdon county represent—

"'That the mass of the people are utterly unable, at once, to pay their debts; that their property is selling at such rates, that even the fees of law-officers are not realized; that the industrious are impoverished, whilst the speculating part of the community are daily growing more wealthy; that the evil is only beginning, and demands legislative interposition.'

"A memorial from sundry citizens of the western parts of the State, asserts—

"'That embarrassment is universal; that the sordid and avaricious are acquiring the sacrificed property of the liberal and industrious; that so much property is exposed to sale under execution, that buyers cannot be had to pay more for it than the fees or the officers; that those mischiefs, instead of diminishing, are daily increasing, and that overtrading and the facility of getting credit have produced these effects.'

"The petition of the inhabitants of Fayette county represents—

"'That the fictitious capital and boundless credit extended by banking, the almost universal spirit of speculation, the prostration of manufactures by the mistaken policy of the national Government, the introduction of luxuries and extravagances, and a reduction of exports, have produced a long train of calamities: that industry is paralyzed—that the precious metals have vanished—that the banks are tottering—that litigation is unprecedented in extent, and ruinous in its effects—that many merciless creditors, not content with plunging unfortunate debtors into the most abject poverty, frequently take from them the whole of that property to themselves, which in better times would pay the sums due to all, leaving the unfortunate debtor in jail, and his family in misery.'

"These are but a few of the extracts, which might be presented to the House, and placed upon the journal: but these are deemed sufficient, accompanied by the remark, that these representations are not only supported by all the other petitions presented at this session, but by the testimony of the members of the Legislature, coming themselves from all quarters of the State."

The committee then give a short sketch of the commercial history of the country, after which they say—

"In defiance of all experience, and in contempt of warnings almost prophetic, which were given to them at the time, the people of Pennsylvania, during an expensive war, and in the midst of great embarrassments, established forty one new banks with a capital of seventeen and a half million of dollars, and authority to issue bank notes to double that amount! In consequence of this most destructive measure, the inclination of a large part of the people, created by past prosperity, to live by speculation and not by labor, was greatly increased: a spirit in all respects akin to gambling prevailed: a fictitious value was given to all descriptions of property: specie was driven from circulation, as if by common consent, and all efforts to restore society to its natural condition, were treated with undisguised contempt."

"These remarks are followed by a short view of operations subsequent to the war, after which, the committee declare 'A new measure, however, remained to be adopted, that was really to close the last scene in the drama of error: the currency had already nearly vanished, but was temporarily restored on the seabord. The enormity of fictitious credit began to be felt: the abusive extent of paper issues was about to effect its own remedy in the State, when Congress created a corporation, with authority to circulate upwards of one hundred millions of a new paper medium—a corporation spreading its branches over the Union, with a baneful influence of the fabled Upas.

"'Awakened by the quick succession of events so disastrous, from the dream of perpetual prosperity under which they had so long been entranced, the people now find themselves involved in distresses, against which no provision had been made, and from which, they allege, they can find no refuge but in legislative interference.'"

Mr. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in a communication to Congress about the same period, gives an unvarnished picture of the effects produced by an inflated paper circulation.

"Poverty and distress," says he, "are impending over the heads of most of those who have attempted to improve their farms by the aid of bank credits. So general is this distress, that the principle attention of the State Legislatures, where the evil exists, is at this moment directed to the adoption of measures calculated to rescue their fellow citizens from the inevitable effects of their own indiscretion. The general system of credit which has been introduced through the agency of banks, brought home to every man's door, has produced a fictitious state of things extremely adverse to the sober, frugal, and industrious habits, which ought to be cherished in a republic. In the place of these virtues, extravagance, idleness, and the spirit of gambling adventure, have been engendered and fostered by our institutions."

The same report states that within three years the currency of the United States had been reduced from $110,000,000 to $45,000,000, and the value of property consequently diminished more than one-half; this, too, in the face of the Bank of the United States.

In 1824, Mr. Clay thus speaks of the financial condition of the country:

"In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstances which fix our attention, and challenge our deepest regret, is the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestable character. It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce: by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthreshed crops of grain, perishing in our barns and yards for want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes, but extending to all orders of society; by an universal complaint of the want of employment and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honors, and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the reluctant resort to the perilous use of PAPER MONEY; by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation of debtor and creditor; and above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of property of the nation which has, on an average, sunk not less than 50 per cent. within a few years.

"The truth is, that no class of society suffers more in the present stagnation of business than the laboring classes. That is a necessary defect of the depression of agriculture, the principal business of the community. The wages of able bodied men vary from $5 to $8 per month; and such has been the want of employment, in some parts of the Union, that instances have not been unfrequent, of men working for a mere subsistence. If the wages of labor here and in England are compared, they will be found not to be essentially different."

This portrait of distress and ruin was drawn by the Senator during the very climax of the power of the Bank of the United States.

I would inquire whether the misfortunes and calamities so minutely described in 1820 and 1824 were not of the same character with those now complained of? Whether banks, and banks alone, were not the powerful agents that blasted the industry of the husbandman, the mechanic, and merchant, reducing to insolvency and despair multitudes of honest and enterprising citizens? I now assert that the same causes have produced like results in 1838, 1839, and 1840, and I will prove the fact by the use of a few figures. According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, already referred to, the currency of the United States had been reduced in three years, preceding 1820, from $110,000,000 to $45,000,000; and in 1840 we discover that in one year anterior, the amount of bank circulation was contracted from $135,000,000 to $106,000,000. In both instances the sums of money withdrawn from the public use are astounding. In three years antecedent to 1820, it amounted to $55,000,000, or more than one half of the whole circulation, and in one year prior to 1840 it exceeded $33,000,000—nearly one-fourth of the sum total. Now it is plain to the most common understanding that if the currency of the country be reduced, property must fall in proportion to the reduction, and if it be increased, a rise of prices will ensue in the same ratio. Debts incurred will be made easy by expansion, and will again become the sources of ruin and insolvency through contraction. A farmer, for instance, who, in 1815, when the banks inundated the country with their paper, and the circulating medium was $110,000,000, purchased a farm for $10,000 and paid $5,000 in cash, would, in 1820, still be in debt, in reality, more than the original amount of $10,000, and would be a bankrupt into the bargain, his debt being more than doubled, and his property depreciated more than one half by the decline of the currency to $43,000,000, as the following table of the price of the best improved land in Pennsylvania, at three different periods, will show. The second column gives the price the land bore in the height of the speculation, which was in different counties in different years, as the banks extended their operations into them.

Bedford,	$30 to 40	80 to 100 (1815)	20 to 30

This may be said to be the practical result of banking, according to the American system—inflation, expansion, and ephemeral prosperity one day—contraction, expansion, ruin, and despondency the next.

As the National Government could not avert the evils of 1820 and 1824, neither can the present Administration control the wild career of the banks, without some new constitutsonal provision. This bill, however, by creating an additional demand for gold and silver to the amount of five millions of dollars, as it is estimated, will cause a larger portion of the precious metals to circulate, to the exclusion of paper, and will, pro tanto, restrain the emissions of the banks. These institutions being held in check by the fear of a demand upon them for specie, will confine their operations within more reasonable limits, but there is not the most remote probability that the measure will destroy a single sound bank in the country. On the other hand, it is to be feared it will not control, as far as could be desired, the profligate and lawless peculations of insolvent corporations. But in checking foreign importations, which, in some measure, it will undoubtedly do, the country will be most essentially benefited.

After the year 1843, gold and silver will be required in payment of all the revenues of the United States. The merchant, instead of importing on the credit of the Government, will be obliged to pay the custom-house dues in cash. This will teach him prudence and circumspection, and will drive out of market the host of British agents and speculators, who, after hawking their merchandise around the world, usually throw the refuse into the auction marts of New York; and upon the duties due on this trash, establish a capital for the purpose of competing with the American manufacturer, and underselling him at his own door.

But we are gravely told that the passage of this bill will diminish the wages of labor. We are moreover assured that the industrious classes are entirely dependent upon the banks and capitalists for employment, and that any action on our part in restraining the use of the public revenues by private individuals and corporations, will fall upon the humble citizens who live by the sweat of the brow. A recurrence, however, to the commercial history of the country will prove, that of all classes who have suffered from the profligacy, ignorance, and recklessness of those who are associated with the banks, the laboring men have had by far the greater share of misfortune. Above all others in the community, they have the least to do with banks; they receive few or no discounts; they are never stockholders of directors; and as their income is limited, it is to them all important that it should be certain, and in the legal currency, the subsistence of their families depending entirely upon it. A fixed currency would enable the laborer to compute his amount of earnings at all times, and also to estimate the cost of provisions and merchandise. It would also secure to him steady employment. But what has been his fate under the dominion of the banks? Have these institutions enabled him to obtain work at all seasons, and and a certain return for it? By no means. Whilst prices have been stimulated by expansions, wages have usually remained the same. The celebrated bullion report of a committee of the House of Commons, says: the rate of "the wages of common country labor, it is well known, adapts itself more slowly to the changes which happen in the value of money than the price of any other species of labor or commodity;" and, according to Adam Smith, "the wages of labor do not, in Great Britain, fluctuate with the price of provisions. These vary every where from year to year—frequently from month to month. But in many places the money price of labor remains uniformly the same, sometimes for half a century together." In 1795, in England, the price of wheat, which for three years preceding had averaged fifty-four shillings per quarter, rose to seventy-four shillings a quarter, and as wages continued stationary, the distress of the poor was great. The working man discovers all the articles necessary for the subsistence of his family raising in price, whilst the money rate of his wages remains the same; consequently, his income is diminished in proportion to the advance of rents, store goods, and provisions, by bank expansions. The laborer not living upon money, but upon the necessaries that money will buy, it follows that wages are high or low, not according to their nominal or money amount, but according to the amount of provisions they will purchase, or, in other words, according to the command they give the laborer over the food, clothing, and lodging, conducive to his comfort and maintenance.

Speculative combinations, to improve the condition of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, may for a time be favorable to the industrious orders, by tending to enhance wages and profits; but a revulsion throws the laboring man out of employment, and, a competition for work naturally ensuing, the wages of those who are not in a state of idleness are at once reduced: and, if a bank unfortunately breaks in the mean time, the working classes will be found to possess the largest portion of the bills, and will be the greatest sufferers.

High prices and usurious rates or interest are not the evidences of the prosperity of any country. They merely establish the fact of the increase of the currency, and the nominal rates at which houses, lands, and provisions are sold, and do not change the relation of these things to one another, by which, in truth, their value is to be estimated. I will illustrate this by the simple proposition, that, if the circulating medium of the country be raised from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000, you double the money price of every commodity. A farm, for instance, worth $10,000, will be estimated at $20,000, and an adjoining grist mill, of the value of $20,000 will sell for $40,000. The relative position, however, of the farmer and miller will not be changed, nor the real value of their land and houses altered. The nominal price of the miller's property is doubled, it is true; so is that of the farmer. The nominal price of both mill and farm is twice as great as it was; that is all, and the owners have the same relative command of money and property as before. Thus an increase of money does not add value to land, any more than an elongation of yardsticks would enhance the intrinsic value of broadcloth, both being merely measures, one of value, and the other of length. Commodities would advance with the increase of the yard measure, or fall by its contraction, in the same way that they rise or decline by an inflation or reduction of the currency. But amidst all these changes, where is the poor laborer? He gets his dollar a day, perhaps, through every mutation, and pays two dollars for articles that he could formely command for one. He remains upon mother earth, whilst the paper balloon carries all other classes to the clouds. He beholds in amazement the bursting of the bubble, and is still more astonished to find himself, although standing almost isolated and alone, involved in the general calamity.

But it is asserted that this bill will increase the patronage of the Executive. I inquire when, where, or how? for, truly, if any measure ever tied up the hands of a public officer effectually; this is the law. It strips the President of the unbounded control he possessed over a host of banks, and an army of cashiers and directors. It deprives him of between eighty and ninety depositories, and confines him to five or six, with a few superintendents and clerks. It takes from him the use of the public treasure, and brands a future loan from the coffers of the nation as a felony. If this be increasing the power of the Executive, I shall hereafter be a firm believer in the magical virtues of hard cider, in making clear the mental faculties of my fellow-citizens.

We are to have a despotism, too, under this law. The President is to become a tyrant, and like the Autocrat of all the Russias, will wield both the "purse and the sword." We are gravely told these things in broad daylight by gentlemen who claim the merit of at least being rational, if they are not sober. Now, what power has the President under this law? Can he declare war? Can he make peace? Can he "set a single squadron in the field," or appropriate a dollar from the Treasury, without the consent of this House? Certainly not; but when unlimited sway was likely to have been given to him here, in appropriating to his discretionary use ten millions of dollars and fifty thousand armed troops, who tendered him "the purse and the sword" then?

[Here Mr. WISE exclaimed, this is a home thrust; they deserve it, and I told them so.]

Where were the numerous Whig gentlemen whom I have under my eye? Where was the gentleman from North Carolina?

[Mr. STANLY rose and said that he had voted for the bill referred to under the exigencies of the case, for which he had been abused by the friends of the Administration in his own district; but tha he had no fear of Mr. Van Buren for the future as he would not be re-elected.]

Mr. R. replied that he did not impeach the motives of the gentleman from North Carolina; he had acted correctly in casting that vote, and he was sorry that any one should censure him; but after his party had invested the President with unheard of power, they should not now attempt to frighten us with this phantom, which, like the hobgoblins in fairy tales, would serve only to alarm old women or children; and as to the probable result of the next election, he would tell gentlemen that accounts from all quarters confirmed him in the opinion, that Mr. Van Buren was as likely to wield "the purse and the sword" with the same moderation and honorable bearing under this bill, as he had heretofore done under the act which gave him millions of money, and thousands of men, to use at his pleasure.

SPEECH OF MR. HILLEN,

OF MARYLAND.

In the House of Representatives, June 12, 1840.—In favor of the repeal of the act of Congress of March 2d, 1837, for regulating pilots.

Mr. HILLEN wished to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from New York. They were rendered necessary from the position in which he was placed: a position not of his own selection. When this subject was first referred to the Committee on Commerce, the chairman [Mr. CURTIS] in distributing the labors of the committee, assigned, notwithstanding his objections, the examination of this question to him. He expressed his desire that it should be committed to the care of some other gentleman, but as the chairman urged it upon him, he consented; being unwilling to appear reluctant in performing his proportion of the duties of the committee.

In undertaking that charge, he was well aware of the difficulties that might arise in case his views did not coincide with those of the New York delegation, all of whom are now advocating the continuance of a law which he is anxious to repeal. But having been forced into an examination of the question, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] must excuse him, if he followed the dictates of his own judgment, founded upon the law and the facts, in preference to the opinion of that gentleman, based, as he would endeavor to show, upon mere assertions and assumptions.

At this stage of the discussion it was also necessary to place himself in a proper attitude before the House, by an unequivocal denial of the charge of favoring combinations and monopolies. Such were not his principles nor the principles of the party with whom he was associated. In the course of his remarks, he would satisfactorily prove, that a repeal of the act of Congress of 1837 would have no such tendency—that the law of New York expressly prohibits, under penalty, any combination; and that under its provisions no monopoly can exist. If he succeeded in this, he felt assured that neither the gentleman from New York, nor any of his colleagues, would longer oppose the repeal of this unjust if not unconstitutional enactment.

The morning hour having expired, Mr. HILLEN here suspended his remarks.

On Thursday Mr. HILLEN resumed:

Mr. SPEAKER: Yesterday, by the concession of the gentleman from New York, it clearly appeared that I did not obtrude into the business under discussion as a volunteer. I took charge of the memorials of the pilots with reluctance; but having once consented to investigate the subject, I did, what must certainly have been expected, perform the duty assigned with earnestness and assiduity. My zeal—which I feel to be a duty imperatively incumbent on me—should not subject my motives to unfair imputations. I am actuated by no hostile feelings towards the merchants. For them I have always entertained the highest respect; and representing in part the mercantile interest of Baltimore, I cannot but feel the strongest anxiety for their prosperity. To protect and promote those interests, I have always evinced a solicitude, when I could do so consistently with the interests of other professions, and with the welfare of the country. I ask no favors or immunities from the House for the pilots of New York, or of any other place; I merely demand for them an equitable protection—such protection as is consistent with the rights of other portions of the community, and with the true interests of the State. I do not ask that the New York pilots should receive the sanction or protection of Congress for neglect or dereliction of duty; but that they may not be subjected to unequal and oppressive restrictions. I ask only the repeal of the act of Congress of 1837, which, partial in its legislation, and the offspring of hasty and excited action, was unjust in its origin, and was immediately rendered unnecessary by the judicious enactment of the New York Legislature. I ask that the whole matter may be restored to the situation in which it was left by the act of 1789; and that it should remain as it was then, subject wholly to the control of the States. Under the old system, little or no dissatisfaction was any where exhibited; the alteration is not equally exempt from censure.

The matter under discussion, though in its results of general interest, having been accidentally rendered of a character purely local, probably has not attracted the degree of attention which its intrinsic merits deserve; and therefore a brief history of the law regulating pilots may be necessary.

In 1789, Congress conceded the power of legislating on this subject to the several States, resigning all jurisdiction over it, establishing them agents, and empowering them to legislate thereafter. Things thus remained from 1789 to 1837, a space of nearly a half a century—the Legislatures of the States exercising beneficially, through this long lapse of time, the whole control of their respective pilots, without the interposition of Congress. During the whole of this period, as far as the documentary evidence within my reach informs me, no complaints were ever made to the State Legislatures. All at once, memorials were presented to Congress, decrying the pilots of New York, and denouncing their negligence and inactivity. Whence originated this sudden revolution? Whence arose a storm so unexpected and so violent, after a calm of a duration so protracted? The loss of the Bristol and the Mexico, on the coast of New York, gave birth to the law of Congress, and simultaneously to an act of the New York Legislature. Here the point at issue between the gentleman from New York and myself is, how far blame is justly attributable to the pilots for the loss of those two vessels.

[Mr. CURTIS here explained, that, in his remarks, he had expressly waived the charge against the New York pilots. He had not attributed any blame to them in this instance, as, had he thought proper to do so, he would have produced evidence.]

Mr. H. resumed. From the debates in the committee room, Mr. Speaker, I have always understood that the neglect of the pilots was the alleged cause of the loss of those two vessels. I give my meed of compliment to the ingenuity which can urge those arguments in the privacy of a committee, to bias the opinions of its members, which it evades employing in public, and before the country: there is prudence in not again assuming a position which experience has proved untenable. Thoughtless excitement and ill-judged sympathy have been exerted, too successfully, to rouse popular indignation against the pilots. It is judicious and politic not to reiterate the charges, lest an opportunity should at last be afforded for their refutation. It would not be wise, after all the violence of invective against them, to elicit inquiry into the slanders engendered by prejudice and propogated by malignity. But how does it happen that the gentleman now declines charging the wreck of the Mexico and Bristol to the pilots? Whence this new born sympathy? Whence this infusion of leniency? Does it originate from pure, unsophisticated kindness to the pilots, or is it because he has at length, though late, discovered that the accusation is founded upon falsehood, and cannot stand the test of careful and impartial scrutiny?

The gentleman asserts that I am mistaken when I suppose that no complaints were ever addressed to the Legislature of New York against the pilots, prior to 1837. Be it so; the cause I am defending will suffer nothing by the concession. Policy may have dictated crimination; but the complaints having been discovered to be destitute of foundation, were wisely dismissed, without any attempt to correct imaginary evils. Since no legislative action was had favorable to the remonstrances, the inference is irresistible that the charges alleged were destitute of foundation. This conclusion is forced upon us by the respectability of the Legislature, as well as the solemn obligation controlling the action of its members. No complaints then were sufficient to attract public notice, or to obtain legislative interposition, until the press, in 1837, teemed with denunciations of the pilots, whose neglect, it was asserted, was the indirect cause of the disastrous loss of the two vessels so often figuring in the declamation of editors and orators. For the first time known to us in such a case, the interference of the grand jury was invoked. The subject of framing new regulations for the pilots had been, the gentleman asserts, a long time under consideration, but nothing decisive was effected until through the agency of the shock produced by those two wrecks. The fate of the two vessels was the enchanter which conjured into existence the law which I deem unjust; and therefore the conduct of the pilots, in relation to that affair, does, notwithstanding the caution evinced by the gentleman in avoiding the topic, form a requisite theme of investigation, and does constitute a preliminary point, at least, at issue between us. The very report of Mr. McKeon, who is said to have been instrumental in the passage of the law of 1837, which report the gentleman has quoted, proves that that law was hastily passed, amid the tumult of excitement and the hurry of a closing session—passed under the influence of agitating sympathies, and with none of that cautious deliberation which should distinguish legislation on matters affecting important interests of our citizens. Even when the law was proposed, objection was made to its passage simply on the ground that no time was allowed for investigating its merits.

In passing, I may remark that the honorable member from New York, if I might judge from the length of the extracts he made, placed great reliance on the authority of that report for the support of his own positions. But in his reading he exhibited the caution which he has manifested through the whole agitation of this question. He read as much as, when dissociated from the rest of the report, seemed to subserve his own purpose, and stopped very carefully just at the place, which would explain the preceding paragraph, and prove confessedly that Mr. McKeon did not accord exactly with the honorable Representative from the city of New York. If the authority of Mr. McKeon is of so much weight, as it seems to bear in the estimation of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, I shall read a short paragraph for his edification, commencing my reading just where he left off his. What says the report?

"The committee have fully considered the propriety of submitting some legislative provision to the decison of the House; but have concluded, that any attempt to interfere with the subject, especially at the present session, now rapidly approaching to a termination, would not be advisable. It would disturb the legislation of several States, and the regulations of all our ports; from all which, with but one exception, no complaint is made."

This passage, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce cautiously ommitted in his reading. It too clearly tells the mischiefs unavoidably emanating from hasty and partial legislation, on a subject so complex as the regulation of pilots; and explicitly recommends a postponement of action until time would permit a matured system of laws by the General Government.

But as the honorable chairman did not choose to read even thus far, he will pardon me, if I call the attention of the House, and his especially, to a part of a subsequent paragraph in the same report, which fully upholds the principles which I have advocated. It says:

"Congress in particular should leave with the States all matters which can be left under their guidance."

Above all, if Congress chooses to interfere in matters which have been conceded by its own act to the legislation of the States, its interference should be plenary, or none at all. It should either resume its rights in toto, or forbear all interposition. The lines between State and general legislation, should be kept distinctly marked. Nothing can be so dangerous to the rights of the States, as to suffer under any circumstances, or any pretence, the slightest amalgamation of the disperate jurisdiction of the co-ordinate authorities, governing the citizens of this country. Permit confusion once to be created, tolerate the supremacy of one to be merged in the legislation of the other, and the rights of the States will gradually, and imperceptibly lose their identity in centralism. If a divided empire is in danger, a divided legislation is dangerous. It is dangerous to the liberties of the citizens; anomalous in its aspect, and necessarily unequal in its operations. If there be but one object on which to legislate, there should in all wisdom be but one legislative action. For one result, there should be but one cause. The supposition of two causes for one effect, is unphilosophical in metaphysics; two law givers for one subject, is unwise in Government. You can't serve two masters.

The authority of Mr. McKeon, if it is to possess any influence, evidently is adverse to the position assumed by the gentleman himself. He deprecates hasty legislation on a subject so complicated, and is opposed to the interference of Congress in the matter. It would have been more just, had the wisdom of our fathers of 1789 been adopted as a model for imitation. But notwithstanding the reclamation contained in the report from which I have just read extracts, and which was made to the House on the 22d February, 1837, clamor and excitement succeeded on forcing a bill through both Houses by the beginning of March; the act having obtained Executive sanction on the 2d of that month. It was evidently the offspring of excitement, not of deliberation. Two disastrous shipwrecks had taken place; the loss of life and property was attributed to the negligence of the pilots, and some measures of coercion were deemed necessary to enforce more assiduous attention to their duty. The idea of any enactment by Congress arose purely from the supposed culpability of the pilots. Much eloquence was wasted on this apparently fruitful theme; but when declamation is disregarded and facts scrutinized, it appears that they were blamed without reason, and their negligence was in no way instrumental in causing those disasters. The pilots were at their posts; the disasters originated from the utter carelessness of the officers and crews of the vessels themselves. This assertion is not made without full evidence of its truth.

The gentleman has read a presentment of the grand jury of New York, on the subject of those wrecks; but with his usual controversial tact, has warily omitted some of the most important passages. I shall take the liberty to supply his omissions, and by so doing, show from the authority of the grand jury itself, that no blame can attach to the pilots. The decision pronounced by them is unquestionably entitled to more respect than vague declamation based upon rumor. What say the grand jury? "That they have felt themselves bound by the great excitement produced by the recent fatal shipwrecks in this vicinity, to inquire into the causes thereof, for the purpose of ascertaining how far they could be attributable to any culpable neglect on the part of the pilots of this port; and in the hope that such inquiry might, in any event, be conducive to the public good." Here you perceive that great excitement prevailed; and, amid the din, the pilots were condemed by the public without a hearing. But the grand jury, after a thorough examination of all the important facts, reached a result different from that which ignorance of the circumstances had impressed on the minds of the credulous." "It is evident," they say, "both in the case of the Bristol and Mexico, that their loss is not attributable to the wind, which was moderate and off shore; and the grand inquest feel bound to state their conviction, that both these casualties might have been avoided by the exercise of a suitable degree of caution on the part of the officers and crews of these vessels." Such is the decision of the grand jury. The wind was moderate and off shore; so that these vessels, it would appear, ran deliberately on their own destruction. The wind was not such as to drive them on shore; on the contrary, they were obliged to hold on their course against the wind, in order to accomplish the catastrophe. Had their officers furled all sail, they would have been wafted from the danger, without an effort. And yet, though the commanders of those vessels, by the plainest culpable negligence, sacrificed so many lives, and so much property—they must escape unscathed, while the pilots are made to bear the imputution of their guilt, and become the scape-goats for the sins of others.

But I will examine more minutely the cases of disasters which have been attributed to the delinquency of the pilots, when in neither case was there a pilot on board. The decision of the grand jury is clearly in their favor; but that is not the only testimony on which we have to depend. That verdict completely clears them of the accusation in both counts. I will produce other evidence on each one separately. With respect to the Bristol: first, the affidavit of James Malone, who was second officer of the ship Bristol, at the time she was lost, who declares—

"That in a conversation which deponent had with the Captain of the Bristol, since the wreck of the same, the Captain fully exonerated the New York pilots from all blame whatever in that affair."

And he also makes oath that—

"He verily believes and declares, that in his opinion, no blame whatever can, or ought, to attach to the said pilots, for or on account of the loss of the ship Bristol."

Secondly, an affidavit of a sailor belonging to her, will go to show clearly the gross and culpable inattention of her captain. It will inform the House that when the ship was off a dangerous coast, such as that of New York is known to be, not even that indispensable requisite of coast navigation, a lead line, was to be found; and amidst the difficulties of such a navigation, the captain, instead of attending to his duty, was snugly ensconced in his birth. So says, on oath, Thomas Savage, a hand on board the Bristol at the time she was wrecked. I will read a portion of his deposition:

"This is to certify that I was on board the ship Bristol on her passage from Liverpool to New York; that on Sunday, the 20th day of November, we made the Highland lights not far from 6 o'clock, p. m. We then stood in until about half past 8 o'clock, p. m. We then hauled upon the starboard tack, and stood on that tack until the ship struck, it being then a quarter before 4 o'clock, a. m. The crew mentioned among themselves, when the watch was relieved at 12 o'clock, that it was strange that orders were not given for tacking or wearing ship, to stand to the southard, as she had reached to the northward and eastward for five hours, the captain not being on deck at the time the watch was relieved; nor was he on deck when the ship struck; nor was any light hoisted for a pilot. I, coming aft after the ship struck, asked the passengers where the captain was. They told me he was in his berth; but he, coming out of the cabin shortly afterwards, I asked him where we were. He said we were on a reef, and that we would beat over. I then asked the second mate where the lead was. He told me that it was in the starboard gangway. I looked there for it, but there was no lead to be found any where."

This narrative informs us of the proceedings on board of the Bristol, and demonstrates that the disaster was absolutely and purely owing to the neglect of duty on the part of its officers. This evidence is not isolated and unsupported; but it is unnecessary to read other papers, which merely narrate the same facts. The reiteration would be tedious. The fact is simply this: when not on pilot ground, the officers of the Bristol wrecked the vessel entrusted to their charge. With these circumstances in view, it is evident that the blame of the disaster must rest wholly with themselves, even if the pilots had not been at their posts; but such was not the case. While the Bristol was steadily, through the recklessness of her officers, holding on her course to destruction, hoisting no signal for a pilot, the pilots, it is proved, were at their station, on the look out, and most probably missed her amid a dense fog, because the neglect, which continued so long unwisely on the same course, had omitted to raise a signal light. The affidavit of Savage shows what was not done on board the Bristol; the testimony of Robinson, who was in a pilot boat out the Hook the night of the wreck, evinces that no guilt is imputable to the pilots. His evidence I will also read:

"I have resided for the last nine years at Oswego, on Lake Ontario, engaged in the navigation of the lakes, and being on a visit to my friends in the city of New York, was anxious to embrace the opportunity of once more visiting Sandy Hook, the adjacent shores, and the ocean convulsed by a gale—scenes familiar to my youth. In company with my brother and another gentleman, both residents of the city, I went on board the pilot boat William Bayard, No. 5, on Sunday morning about two o'clock, bound on a cruise. There were on board seven pilots, and the usual crew of the boat. We arrived at the Hook about three, p. m. and continued cruising outside until 11, p. m. when a consultation of the pilots was held. It was considered highly imprudent to remain out any longer, the sea having become so tremendous as not only to render it impossible to board a vessel, but the weather had become so extremely thick, that we could not have discovered a vessel at a half a mile distance. We bore up and ran under the Hook, when we came to at half past 11 o'clock. It is stated in the accounts of the loss of the Bristol, that at 10, p. m. she was within five miles of the Hook, at the same time that we were six miles from Sandy Hook, the light bearing northwest, and every eye strained to get a sight of some vessel. The pilots remained outside the Hook, burying their little craft under a heavy sea, as long as the dictates of prudence, and self-preservation, would permit, and long after there was any probability of their being serviceable to any one. I would further remark, that a pilot was put on board the schooner Powhatan, four miles outside the Hook, at 9 o'clock, p. m. and I remarked at the time, that I thought it a piece of presumption to launch the yawl in such a sea."

From this testimony, it appears that the pilots were out on their station beyond the Hook, on the look out, as was their duty. But because they were not so keen sighted as to see a ship which carried no light and but little sail in a dark foggy night, they must be condemned and denounced; while the captain of the Bristol, who when the storm had lulled towards the morning into moderate weather, calmly plumped his vessel on a weather shore, is solaced with public sympathy! If guilt attaches any where, it must be to him. But however naturally anxious he may have to exhonerate himself from blame, even he did not pretend, in the least degree, as I learn from the letter of Mr. Philip Hamilton, to inculpate the pilots. Mr. Hamilton, in his capacity of Assistant District Attorney, proceeded to the neighborhood of the wreck, in consequence of information lodged at the United States District Attorney's office, that larcenies had been committed of property which had drifted ashore. In the discharge of his duty, he resided ten or twelve days in the same house with the captain and one of the cabin passengers of the ship. "His conversation with them turned chiefly on the subject of the disaster, and from their statements he became firmly convinced that no censure was attributable to the pilots." And moreover, he continues: "his duties on the occasion afforded him the most favorable opportunity of obtaining the candid views, not only of those who were competent to judge, but the statement of those who were saved, and all concurred in exempting the pilots from reproach." This testimony, even the New York delegation will concede, is entitled to the highest degree of credibility. Its statement, couched in general terms, is fully confirmatory of the other evidence I have adduced. Combining the atoms of proof, it appears that the Bristol was not wrecked on pilot ground; that she went ashore in the teeth of a head wind; that none of the ordinary precautions were taken to prevent the disaster; that her officers were grossly negligent of their duty, and that no signal light was hoisted. While, on the other hand, it is proved that the pilots were on duty outside the Hook; that the night was dark and tempestuous, and that it was impossible to ascertain the proximity of a ship, unless through the intervention of a light, which, in this case, was not shown. Under all these circumstances, they are certainly not obnoxious to censure.

The gentleman from New York (unintentionally, no doubt) pays a high compliment both to the pilots and to their boats. In the case of the Bristol, he hurls his denunciations against the men, because they did not exhibit powers of vision far transcending those with which others have been gifted by the Creator; and in the case of the Mexico, his invective is equally severe, because the boats did not glide rapidly and smoothly through the obstructions of large masses of ice, where vessels of the strongest structure could not be forced, without imminent danger of destruction. Because a small pilot boat could not effect a passage where the power of steam had failed, reason sufficient is thought to be found for condemnation. What were the circumstances in the case of the Mexico? Even granting, as has been asserted, that she had a signal of distress flying—that she fired signal guns for a pilot without success—the guns, it is granted, were not heard by a steamboat which passed within five miles of her; yet are the pilots to be censured, because they could not effect an impossibility, and get out to sea through impassable barriers of ice? The boat which was to have taken the place of the one already out, and which was exhausted of its complement of pilots, though making every effort, and risking life and property, could not get to sea. There were many vessels besides the Mexico which could not succeed in obtaining pilots, and yet met with no disaster. The skill which saved them, would, if exerted, have preserved her also—where there was neglect, disaster might be anticipated. That the failure of the boat in getting out the Hook was not owing to any want of effort on the part of the pilots, but solely to the impassable barriers presented by nature, there is ample proof. I shall read two or three affidavits in corroboration of the statement I have made. On Sunday, the first of January, 1837, it is said that the Mexico was standing off and on, looking for a pilot.

"About that time," says Richard Yates, captain of the steamboat Brighton, "when the navigation was nearly impassable with ice, and very few vessels passed in or out of port without the aid of steamboats, Mr. Foster, the owner of the ship Maria, called on us to tow the ship to sea through the ice. We engaged to do so, if it was possible. Shortly after we had concluded the engagement, the pilots belonging to the pilot boat Washington, and two other crews belonging to different boats, applied to us to give them a tow, as they were about starting off, to get as far off towards Sandy Hook as they possibly could. We told them of our engagement, and if we could render them any assistance we would with pleasure. They had not been under weigh more than three hours, when they got entangled in the ice—so much so, that we could not render them any assistance. The steamboat John Jay was also entangled in the ice, and damaged her wheels so much, that she became unmanageable. The pilots on board the Washington, so far from being recreant from their duty, made use of every exertion, at the risk of lives and property, and it is my firm belief, that if it had not been for the elements and the ice, every vessel near Sandy Hook would have got pilots. After towing the ship to sea, the pilot came on board the steamboat. We saw a great many vessels inside and outside the Hook with pilots on board. Those which were outside dare not venture in without the aid of steamboats, and we being the only steamboat there, thought it the most prudent to take the first vessel in tow we came to, and make the best of our way to New York. The packet ship George Washington being nearest, and she being bound to New York, we made for her, put the pilot of the Maria, Mr. Donalson, on board of her, took her in tow, and towed her through the ice as far as York bay, when the ice drove both the ship and the steamboat down through the Narrows, and both went ashore on Staten island, near the bluff. I deem this an act of justice to the pilots, and especially such of them as have been so severely censured by the community at large for having neglected their business on that occasion."

These careless pilots, whose neglect caused the loss of the Mexico! were thus left amid the ice struggling for preservation of their own lives, and, consequently, incapacitated by the unfavorable state of the elements from rendering assistance to others. Thus left without any means of extricating themselves, by their own ingenuity and exertions, from the dangers in which they were involved, how were they saved from the perils that menaced them? The evidence of Abraham Bristed will furnish more information on the history of the pilot boat Washington:

"State, city, and county of New York, ss.—Abraham Bristed, of said city, shipmaster, being duly sworn, saith: that last winter, when our navigation was rendered nearly impassible by the ice to all kinds of vessels except steamboats, on the first of January, on my passage from New York to quarantine, my attention was called to the dangerous situation of one of our New York pilot boats, the Washington, which was at that time drifting by the ice on Robbins's reef, with three crews on board, and but one small boat to save them, endeavoring, if possible, to get to sea. I towed them to the quarantine wharf, where the steamboat Hercules, Capt. Fountain, took them in tow, and towed them as far as he could, and then was obliged to leave them to do the best they could. I deem it an act of justice to the exertions of the pilots to make this statement."

This affidavit was made before Ebenezer Palmer, commissioner of deeds, etc. Do not men exposed to such hazards, and voluntarily encountering such dangers in the discharge of the duties of their profession, merit sympathy and eulogium, instead of crimination and censure? The physician who attends at the bedside of contagion, is lauded for his charity, and is subjected to no blame, if he fails in saving his patient. Are not praise and gratitude equally due to the pilot who perils his life to save the lives and property of others? Should he be condemned because nature stood in the way of his efforts, and prevented him from extending that relief which he struggled to afford? Above all, should he be blamed when the victims of the disaster were incontestably the authors of their own destruction?

But the sufferings and energies of the vituperated pilots did not stop here. Their powers of endurance were put to a still more powerful test. The testimony of Captain Fountain, who towed the boat, contains further details of what they were obliged to bear and suffer:

"Last winter," he deposes, "when our navigation was rendered nearly impassable by ice to all kinds of vessels except steamboats, and few vessels passed in or out of port except by the aid of steamboats, on the 1st of January I was called on by Mr. Griswold to go out to sea, and tow in the packet ship Montreal. When I reached the quarantine, after taking in a supply of wood, the pilots making application, and being anxious to get to sea, I took the pilot boat Washington in tow, she being detained there by the ice, with three crews on board, endeavoring to get to sea, to pilot vessels in if possible. I towed her through the ice to the tail of the bank, when I was obliged to let her go; and a thick snow storm set in that night, which made it impossible for pilots to see vessels or to find them."

The testimony which I have adduced, I have read, not so much to corroborate the correctness of the decision given by the grand jury, which I deem conclusive, as to furnish the House and the country with some idea of the facts, which prejudice has distorted and misrepresented. I could bring forward a much larger mass of evidence; but such a course I judge unnecessary. What I have quoted, I think amply sufficient to exonerate the pilots wholly from censure. This vindication I have thought an indispensable preliminary to the more important divisions of the question under discussion.

I certainly feel a delicacy in being placed in the position which I have been compelled to assume—in being forced to defend the pilots of New York, not against the insinuations of ignorance or malice but against imputations endorsed by their own Representatives, whose duty it is to protect their honor as well as their interests.

[Mr. CURTIS here made, with warmth, some explanations, to the effect that he could not permit the gentleman from Maryland to insinuate that he had any ill will against the pilots, and that the assertion of the gentleman could not apply to any thing he had said.]

Mr. HILLEN resumed. I trust the gentleman from New York will husband his temper. Before I conclude, I shall, perhaps, have occasion to draw more liberally on his excitability. He has forced upon me the duty of stating facts, as I know them to exist; he should not take umbrage, if, by my doing so, his views be not sustained. I have sought no collision, I shall avoid no responsibility. I am determined to follow my own course, notwithstanding all the uneasiness which may be manifested. The gentleman says he feels no ill will towards the pilots. He may think so. An old philosopher has reduced all human passions to the single one of love. "The hate of one thing," he says, "is merely the love of its opposite." The opposition of the gentleman to the pilots, is merely the negative prejudice, resulting from a prepossession in favor of an antagonistic interest.

But to return from the digression into which I have been led by the interruption of the gentleman from New York, I will close this part of the discussion in a manner somewhat similar to that in which I commenced. I adduced, in the outset, the testimony of the grand inquest of New York, to show that the pilots were in no manner responsible for the loss of the Bristol and Mexico; I shall close it by reading the certificate drawn up by the officers of the revenue cutter on the New York station, in evidence of the general assiduity of the pilots there. But, sir, permit me to call your attention to one circumstance, which I inadvertently omitted to notice when reading the decision of the grand jury. In collecting the evidence on which their decision was based, they regret the absence of the captain of the Mexico. He, no doubt, conscious of his own culpability, and unwilling to testify against himself, was prudently missing. It was prudent to escape the publication of his neglect and heartlessness, and leave the pilots to bear the censure for the fault of which he was guilty. Compassionating human infirmity, I shall subject his conduct to no severity of comment, but leaving him to the stings of his own conscience for twofold criminality, I shall read the testimony of the officers attached to the revenue cutter, dated 16th of March, 1836:

"The undersigned, commander and officers of the United States revenue cutter Alert—a portion of us having been stationed in the port of New York several years, and having every opportunity of witnessing the conduct and attention of the pilots of the said port by the way of Sandy Hook, take pleasure in certifying that, from our observation, every attention is, and has been, paid by them to all vessels arriving off the port, and that we have in no instance known vessels to meet with detention on the pilotage ground, or the vicinity of the port, except on extraordinary occasions, when it has been from circumstances impossible to board them."

These, Mr. Speaker, are the persecuted pilots, whose defence I have been compelled to assume. The most rigid and hazardous performance of their duties is not sufficient for the reasonable demands of the gentleman from New York, but the modest exactions are required, that by their feeble efforts they should break through the fastenings of nature, and see through the fogs which she has rendered impenetrable to human vision.

In the two instances of the Bristol and Mexico, the most satisfactory evidence satisfied the grand jury that the pilots were totally exempt from blame, and the officers of the revenue cutter gave their unhesitating testimony in favor of their general assiduity. In all justice, they are, therefore, to be considered blameless. As I have already said, I have entered into this preliminary discussion because I consider it indispensably essential to the elucidation of the main question. The two wrecks which gave rise to so much hasty declamation, and wholly originated the law of Congress, which I consider unjust, constitute the chief proof of the defect in the legislation of New York. If it be shown that those lamentable disasters are not attributable to the pilots, and, of course, that they cannot be traced to any defect in the laws, then all the reasoning based upon them must fall to the ground. Now, I think I have satisfactorily demonstrated, that the pilots are wholly guiltless of the charges made against them; by consequence, the alleged defect in the New York laws is unsustained—therefore, on this ground, alone, I may assert that the act of Congress is uncalled for.

I will not let the question rest here: but meet the gentleman on his own ground. He thinks the privileges granted to the pilots assume the awful shape of a monopoly. When I heard him denounce monopolies, I was in doubt whether to suspect or congratulate him. But on further examination, I found that his imagination had been employed to conjure up a monster, that he might show with what indignant eloquence he could lash him out of existence. An enemy to monopolies myself, I am not inclined to vindicate them; and did I think that the poor privileges enjoyed by the pilots constituted a monopoly, I should not be found among their abettors. I am not geing to attempt a definition of the term: like all forms of phrase in popular use, I believe it to be vague in its application. But in no objectionable sense do the pilots enjoy a monopoly. I say this abstractedly, without any reference to the recent law of New York, which has destroyed every thing to which the most fastidious could apply that odious appellation. Let us judge the question by comparison—the fairest, if not the most philosophical, mode of investigation.

Do lawyers enjoy a monopoly, because no one can be admitted to practise at the bar, until he has not only undergone a prescribed examination, but until he has studied his profession a certain number of years? Do physicians enjoy a monopoly, because in a profession affecting so seriously the lives of their fellow-citizens, they are obligated to spend a definite number of years in the acquisition of the knowledge supposed necessary for successful practice, while others are prohibited from charging medical fees who have not been subjected to the same length of preliminary study? The lawyer and the doctor are no monopolists; and yet the pilot is denounced as one for claiming privileges far inferior. His profession is purely local, and cannot be rendered transferable. The young man who has studied law or medicine in New York, may change the scene of his labors with probable success, to Iowa or Wiskonsin—the pilot is confined to the channel with which years of hardship and vicissitude have rendered him familiar. The remuneration of the pilot is fixed by law; the fees of the doctor and the lawyer are left to their own discretion. Life and property are entrusted to the doctor and the lawyer; yet they give no bond for the faithful and successful performance of their duties; the pilot is responsible for life and property in like manner, but he is subject to heavy penalties, fully secured on the conviction of delinquency. Will the gentleman from New York vote for the revocation of the privileges he enjoys? Will he agree that any man, no matter how brief his time of preparatory study, shall, as a physician, be allowed to tamper with the health and lives of our citizens? Will he permit any one to risk, on the presumption of his contracted knowledge, the property of a client in a suit at law, or the life of a fellow-citizen on a criminal trial? He denounces the pilot as a monopolist, but suffers the lawyer and doctor untrammelled to kill and defraud professionally. Is a doctor censured because he loses a patient? Is a lawyer ostracised because his client is condemned? Why, then, is a pilot to be convicted unheard and untried, because a vessel is wrecked through no fault of his whatever? If a vessel had been run ashore with a view to defraud the underwriters, guilt must be fairly proved before sentence can be pronounced. But in this case the whole body of pilots is denounced, because two vessels were wrecked, without any possible imputation even on those, who, in the opinion of the grand jury, might have averted the calamity by a suitable degree of caution.

The pilots monopolists! Would a mechanic, according to the usual regulations, be allowed to work in any shop, unless he had served a regular apprenticeship? Is this rule banned as a monopoly? Would a merchant be allowed to trade in New York without being subjected to the usual restriction of the mercantile laws? Could even the poor orange dealers, who grace the sidewalks of Broadway, sell their fruit without subjection to the license of the city? Doctors, lawyers, merchants, and retailers, enjoy a greater monopoly than the pilots ever could boast, and yet are tolerated in their privileges without an objection; while the pilots, restricted as they were, and still more, restricted as they now are by the State law, cannot find sympathy, nor even justice.

But few as were the privileges boasted by the pilots—privileges far more contracted than those enjoyed by every other profession—even these few have been diminished by a late law of the State. Paltry as were their immunities, when they were obliged to labor under the oppression of a fixed compensation, which produced necessarily the combination so much vilified, these immunities have been much narrowed. There was, if the question be judged by comparrison, no monopoly before 1837; and now, if any thing, they suffer oppression. The law of the State has driven from the sight of the keenest vision the faintest shadow of alleged monopoly. If the law of Congress was unjust and unnecessary formerly, it is more so now. When this is proved, my object is accomplished. If I succeed, I cannot but think that even the New York delegation should be in favor of the repeal of the law of 1837. One of them indeed already has professed his willingness to vote for the repeal of the act of Congress, provided an amendment could be engrafted on the law of New York, which would destroy the general combination among the pilots. This combination is the alleged cause of all the evils complained of; and if it be done way with, he grants the law of Congress to be wholly nugatory. I can inform him that a section enacting all he desires is to be found in the act, entitled "An act for the licensing and government of the pilots of the port of New York, by the way of Sandy Hook." The 23d section reads thus:

"The earnings of the pilots belonging to any boat, shall be equally divided among the pilots of said boat; and no pilot shall participate, unless authorized by the commissioners, in the earnings of any others than those attached to the same boat; and for breach of this provision, any pilot or pilots shall forfeit his or their license of licenses."

Is not the system or combination prohibited by this section, and the penalty of forfeiture incurred by infringement of its provision? Does it not contain all that is wished—all that is proposed. If the combination is the evil which the act of Congress was intended to correct, the evil no longer exists or can exist; the law, therefore, is no longer needed. But in the face of the section which I have just read, and which completely annihilates the whole system of criminated combination, the belief still prevails that it yet flourishes in full vigor; and the moment you attempt to utter a word in vindication of the character or claims of the New York pilots, you are answered by the assertion, that monopoly and combination have rendered them inert, and that the only method to force them into activity and assiduity, is to open the door to competition. Is the assertion true? The portion of the law I have read demonstrates its falsity. The charge can be urged only by ignorance or malignity. That monopolists they were not, even under the law of 1819, more than members of other professions, I have already proved. Indeed they were less so; because, while enjoying no greater privileges, their business is local, their compensation was fixed by law, and they were bound by heavy penalties for the faithful performance of their duties. Neither combination or monopoly should ever have been urged in connection with their names.

The morning hour expired, and Mr. H. suspended his remarks.

Mr. HILLEN resumed his remarks. In the observations I addressed to the House on yesterday, I showed that the law of 1837 was passed in haste, and without due deliberation, in consequence of the excitement produced by the loss of the two vessels, the Bristol and the Mexico. I proved that public indignation was unjustly roused against the pilots who were by no means chargeable with those disasters, and consequently the act of Congress having been passed, with a view to destroy the combination, which was alleged to be the source of the mischief, originated in a mistaken idea of the facts, and should never have been made. One other argument in its favor, I proved also to be futile. That law is vindicated on the ground that it annihilates a monopoly alleged to have been enjoyed by the pilots. That monopoly I evinced to be imaginary—the abortive offspring of blinded prejudice.

But whatever monopoly biased fancy may suppose to have been tolerated by the law of 1819, certainly a mind the most diseased, cannot conceive the faintest shadow of one to exist under the New York law of 1837. The former limited the number of pilots to the supposed requisitions of the port, prescribing the term of service, and fixing the compensation. The State law of 1837, not only blots out every trace of privilege, but to my mind opens the door so wide as to become oppressive to the pilot who has gone through a hazardous apprenticeship of five years. By that law five commissioners are appointed by the Governor of New York, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, "for the licensing, regulation, and government of pilots." These commissioners are directed to administer the requisite oaths to pilots, and are empowered "to license all persons now licensed to act as pilots by the way of Sandy Hook, including those called deputy pilots, as they may deem competent after examination; and also, every other person of full age and good moral character, making application therefor." Every person of full age and good moral character—mark carefully these words, Mr. Speaker, and then let any one, who pretends to know the meaning of the word monopoly, assert that any is enjoyed by the New York pilots. If any man with the two qualifications mentioned, may at the discretion of the commissioners be allowed to serve in the capacity of a pilot, where is the exclusive privilege enjoyed by those who were obliged to serve an apprenticeship of five years? Is not the new regulation, instead of conferring a monopoly, oppressive on the old pilots? Is not all the monopoly, if I may so apply the term, enjoyed by the new aspirants to the profession? What would the New York lawyers, who are now clamorous about monopoly, think, if some favorite of fortune, gifted with talent, should be admitted, after brief preparation, to honors of the bar equal with those they now enjoy, after years of prescribed preparatory study? Would they not rebel against the tyranny? Suppose at the same time, their fees should be fixed, whilst those of the intruder were unlimited, would they not denounce the oppression? Let a small spark of justice illumine their selfishness; and when they lift up their hands in holy horror against monopoly, they must not plume themselves with the belief that they are exempt from crimination. While they labor for the conversion of others, let them endeavor to reform themselves. They enjoy exclusive privileges, while the pilots enjoy none whatever.

But it is said that the objection made to the pilot monopoly is urged on general principles, while the utility of the law of Congress is vindicated on account of its efficacy in destroying the system of combination, which was chiefly conducive in paralyzing the energies of the pilots. I say in reply, that the act of Congress did not contribute, in any degree, to break up the combination. That reform was effected solely and directly by the law of the State, passed within a few weeks after the Congress enactment. The twenty-third section of that law I read yesterday, and it is, consequently, unnecessary to repeat it. That section specifically provides that the earnings of any one boat must be divided solely among the pilots of said boat, and establishes the forfeiture of the license as the penalty for infringing its provisions. The passage of this law produced the correction of the mischief complained of; nor was the law of Congress in any degree instrumental in promoting this object. The commissioners of pilots appointed by Governor Seward, in an article published in the New York Journal of Commerce of May 15th, 1840, explicitly and publicly deny the existence of "any combination, either now, or for several years past," and at the same time distinctly and positively assert that whatever reform has been effected, "has been the result solely of the State law of 1837." Still more recently they have addressed a letter to me, in which they reiterate their publicly expressed opinion. This letter I will read at length, as an omission of any part of it would be unjust:

"Yours of the 21st inst. has just come to hand. We enclose you the questions to which we replied in the Journal of Commerce. As to the combination we alluded to in that reply, we would respectfully refer you to the twenty-third section of the act passed by our Legislature in 1837; in addition to which, we do most solemnly assure you that the competition existing among the New York pilots is equally, if not more strenuous, than that existing between them and the New Jersey pilots.

"We know this to be a decided fact from the report books of the last three years' standing, and from every day observation. A more valuable, capable, deserving, and enterprising class of pilots, the world does not produce. We would farther assure you that they almost daily board vessels at sea from 15 to 50, 80, 100, 150, 200 miles distant from the Hook; and, in some instances, nearly up to Nantucket and St. George's Bank. It is really heart-rending to see those invaders of our State rights board vessels alongside the dock and carry them to sea, to the exclusion of our pilots, who have served a regular apprenticeship, and who have such an immense capital afloat. If they have for once erred, surely they have redeemed that error by their unexceptionable conduct, and a probation of nearly four years, added to which, they have been sufficiently punished for it, and have made ample atonement.

"The General Government may, as well as the State Government, be assured that they need be under no apprehensions of neglect of duty among them; for if such should be the case, while we have the honor of acting, they will be rigidly punished to the very letter. We forward you a copy of the State laws, which you will perceive are very severe. As a farther proof of their being in a most determined manner opposed to each other—I mean boat against boat for their individual interest—we have before us reports made by them, against each other, for infringements made on each other's rights, which of course we have to adjust."

The opinion of the commissioners I should deem entitled to more respect than any evidence we can obtain. They may be presumed to be best acquainted with the operations of the law; to them all infractions of it are reported, and hence all facts connected with the conduct of the pilots come to their knowledge in a correct and tangible form; nor must it be forgotten that they are sworn to attend to the faithful execution of the law. Their opinions are not based on rumor, but are the result of deliberate investigation. And what do they say? That there is no combination; and that there is none, is owing to the State law alone. They pronounce the pilots to be active and industrious, and sedulously competing with those of their own State. They do indeed say, "If the pilots of New York have erred, they have made ample atonement." But the "if" is underscored, to indicate that, in the opinion of the commissioners, the pilots were wholly blameless. The if was only a concession for sake of argument. To show that the representations of the commissioners are entitled to paramount respect, I shall read the postscript to their letter, which informs us of what class of men the board is composed. It is constituted, as it should be, of men who possess superior nautical experience. They say:

"This board is composed of men who have sailed from this port as long, if not longer, than most men who have made the sea their profession, and we have found, from an experience of from thirty to thirty-five years, that we were never at a loss for a pilot, except when a great influx of arrivals took place, and the pilots were all engaged, which has some years past been the case, and caused a small detention. Since that, the defect has been remedied by an increase in the number of the pilots; which increase has been such, and shortly will be greater, by the expiration of the indentures of apprentices, that they will scarcely be able to pay expenses. This board would, as a matter of impartial justice, beg of you either to cause a repeal of the laws which do now allow the Jersey pilots to pilot in our waters, or place them under the same restrictions as those to which our pilots are subjected."

These sworn officers of the State, who are men of experience, and placed in a position to ascertain all the facts, and to judge of the operations of the law, call upon us to decide on its repeal as unjust and unnecessary. And yet we are told that all New York is against the recision of the act of Congress. If we may judge by the piles of memorials presented here on every possible subject, and the known facility with which they are obtained, surely the judgment of the "commissioners of pilots" is entitled to more respectful consideration than a dozen such memorials.

They tell us that the act of Congress was wholly inoperative in bringing about the reform said to have been produced; that the whole merit is due exclusively to the State law. That such must be the fact, a slight examination will demonstrate. The direct tendency of the act of Congress is obviously to break up the conflicts of jealousy between the New York pilots, to draw more closely together the bonds of their common interests, and to give new vigor to the vilified combination. As long as they were left to compete with one another, individual enterprise would necessarily be active and industrious. But as soon as you attack them in a body, and bring a whole squadron of rivals to contend against them en masse, the inevitable consequence must be the oblivion of individual jealousies, to promote the common interest. The esprit d'corps of the profession becomes paramount to individual selfishness, for one reason at least in this case, because individual interests were inseparable from common aggrandisement. The combination there did not sink under the weight of the act of Congress, but was crushed solely by the power of the State law, which expressly prohibits combination between different boats under the penalty of a forfeiture of license.

What, then, is the effect of the act of Congress? Why, more immediately to bring the pilots of the two contiguous States into unequal competition. I say the competition is unequal, because the laws of the two States are not equally severe in their restrictions. The pilots of New York are subjected to many disadvantages and disabilities under which the Jersey pilots do not labor. Under the act of Congress, the injustice with respect to other States may, at any moment, exist to a far greater extent than in the case of New York and New Jersey; and may terminate not only in producing an angry conflict between two States, if one, zealous to promote the interests of its own citizens, should remove all restrictions, and its neighbor should emulate its zeal, but may ultimately prove seriously injurious to the mercantile interests, by admitting, through the force of sectional conflict, any one and every one to act as pilot.

But should the law of Congress be repealed, what mischief would ensue? None whatever, even to the New Jersey pilots. Justice only would be restored to its proper course. The New Jersey pilot would not be prohibited from conducting vessels into the harbor of New York; he would only, as is perfectly equitable, be subjected to the same restrictions as the New York pilot. The State law of New York, without requiring the candidates for the profession of branch pilot to be citizens, or residents of the State, merely enacts that "they shall be of full age, good moral character, and of approved competency." The result of the repeal would not be to diminish the competition, but to destroy the unfairness of the competition. The only effect of the act of Congress is the creation of absolute injustice at present, and of probable mischief in future. It ought, therefore, to be repealed.

But it is said that the only complaints addressed to us come from the pilots, and no other portion of the community seems interested in the repeal of the law. This is one reason urged why the memorial should not be regarded. For a moment, I confess, I was under the impression that this argument was not meant to be serious. But the earnestness with which it was pressed, soon convinced me of my error. What! is this principle advocated in an American Congress? Must we lend no ear to the prayer of a citizen aggrieved, unless his position is endorsed by those by whom he is oppressed? Must a court refuse to issue a writ of habeas at the prayer of a prisoner, unless his prayer is backed by the authority that imprisoned him? If the Executive should dismiss an officer from the army, must Congress refuse all attention to his petition, unless the President should unite with him in a concurrent memorial? Such an argument is too ridiculous for a reply. And yet it has been strenuously urged as a sufficient reason why we should dismiss the memorial of the pilots. We must give no attention to their prayer, because it is not endorsed by other portions of the community. Nay, further, it is argued that no mischief, nay, rather benefit has been done to the community at large, by the reform which it is pretended, has been produced by the law of Congress, because no complaints have been heard from any except the pilots themselves. The argument is consistently ridiculous. Suppose Congress, in the plenitude of its wisdom, should enact a law (and it has been asked to do many things as strange) fixing at a low rate the wages of any one class of mechanics, or, if you please, of the day laborer, without establishing any such regulation for other trades or professions. No doubt the balance of the community would be benefited by receiving the articles produced by that one trade at a proportionately low price, while the other trades would be left to exact, without restriction of law, what payment they please for their own productions. The mass of the community would not complain; remonstrances would be heard but from the members of one profession. This would be sufficient, according to the argument used in reference to the pilots, why we should turn a deaf ear to those remonstrances. The community does not suffer or complain—only one poor class of it is oppressed for the benefit of the rest. This argument may embody some recondite theory of pretended philosophy, but it is in contradiction to the plain principles of common justice. It is idle to say that no injury is done to the community. In a Republican Government, at least, no injury can be inflicted long on the community by the operation of any law. Oppression can rest on a part—generally on a small part—only of the community. To redress injustice done to a small number of citizens, must be the only case in which petitions will be presented to Congress. If a law oppressed a majority, or even a large number, there would be no petition. It is really a wonderful discovery, that the fact of a petition being presented is a sufficient reason for its rejection. The friends of despotism can find in the gentleman from New York a worthy recipient of a magnificent present, for the origination of a doctrine which justifies their royal masters in treading under foot the petitions of their subjects.

Mr. Speaker, I fear I have trespassed too long on the time and patience of the House; but I wish to comment on insinuations, as well as to reply to arguments; I trust, therefore, you will bear with me a few moments longer. Sinister motives have been attributed to me, as well as to others. I, at least, have been actuated by no prepossessions, either political or personal. As I have already stated, I am no volunteer in this matter. I have been driven into the position which I at present occupy by the importunities of the gentleman who now stands opposed to me. In conscience, I feel obnoxious to no imputations. While he so hastily invents motives for me, will he be equally ingenious in fathoming and expounding the motives of himself, in his opposition here, and of his friends in New York. How does it hapnen, that after a pilot of his own city has conducted a vessel from sea into harbor, a New Jersey pilot obtains the privilege, contrary to usual practice, of taking her out, even when the New York pilot is in waiting, and is entitled, according to previous usage, to pilot her out? The gentleman is skilled in detecting motives: he pretends to implicate mine. Let him prove his necromantic powers by expounding the reasons for this injustice. That such is the fact, I have the authority of the commissioners. I leave to his perspicacity to explain the motives. The commissioners of pilots, in a letter to me, under date of June 4, 1840, use the following language: "The New Jersey pilots are in the constant practice of carrying to sea such vessels as our New York pilots bring in from sea." This might be accounted for by those who have witnessed the proscription, which is brought to bear, not only in public stations, but made to visit us in the sacred relations of private life. But I will not indulge in speculation. Here is the fact. The gentleman from New York is the self-constituted expounder of motives. I leave the case with him.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that I have successfully shown that the charge of criminal neglect of duty, urged against the pilots of New York—which gave birth to the act of Congress of March, 1837—is utterly groundless. I have shown that even under the law of 1819, they enjoyed no greater monopoly than seems to be claimed by other professions. I have proved that under the State law of 1837, so far from luxuriating in the advantages of a monopoly, they are, in fact, subjected to unequal competition. I have proved that no combination exists; and that its annihilation is attributable solely to the operation of the State law. I have proved that the act of Congress was productive of no beneficial effect; but, on the contrary, that all its tendencies are mischievous. I have proved that while it does not benefit the community, it is unjust and oppressive to the pilots. Are these not sufficient reasons for its repeal? If they are, I demand its rescision, not in the humble posture of a mendicant supplicating favors, but in the upright attitude of an American Representative, claiming the rights of freemen; asking that the first principles of our Government should be maintained, by extending equal protection to all. With the facts thus clear, and the reasoning thus conclusive, what honest motive can there be for a recommittal? No object can be gained by such a course, except present delay and ultimate evasion of action. Delay and evasion are as unjust as a direct refusal to repeal.

But, sir, while I denounce the law as unjust, I equally conceive it to be dangerous. I believe it to be a crafty invasion of the rights of the States. The wound is, perhaps, too slight to be pronounced mortal; but it may extend and fester and become incurable. It is but a puncture—almost imperceptible, but it is not therefore the less to be dreaded. Tolerate but this invasion of the rights of the States, and it will be but the advance-guard of a more formidable attack. Do not suffer the unmeaning cry of monopoly (umeaning in this instance) to seduce you into the sanction of a fatal precedent. The States have been too long passive under the usurpations of the General Government, based on reckless latitude of construction of the Constitution; it is time they should be roused from their supineness, and not submit to the most trivial infraction of their rights.

Adverse as I am, Mr. Speaker, to trespass on the patience of the House, I trust no apology will be expected for the remarks which the conscientious discharge of my duty, and an imperative regard for justice, compelled me to make. All I desire is legislation, not for the oppression of any, but for the equal protection of all. These, sir, are not the times to subject one portion of the community to the tender mercies of another. No conflict between capital and labor should be tolerated. These are the days, this the country, of freedom. The castle of the strong should not be suffered to batter down the abode of the humble. Law is the barrier which prevents the unequal collision between the rights of the weak and the interests of the powerful. Legislation should be precise, definite, and ample. It should leave no room either for the chicanery of the crafty lawyer, or the loose construction of overbearing power. This is not the period for partial or conflicting legislation. When the political storm is raging, the laws of the country should serve as a lightning-rod for the preservation of the Republican edifice of equal rights and equal privileges. They should cautiously protect the weak and the humble, who are too often made to serve as conductors for the electric flashes of political vengeance. By their influence power should be made to feel its impotency for purposes of oppression, whilst weakness should find within itself no justification for culpable negligence. Whilst, in this case, they should guard with jealous scrutiny the interests of those who enjoy the pampered ease of luxurious indulgence, they should not be unmindful of the hardy mariner, who lives amidst the war of elements—

"Whose bark is on the mountain wave, Whose home is on the deep."

SPEECH OF MR. BURKE,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

In the House of Representatives, June 13, 1840—On the Independent Treasury bill, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURKE rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have some facts and considerations, connected with the bill now before the committee, which I wish to present to the country. And I will say at the outset, that I make my speech to be read by the people—for home consumption—not to be listened to by gentleman here; and as I make no pretensions to the arts and graces of oratory, I shall endeavor to gain the ear of the people, and arrest their attention, by the simple power of argument alone—by presenting to their minds some of the facts and reasons which induce me to give my support to the bill upon your table.

Sir, I regard the bill now under discussion in this committee, as one of the most important measures in its results and consequences, that was ever presented for the action of a deliberative assembly. It is most emphatically the People's Bill. It is, in truth, a second Declaration of Independence. It involves the great question of the currency; and that question embraces in its scope and effects, the liberties, the morals, and the highest interests of society. And, sir, as I did not live at the time, and could not sign the first sacred charter of our liberties, I rejoice that I do live at this time, and shall have an opportunity to record my name in favor of this great measure of deliverance—not from the dominion of a tyrant beyond the Atlantic, but from the sway and supremacy of a more subtle and dangerous foe—A MONEYED DESPOTISM. That, sir, is the despotism of a civilized and intellectual age, the kind of despotism which we are obliged to encounter.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have some views in connection with this subject, which I wish to present to the consideration of the people of this country; and, in order to obtain for those views more currency, I wish to give them an endorsement in the form of a speech, from this hall. That, sir, is the object of my rising on this occasion.

Regarding the bill now before the committee as a very important one in its ultimate effects and consequences, I did design to consider, briefly, some of its leading principles and features. But those who have gone before me in this debate, have already anticipated what I have got to say in relation to the character of the bill. In truth, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the nature of the bill itself, nothing new can be said with which the people are not already acquainted. The details of the bill are familiar to the intelligent citizens of this Republic—to that portion of them, at least, who read, think, and reflect. I shall not, therefore, trouble the committee with any remarks in relation to a subject, with the nature of which all must now be familiar. But there are effects ascribed to this bill, and consequences which it is said will grow out of it, with regard to which I do mean to say something.

Mr. Chairman, I have something to say to the farmers and laboring men of this country in connection with this bill. That class, sir, I have always lived amongst. They compose the great body of my constituents. It is that class who sent me here; and they sent me here, because, in another sphere, I advocated, with zeal and fidelity, what they believe to be their best interests. I will not desert them now. When their interests are assailed, humble as I am, I will rise in their defence, here or elsewhere. When attempts are made to mislead their minds in relation to their own true interests, I will endeavor to expose the motive which prompts the effort to deceive, and the fraud and hypocrisy which seek to conceal that motive under the garb of a professed solicitude for their welfare.

But more to the point. Prodigious efforts have been made to persuade the farmers and laborers of this country to believe, that their interests are to be peculiarly affected by the operation of this bill, and to alarm those meritorious classes into an opposition to it. It has been assumed—I say assumed, without the shadow of fact to support such an assumption—by an honorable gentleman filling an exalted station, [Mr. DAVIS, Senator from Massachusetts,] that the friends of this bill advocate its passage, on the ground that it will tend to reduce the prices of property and the wages of labor. And although that honorable gentleman has cautiously refrained from ascribing such an effect to the bill himself, he has charged its advocates with supporting it on that ground; and he has endeavored to alarm the country, by charging upon the friends of this wise and patriotic measure, hostility to the great business interests of the country, and particularly to the interests of the working man. The speech of that honorable gentleman has been circulated far and wide, and has produced, and is destined to produce, all the effect that its intrinsic truth and merits will secure for it. Reasoning a priori from the intrinsic truth and merits of that speech, I leave it to honorable gentlemen here, and to the country, to estimate how much reputation for honesty of purpose and integrity of motive, it will secure to its author.

Mr. Chairman, an honorable gentleman of this body [Mr. EVANS] has also spoken very pathetically upon the great depreciation of prices, the fall of real estate, of rents, and most emphatically, of the wages of labor; which he alleges have all resulted from the measures of this Administration. The wailings of distress raised in this Capitol have been caught up, with the unerring instinct of the foul carrion bird, snuffing his food from afar, by a corrupt and pensioned press, and re echoed through the country with a zeal which would induce an honest man, unacquainted with the dishonest tricks of party, to believe that it had some fact and truth for its basis. The press, and the orators of that party, are not alone in this crusade of misrepresentation against the Administration, and this grand scheme of fraud and deception upon the people. No, sir. The bankers, merchants, and manufacturers, scattered throughout the cities and villages of this great Republic, with their army of retainers and dependants, have caught up the watchword given out here, and the stagnation of business, the fall of prices, and all the real distress which does exist, are ascribed—falsely, and unjustly ascribed, to the measures of the Government, and even to this bill, which has not yet become a law, and is not, in fact, in operation.

As I have before remarked my object is not so much to advocate and defend this bill, or to explain its particular provisions, as it is to meet the unfounded charges which have been preferred against the Administration and its measures; and more especially those growing out of the fall of prices, the stagnation of business, and the distress alleged to exist in the community. All these results are assumed by gentlemen of the Opposition to have grown out of "tampering with the currency;"—and the currency question, sir, in the form of this bill, is the great question now under discussion. I, therefore, deem it to be perfectly in order for me to discuss the matters I have alluded to; so far, at least, as they have a connection with the bill now before the committee.

My main object, Mr. Chairman, in addressing the committee on this occasion, is to demonstrate by figures and facts, THE PROBLEM OF FLUCTUATIONS in the prices of property and the wages of labor. And on this subject I am aware that I have in some particulars been anticipated by my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] to whose able and admirable speech no one listened with more pleasure than myself. But to proceed: I will not deny, sir, because the fact is undeniable, that within the last six months, a considerable reduction has taken place in many of the agricultural staples of the country, and especially in the article of grain; but not to so great an extent as is alleged by gentlemen of the Opposition, and the public presses in the interest of that party. Sir, the prices of all kinds of property are ever incident to change and fluctuation. They are never permanent, and never will be, as long as the Divine decree, that all things human are mutable, remains unrepealed. They are ever changing with every returning season, sometimes in a greater, sometimes in a less amount. There are, sir, causes for those fluctuations, but they are not to be found exclusively in the measures of the Government. Nay, Mr. Chairman, the measures of Government operate but partially to produce the changes which occur in the nominal value of property, and the wages of labor. I shall now proceed to show, by plain and irresistible deductions from facts, what are the great causes which operate to produce changes in prices and wages.

Let it be remembered, sir, that the argument of the opponents of this bill is, in substance, that prices are high in paper money countries, and low in countries in which specie is the circulating medium, and the measure of value and basis of exchange; that they oppose this measure because it is an antagonist measure to the paper system, which tends to keep prices and wages nominally high; and that the friends of the Administration support it because it tends to establish a permanent and stable currency, and, as an incidental effect, to reduce prices and wages nominally. In other words, sir, the opponents of this bill prefer and inflated fluctuating prices which a paper currency, constantly expanding and contracting, causes, to sound and permanent prices, which a stable currency, subject to no expansion and contraction, produces.

I shall now, Mr. Chairman, proceed to show by facts how much truth there is in this assumption; for, sir, it no more than assumption. I will now state the propositions which I shall endeavor to maintain, and the facts and illustrations I shall adduce in their support. They are, sir,

1. That expansions and contractions of the currency, and the relative increase and decrease of the demand and supply, are the principal causes of the rise and fall of prices and the wages of labor. This, sir, is the main proposition, which, in order to be better understood, I analyze thus:

2. That the expansion of the currency, all other things remaining the same, nominally increases the prices of property and the wages of labor. This proposition is so self-evident as hardly to require illustration. It is obvious to the most common understanding, that, if the quantity of any article of property remains the same, an increase of the currency, which is the measure of its value, would nominally increase the price.

On this point, I will suppose a case. I will take a community of fifty families, having a real estate, stock, grain, and other property, and a circulation of $10,000. With that amount of money, they get only $1 per bushel for their wheat, and the prices of all their other property are graduated upon the same scale. Now, sir, if the quantity of real estate, grain, &c. remain the same, and there is no increase of demand, to double the amount of circulation would increase the nominal prices of property in the same proportion. Wheat, which was worth $1 per bushel with a circulation of $10,000, would be worth $2 with a currency of $20,000; the currency having been in fact diluted and depreciated one half by the expansion; and in consequence of such depreciation, it takes twice as much now to buy the bushel of wheat as it did when the currency was at its minimum amount I make use of this plain and homely illustration, because, sir, it will be most easily understood.

3. My third proposition is, that a diminution of the supply, in proportion to the demand, the currency, or measure of value, and other things, remaining the same, increases prices and wages. To illustrate this proposition, it is only necessary to reverse the case I have just supposed, and assume the quantity of wheat to be reduced one half, and the amount of circulation to remain the same.

Thus these two causes, viz: an expansion of the currency, and a diminution of the relative proportion of the supply to the demand, produce precisely the same result—an increase of prices.

It will now be admitted, because it is self-evident.

4. That when both of the above causes operate together—for instance, when there is a great expansion of the currency, and a great diminution of the supply in proportion to the demand—prices will be greatly enhanced.

The converse of this proposition must also be admitted.

5. My fifth proposition is, that a contraction of the currency, all other things remaining the same, causes the prices of property and the wages of labor to fall. This, also, may be illustrated by the case I have before supposed. If the quantity of wheat remains the same, a reduction of the currency from $10,000 to $5,000 would cause the prices of wheat to fall nominally one half, and, instead of being one dollar per bushel, it would be but fifty cents.

6. That an increase of the relative proportion of the supply over the demand, other things remaining the same, nominally reduces prices and wages. Thus in the case supposed, if the quantity of wheat and other property should be doubled, the amount of the currency remaining the same, and the demand also remaining the same, the nominal price of it would decrease one half, and it would bring but 50 cents per bushel. The supply over the demand may increase to such an amount as to render an article entirely without value. To suppose, Mr. Chairman, an extreme case; if the supply over the demand by purchasers, and the wants of the producers, should be so great as to produce a surplus which could not be sold nor consumed, that surplus would be entirely without value. This case is never true in point of fact, in regard to the productions of labor, although it is sometimes approximated to.

If a surplus of grain or other commodities over the wants of the community, and the demand for it in other communities, is produced, it can be stored and kept until it is wanted. But it is not so with labor itself. That exists in human muscles, and must be called forth constantly, or it is lost. If laborers are thrown out of employment, the labor which they lose during the time they are out of employment, cannot be stored, nor reserved for future use when it may be wanted, but is lost forever. Therefore a surplus of labor over the wants of the community is a dead loss.

This principle, viz: an increase of the supply over the demand, solves the problem in part, (the contraction of the currency being a great and efficient cause,) of the fall of prices of wheat and other grains during the present season. During the years 1836, '37, and '38, the quantity of grain (and flour more especially) produced, was not sufficient for the consumption of the country, as is conclusively proved by the large quantities of wheat imported from abroad. It was also monopolized by speculators, deriving their means from the favor of the banks, who withheld it from market, thus adding an artificial scarcity to the real one, and increasing exorbitantly the prices of that article. But during the years 1838 and '39, the quantity of wheat produced has greatly exceeded the wants of the country, and there has been left a large surplus for exportation to foreign countries. The effect of this, is, to stop the importation of foreign grain, and produce a fall of prices. The intelligent farmer will see in this, the solution of the causes which have reduced the prices of his grain, without conjuring up the ghost of the Sub-Treasury bill, which, like the shades of great men, seen by the "pious Æneas" in Pluto's dark realms, has not yet come upon earth; or charging it to other measures of the Administration. But, before I conclude, sir, I shall enlarge now upon this point.

My next proposition is,

7. That the last two mentioned causes operating together, viz: a contraction of the currency, and an increase of the relative proportion of the supply over the demand, produce a very great diminution of prices. The truth of this will be manifest by the considerations already stated.

The causes which affect prices, causing them to rise and fall, are often modified and counteracted by each other. Thus,

8. The effects of an expansion of the currency, which increases prices, will be neutralized, more or less, by an increase of the supply in proportion to the demand, which reduces them. And

9. The effects of a diminution of the supply over the demand, which increases prices, will be neutralized, more or less, by a contraction of the currency, which reduces them.

The converse of the last two propositions are also true.

10. Another cause tending to raise and depress the prices of property, and the wages of labor, is an increase or decrease of taxes. Taxes tend to elevate prices in proportion to their amount. To illustrate—if there were no taxes, every man would enjoy all the income of his property and labor. If he is taxed, that income is reduced in proportion to the amount of the tax. If his property and his labor cannot produce enough means to supply the amount taken by the Government for taxes, it has precisely the same effect as diminishing the demand in proportion to the supply. Men will not lessen their income if they can help it. If from any cause the amount of the products of property and labor are diminished, they will increase prices and wages, in order to make up the deficiency. If the Government takes ten bushels of grain, or a bale of cotton, or the value of a day's work, or, what is the same thing, the citizen is obliged to sell that amount, in order to obtain money enough to pay his taxes, the effect is precisely the same as if the income, or supply of his property or labor, was reduced that amount. To make up the deficiency, he will add to the prices of his property or the wages of his labor. Again, for example, if five dollars are exacted from the laborer, in the form of taxes, he must increase the wages of his labor enough to make up the deficiency, and support himself and family as comfortably as he did before. All political economists, I believe, agree in the principle that taxes tend to elevate prices and wages. In European countries, where the laborer is the victim of a despotism, either political or social, the capitalist pays the tax, and labor, therefore, may not be so much affected by taxes as in this country, where he shares in the power of Government, and the support of its burdens.

Having, Mr. Chairman, stated the propositions or elements of the problem of fluctuations, I shall now proceed to demonstrate it by facts, figures, and plain deductions from them.

Fortunately for me, sir, there are two periods in the history of this country parallel to each other in causes and effects, which afford a complete illustration of the truth of the propositions I have just laid down, so far as the actual connection of practical experience with abstract principle can be perceived. I allude, sir, to those periods of our history embracing the years 1812 to 1819, and the years 1833 to 1839 inclusive.

In the first period, two causes operated to produce the high prices which all descriptions of property commanded, and particularly articles of provision. Those causes were, an extraordinary expansion of the currency, and a decrease of supply in proportion to the demand. More remote causes operated partially. During the first two years of the first period I have named, the country was in a state of war. The Government then was the great consumer. It wanted beef, pork, flour, and other articles of provision for the support of the armies which it was obliged to keep in the field and to maintain. The demand for all articles of provision was vastly increased over ordinary times. This, sir, had a powerful tendency to elevate prices.

The Government also called into its service large bodies of men, most of whom were before engaged in agricultural pursuits, and in the business of production. This tended to diminish the supply in proportion to the demand, and thus to increase prices. These were two powerful causes, operating to enhance the prices of every kind of property. For, if agricultural products rise in price, farms would also rise in value. And if a large portion of those who labored on farms, and in other pursuits, were abstracted from such occupations to the camp and field, as was the fact, the wages of labor must necessarily rise. But there was still another cause which operated at that time, and also tended, more powerfully than all other causes, to enhance prices. It was an extraordinary expansion of the currency, growing, in a great measure, out of the exigencies of the Government, which was compelled to put in requisition a vast amount of pecuniary means, to sustain itself in the severe and perilous conflict in which it was engaged.

A few facts will show the extent of the expansion of the currency during that period. In 1811 the currency in circulation in the country was, of paper, twenty-eight and a half millions, and specie, fifteen millions; making in the whole forty-three millions; (See Mr. Woodbury's table of Circulations, House Doc. No 27, 2d session 23d Congress.) In 1813 it was estimated by Mr. Crawford, that the circulation was $70,000,000. In 1815 it had swollen to $110,000,000; and this amount, says Mr. Crawford, was probably augmented in 1816. In 1819, according to the same authority, the circulation was contracted to $45,000,000, being a reduction of more than fifty per cent. from 1816; (Mr. Crawford's Report, page 24, 1820; reprinted in House Doc. No. 51, 23d Congress, 1st session.)

Thus the causes which operated to enhance prices during the first period I have named, were, first, a great demand, which was occasioned by the Government being then a great consumer; second, a diminished supply, occasioned by the abstraction of productive labor from the business of production; and third, and the most powerful of all the causes, a great and rapid expansion of the currency, which rose, as before stated, from 1811 to 1816, from $43,000,000 to $110,000,000, more than doubling itself.

Those causes operated in 1812 and the intermediate years to 1816. During this year and 1817, an extraordinary cause intervened to enhance the price of agricultural products by decreasing the supply. That cause was the cold season of 1816, which cut off the crops of that year. At this period commenced the retrograde movement, and a most tremendous and disastrous revulsion followed, arriving at its flood tide in 1819, which rocked this country from centre to extremities, as if shaken and convulsed by an earthquake, the causes of which I shall endeavor to assign before I sit down.

The effects of the causes I have assigned, for the increase of prices during the first period I have selected, are most strikingly visible in the prices of beef, pork, flour, cotton, wool, and almost every other article of traffic and commerce, as will be seen by the tables I have been at great pains to obtain, and which I now introduce.

The first table, Mr. Chairman, exhibits the wholesale prices of beef, pork, flour, and numerous other articles, obtained from the prices current in the market of Boston, quoted from contemporaneous newspapers, the very best authority that can be procured for the facts embodied in the table. The second table exhibits the prices of flour in the market of Philadelphia, from 1812 to the present year:

From these tables, Mr. Chairman, it appears that beef, which in the market of Boston was $12 50 per barrel, in 1812, rose to $18 in 1815; pork from $9 to $18; flour from $10 to $13 in 1814; corn from 88 cents per bushel to $1 70; rye from $1 00 to $2 25; and butter and cheese in the same proportion. Tea, coffee, and other articles of foreign production, consumed in families, were subject to the same fluctuation.

In the Philadelphia market, flour rose from $8 92 per barrel to $11 69 in 1817, which year was the acme of high prices.

The operations of the Government from 1812 to 1815, gave the impulse to the expansion of business, and the inflation of prices; but that impulse continued to be felt after the Government had ceased to be the consumer, and the labor abstracted by it had returned to its original pursuits. The great operations of the war, carried on by the Government, engendered a fever of speculation and overaction, very similar to that through which we have just passed. The banks, as I have said before, expanded their issues and "facilities," increasing the circulation of the country from $43,000,000 in 1811 to $110,000,000 in 1816. This led to a vast system of overtrading and speculation, which was followed by the revulsion of 1819, and which was more disastrous and desolating in its consequences than any calamity that has ever yet befallen this country. The effects of that fever of speculation, sir, were seen in every form of business. But the most unerring indications of the state of the times are to be found in the increase of the sales of the public lands, which rose from $835,427 in 1813, to $3,274,422, in 1819, when the bubble of inflation and extravagance burst. The excess of imports over ex-

, during the period embraced in the years 8 to 1819, was $182,595,846 averaging

$36,519,169 each year; thus proving, that in addition to the national debt incurred by the Government during the war, the country in five years after, had incurred a debt of about one hundred and eighty millions for foreign merchandise.

I exhibit, Mr. Chairman, tables showing the amount of the sales of the public lands annually, from 1815 to 1824 inclusive; and also a table showing the amount of exports and imports, and the excess of imports over exports, from 1815 to 1819, inclusive.

The tables I have exhibited show that as soon as the country began to feel the stimulus of the causes which induce overaction, the effects were visible in the rapid increase of the sales of the public lands, and the great excess of imports over exports. It is proper, however, to remark, that, during the war, the commerce of the country was nearly destroyed; the exports for 1814 being but $6,927,753, and the imports $12,965,000. The removal of the restraints of a belligerant condition permitted the spirit of enterprise to roam unfettered; and having long been pent up, it ran into riot and excess in the first years of its renewed freedom.

A striking parallel to this period of our history, may be found in that period, dating at 1833, and including the intermediate years to 1838, which I shall endeavor to exhibit. Then, Mr. Chairman, followed the revulsion of 1819, the causes of which were, 1st, a sudden and unparallelled contraction of the currency. The circulation, which was $110,000,000 in 1816, was reduced to $45,000,000 in 1819, being nearly five-eighths of the whole amount. This, sir, of itself, was a sufficient cause for the tremendous fall in the prices of all kinds of property which ensued, and the startling and terrific pressure and distress which then swept over the country.

2. A diminution of the demand in proportion to the supply. The Government, from being the great consumer of the produce of the country, ceased comparatively to be a consumer. Its armies were disbanded, and the soldier returned to the fields of rural labor, and exerted the energies he had devoted to the defence of his country, in the business of production.

3. The cessation of high taxes, one of the elements of high prices, was another cause of the reduction of prices. Superadded to these causes was a depreciation of the currency, produced by a suspension of specie payments by all the banks south of New England, which also deranged, as every suspension does, the exchanges of the country.

The scenes, sir, which followed, are within the recollection of all who lived at that period. The most astounding fall in the prices of real estate, cattle, provisions, and property of any kind, took place. Thousands were utterly and hopelessly beggared and ruined; plunged, sir, from affluence to extreme poverty in a single day. A scene of distress and suffering ensued, such as this country never before nor since witnessed. I quote a few passages from Mr. Crawford's excellent report, which I have before referred to:

"In the latter part of 1818, when the price of the principal articles of American production had fallen nearly fifty per cent. in foreign markets; when the merchant needed the aid of additional loans to sustain him against the losses which he had incurred by the sudden reduction in the price of the commodities he had exported, he was called upon to discharge loans previously contracted. The agriculturist, who saw his income reduced below his indispensable necessities; the manufacturer, who was not only struggling against foreign competition, but who saw the sale of his manufactures reduced by the incapacity of his customers to buy; in fact, all classes of the community, under circumstances so adverse to the command of funds, were subjected to curtailments wherever they had obtained discounts.

"All intelligent writers upon currency agree that where it is decreasing in amount, poverty and misery must prevail. The correctness of the opinion is too manifest to require proof. The united voice of the nation attests its accuracy. As there is no recorded example in the history of nations of a reduction of the currency, so rapid and so extensive, so but few examples have occurred of distress so general and so severe as that which has been exhibited in the United States. To the evils of a decreasing currency are superadded those of a deficient currency. But notwithstanding it is deficient, it is still depreciated. In several of the States the great mass of the circulation is not even ostensibly convertible into specie at the will of the holder. During the greater part of the time that has elapsed since the resumption of specie payments, the convertibility of bank notes into specie has been rather nominal than real in the largest portion of the Union. On the part of the banks, mutual weakness had produced mutual forbearance. The extensive diffusion of bank stock among the great body of the citizens in most of the States, had produced the same forbearance among individuals. To demand specie of the banks, when it was known that they were unable to pay, was to destroy their own interests, by destroying the credit of the banks in which the productive portion of their property was invested. In favor of forbearance, was also added the influence of the great mass of bank debtors. Every dollar in specie drawn out of the banks especially for exportation, induced the necessity of curtailments. To this portion of the community all other evils were light, when compared with the imperious demands of banks. Their exertions to prevent the drain of specie in the possession of those who controlled their destiny, equalled the magnitude of the evils which were to be avoided.

"As the currency is, at least in some parts of the Union, depreciated, it must, in those parts, suffer a further reduction before it becomes sound. The nation must continue to suffer until this is effected. After the currency shall be reduced to the amount which, when the present quantity of the precious metals is distributed among the various nations of the world, in proportion to their respective exchangeable values, shall be assigned to the United States; when time shall have regulated the price of labor, and of commodities, according to that amount; and when pre-existing engagements shall have been adjusted, the sufferings from a depreciated, decreasing, and deficient currency, will be terminated. Individual and public prosperity will gradually revive, and the productive energies of the nation resume their accustomed activity. But new changes in the currency, and circumstances adverse to the perpetuity of the general prosperity, may reasonably be expected to occur. So far as these changes depend upon the currency, their recurrence, to an extent sufficient to disturb the prosperity of the nation, would be effectually prevented, if it could be rendered purely metallic. In that event, we should always retain that proportion of the precious metals which our exchangeable commodities bear to those of other nations. The currency would seldom be either redundant or deficient, to an extent that would seriously affect the interests of society. But when the currency is metallic, and paper convertible into specie, changes to such an extent, it is believed, will frequently occur."

Mr. Crawford attributed this vast and appalling amount of suffering, to the contraction and derangement of the currency. This, sir, is what he says on this point:

"That the establishment of banks, in agricultural districts, has greatly improved the general appearance of the country, is not denied. Comfortable mansions and spacious barns have been erected; lands have been cleared and reduced to cultivation; farms have been stocked, and rendered more productive, by the aid of bank credits. But these improvements will eventually be found, in most cases, to effect the ruin of the proprietor. The farm, with its improvements, will frequently prove unequal to the discharge of the debts incurred in its embellishment. Such, in fact, is the actual or apprehended state of things wherever banks have been established in the small inland towns and villages. Poverty and distress are impending over the heads of most of those who have attempted to improve their farms by the aid of bank credits. So general is this distress, that the principal attention of the State Legislatures, where the evil exists, is, at this moment, directed to the adoption of measures calculated to rescue their fellow-citizens from the inevitable effects of their own indiscretion. If, in affording a shield to the debtor, against the legal demand of his creditor, the axe shall be applied to the root of the evil, by the annihilation of banks where they ought never to have existed, the interference, however doubtful in point of policy or principle, may eventually be productive of more good than evil.

"The general system of credit, which has been introduced through the agency of banks, brought home to every man's door, has produced a factitious state of things, extremely adverse to the sober, frugal, and industrious habits which ought to be cherished in a Republic. In the place of these virtues, extravagance, idleness, and the spirit of gambling adventure have been engendered and fostered by our institutions.

"The system of credit, which, in the infancy of our commerce, was indispensable to its prosperity, if not to its existence, has been extended at a period when the dictates of sound discretion seemed to require that it should be shortened. The credit given upon the sale of the national domain has diffused this spirit of speculation and of inordinate enterprise among the great mass of our citizens. The public lands are purchased, and splendid towns erected upon them, with bank credits. Every thing is artificial. The rich inhabitant of the commercial cities, and the tenant of the forests, differ only in the object of their pursuit. Whether commerce, splendid mansions, or public lands, be the object of desire, the means by which the gratification is to be secured are bank credits.

"This state of things is no less unfriendly to the duration of our Republican institutions, than it is adverse to the development of our national energies, when great emergencies shall arise; for, upon such occasions, the attention of the citizen will be directed to the preservation of his property from the grasp of his creditors, instead of being devoted to the defence of his country. Instead of being able to pay with promptitude the contributions necessary to the preservation of the State, he will be induced to claim the interference of the Government to protect him against the effects of his folly and extravagance."

Such, Mr. Chairman, were the phenomena exhibited in that period of our history, commencing in 1815, and ending in 1819, the problem of which I have attempted to solve. How perfect is the resemblance between that period and the last two years!

I shall now, sir, take a brief view of the parallel of the period of our history which I have just been considering, which is to be found in that period embracing the years 1834 to 1839.

It will be seen by the table of prices in the Boston markets, which I have already introduced, that from 1819 to 1832, the prices of beef, pork, flour, wool, and cotton, were comparatively low. At that date they commenced rising until most of those articles attained the extraordinary prices of 1837 and 1838, the causes of which, I shall now proceed to assign, and which will be found to be the very same which led to the increase of prices during the former period. They were—

1. An expansion of the currency. This was commenced by the United States Bank, which had then embarked in its crusade against the Government to force from it a re-charter. It commenced the game of expansion in 1832, after Gen. Jackson had avowed his hostility to that institution. During the first six months of that year, it increased its loans from $43,000,000 to over $70,000,000. To verify the prediction of its friends, that there would be constant fluctuation and instability in the currency and the business of the country, until a new bank was chartered, and to pave the way for the panic which was to follow the removal of the deposites, in August of 1833, it commenced its first system of contraction, and, in less than one year, reduced its loans and discounts nearly $17,000,000, and its circulation about $3,000,000; at the same time increasing the specie in its vaults about the same amount; which was abstracted from circulation, and contributed its due proportion to the panic which followed. It failed in its object. The deposites were not returned to that institution.

In 1834 the bank commenced its second grand scheme of expansion, with the premeditated design of coercing from the Government a new charter, and which superinduced the revulsion and panic of 1837. On the 1st of September, 1834, the loans of the United States Bank were $47,058,493; specie, $13,863,897; circulation, $10,298,577. On the 1st of June, 1835, a period of nine months only, it had increased its loans to $68,642,646; its circulation to $22,009,474; its specie remaining about the same as in 1834. The small banks followed the lead of the mammoth institution. On the 1st of January, 1834, the whole number of banks in the United States was 506; the aggregate amount of their loans, $324,119,499; circulation, $94,839,520. They increased in number, amount of discounts, and circulation, to January 1, 1837, when their number was 634; their loans and discounts $525,115,702; and their circulation $149,185,840. Thus was added, in the space of three years, $200,996,203 to the loans and discounts, affecting individuals; and $54,346,320 to the circulation, affecting the community generally; being an increase of the former of nearly two-fifths, and of the latter, more than one-third; and adding to the banking "accommodations" of the country, more than TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY FOUR MILLIONS. I will here note the effects of this first cause which was sufficient of itself to account for the inflation of prices, the overtrading and general overaction which ensued. The effects were immediately visible in the excessive importations which were made, and in the sales of the public lands. Before 1834 the excess of the imports over the exports was not unreasonably great.

Year.	Exports.	Imports.	Excess.
1834	$104,356,975	$126,521,332	$24,184,359
1835	121,693,577	149,895,742	28,202,165

1836	128,663,040	189,980,635	61,316,99!
1837	117,414,376	140,989,217	23,579,84
		Excess,	$135,273,36

Thus was a debt incurred to foreign merchants of over one hundred and thirty-five millions, stimulated by the expansion of the currency. The same effect was visible in the sales of the public lands, which rose from $3,967,681, in 1833, to $24,877,179,* in 1836, the year when the expansion was at its acme, and the country bore the appearance of the greatest prosperity, but which was delusive, and, in truth, portended a sudden reaction.

2. Another cause of the rise of prices, and particularly of agricultural products and farms, was the diminution of the supply in proportion to the demand. This was produced by two minor causes operating to effect it.

3. The first and most prominent, was the abstraction of labor from the business of production. During this period of unbridled enterprise and extravagance, the States, as well as corporations, embarked largely in schemes of internal improvements, in building railroads and canals. They had borrowed immense sums from Europe, to carry on the stupendous projects, which they had commenced. They employed a vast number of laborers, who, by that change of pursuit, became consumers, instead of being producers, thus increasing the demand in proportion to the supply; which was much less than it would have been, if it had not been for the abstraction of that amount of labor from the business of production which was employed on public works.

4. Another cause, sir, was the unfruitful seasons of 1835, '36, and '37, which also tended to diminish the proportion of the supply to the demand. The effect of all this was, to increase the prices of all agricultural products, and of farms, and also of the wages of labor, which were affected by like causes.

Another striking effect was visible in the importation of foreign grain. Instead of exporting large quantities, as we had heretofore done, the country did not raise enough for its own consumption. I exhibit, sir, a table, which shows the amount of grain imported from 1835 to 1839:

T. L. SMITH, Register.

Register's Office, April 2d, 1840.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, it appears that, during the first period of five years, which was before the causes I have assigned for high prices were felt in their full force, but the small amount of 5,035 bushels of wheat was imported, for which $5,147 were paid; and 6,063 bushels of oats, for which $1,658 were paid. During the second period of five years, the period during which those causes of high prices were felt in their full force, 5,611,335 bushels of wheat, for which were paid $5,764 972; and 232,761 bushels of oats, for which $71,807. In 1839, these causes had ceased to operate, and but a small amount of foreign grain was imported.

It is unnecessary for me, Mr. Chairman, to depict the scenes of enterprise run mad, and the spirit of wild and gambling speculation which followed, for the picture is familiar to every mind. The bubble extended in size, until it reached its most attenuated limits of expansion, when it burst. Then followed the revulsion and panic of 1837, ushered in by the grand explosion of the banks, which had been the authors of all this splendid pageant of empty prosperity, and all the real distress, desolation, and ruin, which followed.

I will, Mr. Chairman, state briefly the immediate cause which led to this revulsion.

1. The first and chief cause was the contraction of the circulation, and of banking facilities. On the first of January, 1838, the amount of the loans and discounts of all the banks of the United States, was $485,631,687; and of their circulation, $116,138,910; thus showing a contraction of discounts to the amount of $39,484,015, which affected individuals directly; and $33,046,930 in the circulation, which affected the community generally; making an aggregate curtailment of banking "accommodations" and "facilities" of more than SEVENTY-FOUR MILLIONS. This, with the alarm created by the explosion of the banks, caused the distresses of 1837.

But the spirit of infatuated speculation had not quite died away. The country had not quite recovered from its state of inebriation and delusion. It suffered a partial relapse, as will be seen by the facts I shall exhibit. In 1838 another partial expansion of the currency took place, and the usual phenomena were immediately visible, viz: a revival of business, a renewed spirit of speculation, overimportation, and overtrading. On the 1st of January, 1839, the amount of loans of all the banks in the United States was $492,278,015; circulation $135,170,995; being an increase of loans over the preceding year of $16,646,331, and of circulation, which affected the country most, of $19,032,065; aggregate increase of loans and circulation, $35,678,396. This increase of the stimulus of trade and speculation was at once visible in the business of the country, and particularly in the excess of the imports over the exports. In 1838, the year following the revulsion of 1837, and the year of repose, the exports were $108,486,616, imports $113,717,404; which was not a greater excess than a sound and healthy trade would warrant. In 1839, after the partial expansion of the circulation, and of other bank facilities in 1838, the exports were $121,023,410, imports $162,092,132; exhibiting the enormous excess of imports over exports of $41,068,722 in one year. Cause and effect were never more closely connected.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, briefly notice the causes that led to the fall of prices which has taken place during the last six months. As to the distress which is said to prevail by Federal orators and Federal newspapers, there is nothing in it. There is, in fact, but little, if any real distress in the country, as I shall prove presently. The causes which have induced a fall of prices, are—

1. A contraction of the currency. On the 1st of January, 1837, the amount of circulation was $149,185,840. On the 1st of January, 1840, it was $106,968,572; showing a reduction of $42,217,268, since January 1, 1837, and $28,109,433, since January 1, 1839. Such a sudden diminution of the measure of value, is alone sufficient to account, in a great degree, for the great reduction of prices which followed.

2. Another cause was the diminution of the demand in proportion to the supply. This was produced by two sub-causes, viz: the favorable seasons; and the return of the labor abstracted by works of internal improvement, and engaged in speculation, to the business of production. The public works have generally been suspended, and the vast number of laborers employed upon them, have returned to the cultivation of the earth. Instead of being consumers, they have become producers, and the consequence is, a vast increase of agricultural products in proportion to the demand for them. A fall in the prices of agricultural products, of wheat, of corn, of pork, of beef, of every thing produced by the farmer or planter, was therefore inevitable.

NOTE.—It is proper here to remark, that the article of cotton is not so much affected by the causes operating upon prices here, as in England, in which country most of it is consumed. The prices of cotton in the markets of England and this country, depend upon the condition of the manufacturing interests, and the state of the currency in England. If the manufacturing interests are depressed, the demand ceases, and the prices fall. The Bank of England, by the exercise of its power, in refusing its accommodations to the American houses in London, through which the business of the American exporter was done, caused the great fall of the prices of American cotton in 1836. These things are too fresh in the minds of American planters to require further proof.

The table of prices in the Boston market is a complete thermometer, indicating unerringly the effects of an expansion of the currency, and the operation of other causes tending to raise and depress prices. The expansions and contractions of the currency, and the rise and fall of prices consequent upon them, show a most perfect connection of cause and effect.

Mr. Chairman, the intelligent farmers of this country must perceive the truth of the positions I have assumed, and they will be convinced that the Administration is not responsible for the fall of prices which has taken place within the last nine months. I appeal, sir, to the good sense of that numerous and powerful class of my fellow-citizens, and I ask them, if the Government could control the banks, and compel them to issue their paper in greater abundance? Would it have been the best policy, if it could have done it? Have those arrogant and lawless institutions, even regarded the authority of law and the welfare of the community, when it has been their interest to trample upon both? Let their recent conduct answer. Could the Government control Divine Providence in the dispensation of its blessings and beneficence? Could it shut out the vivifying sun-light of heaven? Could it arrest the refreshing shower in its descent upon the earth? Could it forbid man to labor and till the earth, and could it prevent the soil from giving forth its abundance? Through the audacious and daring wickedness of the banks, the circulating medium, which is the measure of value, has been cut short. Through the benevolence of the Father of all, the seasons have been congenial, and the earth has yielded her fruits in profusion. These are the prime causes of the fall of prices. Is the Government to be blamed for all this? I put it, sir, to the hearts and consciences of the honest and intelligent yeomanry of this country. I would not, deceive them in this matter if I could, for all my sympathies are with them. I was one of them once. I have toiled in the field with my own hands, and have performed all the onerous labors of the husbandman. I have mingled with that class from early life. I know their worth, their love of truth, their honesty, and integrity of character; and believe me, Mr. Chairman, when that class of our fellow-citizens render their verdict upon the great question now at issue before them, it will be just and correct. I, for one, fear not the result.

I shall now, Mr. Chairman, proceed to demonstrate, so far as they are susceptible of demonstration by facts and figures, the causes of the fluctuations which take place in the wages of labor.

It will be recollected, sir, that the doctrine now advanced by the Federal party, and particularly by the honorable gentleman before alluded to, [Mr. DAVIS,] is, that a paper currency tends to elevate the wages of labor, and, therefore, is the best currency for the workingman; and that a metallic currency tends to diminish the wages of labor, and, therefore, is hostile to the interests of the workingman.

The professors of this school of political economists take the fact, that the wages of labor are high in this country, which, in their phrase, is a "paper money Government," and low in the countries of Europe, which they assume are "hard money despotisms;" and one of the corollaries is, that paper money, manufactured by man, is the friend of freedom; and hard money, made by God himself especially for the use of man, as the true measure of value throughout the world, is the friend of despotism! They, therefore, contend that the Independent Treasury, which will have a tendency to make the banks resume specie payments, and render the currency which they furnish sound and stable, (so far as paper or mixed currency can be,) and, to some extent, reduce the nominal prices of property from inflated to sound prices, is hostile to the inte-

* The following table shows the effect of the expansion upon the sales of the public lands:

Year.	Amount of sales.
1834	4,857,600
1835	14,757,600
1836	24,877,179
1837	6,776,236
1838	3,081,939
First three quarters of 1839, including also sums collected that year in Treasury notes	5,417,280

Like the excess of importations, the amount was greatest in 1836; much less in 1837, very low in 1838, but in 1839 they revived—the consequence of the expansion in 1838.

rests of the workingmen, and should, therefore, be opposed by them.

This, sir, is the argument put forth from a high position, [the Hon. Mr. DAVIS,] reiterated here, and trumpeted by all the presses of that party throughout the Union. It is, that the wages of labor in this country, in which the paper system reigns supreme, are high as compared with the different countries of Europe, which the Whig champions of the working classes contend are "hard money despotisms." And hence paper money is the friend of liberty and the poor man, and hard money the friend of despotism and the enemy of the poor man.

I will, Mr. Chairman, first despatch the Whig argument upon this subject, and then show the true causes which tend to raise and depress the wages of labor.

I concede, at once, that the wages of the laborer are low in all the countries of Europe. Indeed, sir, we have but a faint idea of the degradation, poverty, and misery of the working classes in European countries. Now if the Governments of those countries are in fact "hard money" Governments, as the Federal advocates of the laborer contend, there would be some plausibility in the assertion that a metallic currency is the cause of the low wages and the poor rewards of labor in Europe. But if it turns out to be the fact that those very countries of Europe are like our own, "paper money" Governments, instead of "hard money" despotisms, then, sir, the Whig argument is completely exploded. Or if it turns out to be the fact, that wages in all the countries of Europe, whether the currency circulating in them be paper or metallic, are at the same rate of depression, then the Whig argument is alike exploded.

I shall now proceed to show that many of the countries of Europe are paper money countries; and that in those countries in which a metallic currency circulates, wages are as high as they are in paper money countries. If I show this, sir, other causes must be assigned for the depressed condition of the laborer than that he lives in a country in which specie alone circulates, and is the victim of a "hard money despotism."

On this subject, Mr. Chairman, I have collected a mass of facts from the most authentic sources, and shall, to avoid all doubt or dispute as to their accuracy, give my authority. I begin with ENGLAND.

Wages of labor.—In ordinary times, the poor laborer gets from $2 50 to $3 per week. In seasons of distress, he gets but $2. In each case he is obliged to find his own board and lodging.—See Wade's History of the Working Classes, page 538, and testimony taken before the anti-corn law meeting, London, March 26, 1839.

Government.—A limited monarchy.

Currency. England, like this country, is a paper money country. In 1810, after the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of England, its circulation was almost exclusively paper. Its amount at that time was 220,500,000.—See Mr. Woodbury's table of circulations, House Document No. 27, 2d session, 23d Congress.

FRANCE.

Wages.—The laborer averages, the year through, 16 cents per day.—See British Consular Reports, pages 6, 22, 30, and 39.

Government.—A limited monarchy.

Currency.—Specie and paper—the former predominating.—See Mr. W's table of circulations.

CORSICA.

Wages.—The male laborer gets 24 cents a day, and the female 11 cents.—Con. Rep. 64.

Government.—Subject to France.

Currency.—In Corsica wages are paid in specie.

PRUSSIA.

Wages.—The male laborer gets from 8 to 13 cents per day for the longest days, and about one-third less during the shortest days. The female gets a little more than half as much.—Con. Rep. p. 76.

Government.—A despotism.

Currency.—Paper and specie—the latter predominating.—Mr. W's table of circulations.

GERMANY.

Wages.—The male laborer gets from 13 to 19 cents per day. The female gets about three-fifths as much.—Con. Reps. p. 85.

Government.—A despotism.

Currency.—The circulation of Germany is a mixture of paper and specie, and at times the former has been greatly depreciated.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

Wages.—A regular farm male servant gets from $22 to $28 per annum. A female servant is paid half as much. Laborers get from 18 to 20 stivers in the summer, and from 14 to 16 in the winter.—Con. Rep. p. 125.

Government.—A limited monarchy.

Currency.—The circulation of Holland and Belgium is a mixture of paper and specie, the latter greatly predominating.

AUSTRIAN PROVINCES.

Wages.—Trieste. A field laborer gets one shilling sterling (22 cents) per day, one half of which is deducted if board and lodging is found. Milan. The head man gets from one to two livres per day in harvest time; half that amount at other times. Genoa. Laborers receive from 5l. to 8l. per day besides their diet. Leghorn. The day laborer gets 6l a day and food in summer.—Con. Reps. pp. 154, 162, 165, 168, and 169.

Government.—A despotism.

Currency.—The circulation of Austria is half paper and half specie.—Mr. W's table of circulation.

RUSSIA.

Wages.—There is no such thing as wages paid to laborers in Russia; the laborer being bought and sold with the soil on which he lives. He is a mere slave.

Government.—A despotism.

Currency.—The circulation of Russia is almost entirely paper, which is depreciated two-thirds in value, one specie rouble being worth three paper roubles.—Mr. W's table of circulations.

CUBA.

I have no authentic information from this country. It is said, however, that wages are high, the slave earning $1 50 per day. Mechanic labor is three dollars per day.

Government.—Subject to Spain; a limited monarchy.

Currency.—Entirely specie.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, it will be perceived by the facts I have stated, that in all the different countries of Europe, whether the circulation be paper or metallic, or a mixture of both, the wages of the laborer are very much depressed, being at nearly the same rate in all those countries. In England, sir, they are a little higher than in some of the countries of the continent, but even in that country the laborer is as much depressed as in countries in which his wages are a little lower. To show the condition of the farm laborer in England, I copy from the testimony taken before the anti-corn law meeting, held in London in 1839:

"Wm. Holman examined. I am a farm laborer. I have been employed in North Town five years. I have a wife and four children. My wages are 8s per week (about $2.) Some times I have received 7s and three pints of cider. The latter was worth 1s 6d. I now receive 1s instead. My eldest girl is employed occasionally, and then receives 8d per day. At present they can get no employment. They consume six loaves of bread a week—made of second flour. The loaf is 7½d. In the week we consume 16d worth of potatoes. We have sometimes, in the course of the week, 1½d of skimmed milk, and at other times, half a dozen salt herrings, at 8d per dozen. In the course of a month, we might get 2lbs. of meat at 5½d per lb. Every two weeks we have a pound of bacon at 7d—that and the fish last a fortnight. When we have meat, we don't have bacon for three weeks after. We have ¼lb cocoa a week, at 3d. We cannot afford sugar. We have 1lb. salt at ½d. We have ¼lb. candles at 6d per lb. My rent is 2s per week. I have not bought any clothes for five years; a gentleman gave me some old ones. When bread and potatoes were cheap, I could buy some clothes, but as long as they remain as at present, I am certain I cannot. I sent a child to school some time back, but could not afford to pay 2d per week. Some years ago bread was cheaper, but wages were the same. Bread has risen, but wages not. I am in debt seven weeks' rent. I have been steadily employed for five years."

An able writer remarks:

"Here is an intelligent farm laborer of persevering industry, who, with his wife and four children, six souls, received per week - - - - - - - - 8s 0d

They consume six loaves at 7½d	-	3s 11 d
Potatoes - - - -	-	1 4 d
Milk - - - -	-	1½d
Herrings - - - -	-	4 d
Bacon - - - -	-	3½d
Cocoa, salt and candles	-	5 d
Rent - - - -	-	2s
		8s 5d.

"With this small fare he goes behindhand 5d, consequently is in, debt seven weeks' rent.' This is the condition of the laboring classes in England, where the paper system prevails to its fullest extent, and the evidence of this man shows conclusively that his condition has become worse, as the paper currency has increased. He says four or five years ago, he could live as well, and buy some clothes, which now he cannot do—'bread has advanced and wages not.' Four or five years ago the numerous joint stock banks in England first began to exert that influence on business which resulted, in connection with similar causes here, in producing the explosion of 1836. In that period immense fortunes were made, and speculation ran riot; but at the same time the condition of the farm laborer, who was producing the actual wealth of the country, was growing worse."

In those countries in which wages are actually lower than they are in England, the difference is more than made up by the greater cheapness of all articles of comfort and necessity. I copy from the consular reports, for example, the prices of clothing for a laborer in Corsica:

Jacket,	lasting	24	months,	8	francs
Cap,	do.	"	do.	1	do. 50 centimes
Waistcoat,	do.	36	do.	4	do.
Pantaloons,	do.	18	do.	5	do.
Shirt,	do.	12	do.	3	do. 50 "
Pair of shoes,		6	do.	6	do.

28 francs.

About $5 25.

The laborer, as I have before shown, gets 24 cents a day in Corsica. He would, therefore, be obliged to work 22 days to earn the clothing which will last him nearly two years. In the United States, the workingman cannot be clothed short of $40 per annum, and therefore if he received $1 per day for his labor, he would be obliged to work 40 days in order to clothe himself. The workingman gains nothing by high wages, if every thing he wants in the shape of food and clothing is higher in proportion than his wages.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these are facts, stubborn facts, from which there is no escape. And what, are the plain and irresistible deductions from them? We observe, in the first place, that the wages of the laborer in all the countries of Europe, are but a mere pittance, just sufficient to keep body and soul together. In England, a "paper money" country, with a currency more like our own than any other, the wages of labor are nearly as low (lower in comparison with the prices of provisions &c. consumed in families) as in any other country, in which the circulation is, in the main, specie. And in Russia, the worst paper money Government in Europe, with a paper currency greatly depreciated, more so than our currency has ever been in its worst condition, the laborer is a mere slave, and bought and sold with the estate on which he happens to live.

In order to show that it is not a paper currency which elevates the wages of labor, I will exhibit a table of the wages paid for weaving, as connected with the currency at different periods, in England.

TABLE.

Year.	CIRCULATION. Paper mill's.*	Specie. mill's.	Reeds.	Fineness of twist.	Shoots across.	Wages per yd.
1796,		101	60	70	112	1s. 6d.
1797,	115	96	60	64	120	1s. 2d.

[Hazard's Statistical Register, vol. 2, p. 264; and Mr. Woodbury's Table of Circulations.

Thus it will be seen that, in 1796, before the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of England, and before specie had been driven from that country, and given place to an inundation of paper, the weaver got one shilling and sixpence for weaving a yard of cloth. As paper money became more abundant, and consequently more depreciated, the wages of the weaver fell in nominal price, and in real compensation. When paper was most abundant, and when, according to the Whig argument, wages should have been highest, they were in fact the lowest, having depreciated two-thirds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is not the conclusion irresistible, that the kind of currency is not the cause of the great depression of the wages of labor in Europe? For, sir, we have seen that the poor laborer is equally depressed in all the countries in Europe, whether they be "paper money," or "hard money," despotisms.

Now, sir, what are the causes of the low wages of labor in Europe, if they are not to be found in the kind of currency in use there? I answer, they are to be found in the political and social institutions of those countries. There, sir, the poor laborer is in truth enslaved. He is tied down by the irresistible force of circumstances, which bind him to his employer, with cords as potent as those which bind the slave to his master. There wealth and power predominate over the people. There the haughty and arrogant capitalist, whether he be the lord, with his ancestral acres, or the manufacturing monopolist, with his accumulated millions, has usurped the power of legislation and the authority of Government. They wield it for their their own aggrandizement, and, through its agency, they have established, even in England, a despotism over the laboring masses, nearly as oppressive and implacable as that which exists in Russia. Having the power over the laborer and operative, they doom him to unremitting toil, from the morning dawn to the setting sun, and then wrench from him all his earnings, except a bare pittance, just sufficient to keep him in existence, that they may riot in plenty, luxury, and profligacy. These are the causes of the great depression and degradation of the workingmen of Europe. They are to be found, sir, in the social and political institutions of the countries of that portion of the world, which wrest from the laborer his political rights, and then rob and plunder him of the produce of his sweat and toil.

Here, Mr. Chairman, in this country, the paradise of the poor, if there is any for them any where on this earth, the workingman moves upon a different theatre. The spirit of freedom ennobles him. The glorious institutions of our country place him upon the platform of equality with the proudest and the most powerful, and clothe him with that potent weapon, the ballot, to protect and defend himself from the encroachments of power and wealth. With that most potent weapon in his hand—more potent than the monarch's sceptre—with a consciousness of his power and his rights stamped upon his heart, and with the enthusiasm of liberty stirring up the noble impulses of his soul, the workingman of this country cannot be enslaved. Here the capitalist and the employer cannot degrade the workingman to the condition of the serfs of Europe, nor deprive him of the just earnings of his labor. In addition to the protection which our institutions give him, the vast national domain, still unsettled, offers him an asylum against the oppression of the employer. If the capitalist turns him out of employment, he can go to the great West, cultivate the soil, and become not only comfortable, but independent in his condition. And, sir, the very consciousness that the soil which gives him subsistence is his own, inspires him with the spirit of independence, and gives him the soul of a freeman. He would not then humble himself before his arrogant employer, and sacrifice the sacred right of freedom of opinion and conscience, to save himself from starvation. No, sir, the God of Heaven is the almoner of the bounties he receives, and virtuous industry the means by which he secures them. Here, then, the laborer cannot be degraded while our present institutions exist. But the wages of labor may be affected, to some extent, by the same causes which operate to produce the rise and fall in the prices of property. I will take the same periods to illustrate this point.

During the war, the wages of labor were high. The causes were: 1st. An expansion of the currency. 2d. The supply of labor was not so great in proportion to the demand as at other times. Men were called from the productive pursuits as before stated, to the field and the ocean, to serve their country. Thus the number of producers was reduced, while the consumers increased; labor became more scarce, and consequently more valuable, and wages rose. In 1819 they fell in some degree, from the same causes which led to the fall of the prices of property.

During the corresponding period, from 1833 to 1839, the same phenomena in cause and effect are to be observed. The banks expanded their circulation—that was one cause. The fever of speculation and of visionary enterprise commenced. The States as well as individuals embarked in extensive schemes of internal improvement. This diverted a large amount of labor from the productive pursuits. The amount of labor left was therefore less, and the wages of labor were proportionably enhanced. Others embarked in speculation, thus diverting another portion of labor from the productive pursuits, and tending to elevate wages. A scarcity of crops, as before shown, intervened, thereby increasing the value of agricultural products, and enhancing the wages of those who produced them.

The causes which have tended to reduce the wages of labor, if they have suffered much reduction, are a contraction of the currency—a suspension of works of internal improvement, thus throwing back large numbers of laborers to the pursuits of agriculture—good seasons and bountiful crops—the same causes which operated to depress the prices of property.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these effects were primarily produced by the banks and by Providence itself. The banks, sir, were the cause of the extraordinary expansions and contractions of the currency, which accomplished most of the mischief. And God himself gave us good seasons or bad; plenty or scarcity of crops. As I said before, the earth is his, the genial sunshine is his, the refreshing rains are his, the cold and the heat are sent by him. He dispenses all as suits him best, and for the best in the end. Yet all the effects of the causes which I have assigned, are unjustly and falsely charged by the Whig orators and presses, to the measures of the Government.

Sir, the Government is not in fault. It has endeavored, by its own acts and measures, to prevent the effects of the mad career of the banks. Yet, with an audacity unparallelled, the advocates of those arrogant and soulless corporations charge the very sins which they commit, to the Government. Was ever such impudence surpassed?

On the contrary, the Administration and the Democratic party have attempted to arrest the high-handed course of corporate and associate wealth, in its lawless march to power, aggrandizement, and despotism, to which it aims and aspires. And hence, sir, its bitter, unrelenting, and persevering hostility to the party in power.

Having assigned the causes which have operated to produce the rise and fall in the prices of property and the wages of labor, I must be pardoned by the committee if I now cite a little authority, a little Whig authority, in favor of the views I have just advanced. I read from the message of the Hon. JOHN DAVIS, now Senator from Massachusetts, while he was Governor of that State, to the Legislature, in 1834:

"Fluctuations visit all who have property, and all who work to acquire it, with injury, and compel them to submit to severe sacrifices. What is called a scarcity of money, only means that the banks do not discount. Under a pressure thus occasioned, we have seen (before 1833) good estates dwindle, until their possessors were left bankrupt. We have seen LABORERS THROWN OUT OF EMPLOY, OR THEIR WAGES GREATLY REDUCED; and business either suspended or dragging those engaged in it towards ruin. We have seen, also, great anxiety and dismay pervade the whole public!"

Again:

"Believing that under our present system we may be again witness of these scenes of suffering, I cannot relinquish the hope that your wisdom [a Whig Legislature] will devise some way of giving greater stability to the local currency."

And again:

"Experience has long since proved that a METALLIC CURRENCY is least liable to fluctuations, and it is to be hoped the earliest opportunity will be seized to return to it so far at least as to rectify the present credit system of paper currency, and prevent its pernicious fluctuations."

These, sir, were the sound views of the statesman in 1834. I offset them against the views of the politician, as exhibited in the recent speech of the same honorable gentleman during the present session. It will be seen, when he spoke as a statesman, he assigned like causes for the distress of that period, and the depression of the wages of labor, to those which I have assigned.

I have now, Mr. Chairman, got through with my demonstration of the problem of fluctuations in the prices of property and the wages of labor. Intimately connected with the subject of currency is the subject of exchanges.

One of the great arguments of the Opposition in favor of a National Bank, which that party support as the antagonist of the Independent Treasury, is, that it is necessary to regulate the exchanges of the country; and the recent derangement of the exchanges, the advocates of that party contend, is to be attributed to the want of a National Bank. Convinced, as I am, that the views of the Opposition party, who support the banks, are not founded in fact, I will now proceed to demonstrate, by facts and figures, the problem of fluctuations in exchanges.

To illustrate the matter clearly and concisely as possible, I will, at the outset, explain what is technically understood by the mercantile term of Exchanges.

It grows out of the trade between two given points, or, what is the same thing, two different communities or nations—like New York and New Orleans, or the United States and England. The trade between communities or nations is like the trade between two individuals. One has commodities of different kinds, which it exchanges with the other for commodities which the latter possesses. The main branch of the trade is upon the barter principle. But, sir, by and by the parties adjust their account. They run up the debtor and creditor sides of the ledger, and they find that one community has had more of the commodities of the other than it has paid for in commodities of its own. It is, therefore, in debt to the amount of the difference, and that debt must be paid in money, or its equivalent—that money or its equivalent must be transferred by the debtor country to the creditor country, in order to balance the account. If, instead of money, the operation is performed in cash funds, it is technically called exchange. If the currencies of the two points or two countries are the same in value, the difference of exchange will be simply the cost and risk of transmitting cash funds from one country to the other. But if the currency is more depreciated in one country than in the other, the rate of exchange is just the difference between the value of the currency of the country in which it is depreciated, and the value of the currency in the country in which it is sound. In mercantile parlance, the operation of transferring balances in cash funds, is called exchange, and the difference in the value of the currencies of the two countries, the rate of exchange.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the causes which tend to increase or decrease the nominal rates of exchange.

1. The first cause is the balance of trade, which creates a demand for exchange; or, in other words, for specie funds, and which tends to increase the demand in proportion to the supply in the market. This cause will always operate.

2. The second and most powerful cause which tends to the derangement of the exchanges, and to increase their nominal rates, is the depreciation of the currency at one point, or at both. If the currency is deranged in one country, and sound in the other, the sound currency is the par standard by which the rates are graduated. If the currency is unsound at both points, the derangement increases, and the matter becomes more complicated.

I shall now, sir, proceed to illustrate this point by facts and figures. In the first place, I will take the exchanges between New York and London. We find, Mr. Chairman, on looking into the tables exhibiting the rates of exchange, that the premium or rate in New York for exchange on London, is from 7 to 9 7-10 per cent. when it is not affected by any great demand. Thus, it takes of the currency of New York $109 7-10 to pay a debt of $100 in London. The cause of this difference is this: In the prices current of New York, $4 44 4-9 are assumed as the par of exchange on England. That sum is the pound sterling, according to the old valuation of American coinage, expressed in dollars and cents. By the law of Congress of 1834, American gold was depreciated in value 9 7-10 per cent. as compared with the value of English gold. Thus one dollar in gold of the English coinage is worth one dollar 9 7-10 cents of American gold, according to our new valuation. The English sovereign—the gold coin representing the pound sterling—is now worth $4 87 and a fraction, instead of $4 44 4-9, making a little over 43 cents difference. This constitutes the main difference in the rates of exchange between the two countries. In other words, if we wish to pay a debt in London of $100 in American gold, we must add $9 07 to it to make it equal in real value to $100 in the currency of London.

The operation is this: A in New York, owes $100 to B in London. C in New York has money, or what is the same thing, credit, in the hands of D in London. A has the money to pay his debt, but does not like to send it across the Atlantic. He therefore goes to C, and gets him to pay his debt, and gives him $109 07 to pay B 100 in London. C draws his bill of exchange on D in favor of A, who endorses it to B, and he calls upon D, gets the money, and the debt is paid, without the transfer of a single cent across the Atlantic. These are principles applicable to foreign exchanges.

I am supposing the currency at both points to remain sound. If, from any cause, by a suspension of specie payments by the banks, for instance, the currency of New York becomes deranged, the rates of exchange will become also deranged, and will rise, nominally, or, in other words, the derangement of the currency, or alteration of its relative value, between two countries or places, deranges the exchanges between those places. And, on this point, I will refer to facts. I take, sir, the rates of exchange in New York during the late suspension of specie payments, which are to be found in Mr. Woodbury's able document, showing the value of paper money, and the rates of exchange in the markets of New York and Philadelphia, published by order of the Senate in 1838, to illustrate my argument. In June, 1837, exchange on England, instead of being 9 per cent. its legitimate premium, suddenly rose to 20 per cent in the markets of Philadelphia and New York. Now, sir, what was the cause of this great rise in the exchanges? It was this—paper money had depreciated in value, by ceasing to be convertible into specie. Specie, at that time, is quoted at 10 to 13 per cent. premium, or, in other words, the paper of the banks of New York, which was assumed in the prices current as the par standard of value, had depreciated 13 per cent. below specie, the real standard. And it therefore took $113 of the paper of New York to buy $100 in specie, or $122 of the paper of New York to buy $100 of specie in London. It will be seen, that, if specie had remained the standard of value by which the rates were graduated in the prices current, the difference in exchange, as before and since the suspension, would have ranged from 7 to 10 per cent. affected only by the balance of trade, or the demand in proportion to the supply. The suspension of specie payments by the banks, therefore, caused all the derangements which existed in the exchanges.

But the effects of the suspension were more obvious and striking in the domestic exchanges of the country, which are governed by the same principles. It appears by the document before referred to, that, at one period during the suspension, the rate of exchange between New York and Boston was 3 per cent. New York and Philadelphia about the same; New York and New Orleans about 12 per cent; New York and Mississippi 30 per cent. &c. The document further shows, that the difference of exchange between New York and the places named was just the amount of the depreciation in the New York market of the bank paper issued at those places; in other words, it took $103 of the paper of the Boston banks to buy $100 of the paper of the New York banks, that being the par standard of value then, and not specie, which was worth 10 to 13 per cent. more than New York paper, and therefore it would have taken $113 of Boston paper to buy $100 in gold in New York. At the same time it took $103 of Philadelphia paper to pay $100 in New York, $112 of New Orleans paper, and $130 of Mississippi paper. To purchase $100 in specie in New York, it would take $113 of Philadelphia paper, $122 of New Orleans paper, and $140 of Mississippi paper. These facts show that the increase of the rates of exchange kept pace in a reverse ratio with the depreciation of paper money. And that depreciation was caused by the suspension of specie payments by the banks. When the banks resumed, exchanges improved. During the summer of 1838, exchanges were lower than they had ever been before, and at one time they were in favor of New Orleans and against New York, the balance of both being against the latter city. (See Sylvester's Reporter of that year.) Wherever the banks resumed, the exchanges fell to their legitimate standard. Wherever they did not resume, they remained high—at rates corresponding with the depreciation of bank paper. Since the recent suspension, they have again become deranged, and are now high against those portions of the country in which the banks have suspended, in just the proportion of the depreciation of the paper in the market of New York. Thus, by the following table, it appears that, on the 26th of May, exchanges are quoted in the papers of New York at the following rates, viz:

Philadelphia	5½ a —
Baltimore	5⅝ a —
Richmond	6½ a 6¾
Charleston	5 a 5½
Savannah	8 a 9
Augusta	12 a 13
Macon	13 a —
Mobile,	10⅛ a 11
New Orleans	7 a 8
Nashville	14 a —

At the same date notes on the banks in Philadelphia, and other cities named, are quoted at the same per cent. discount as the premium on exchange.

I have now, Mr. Chairman, demonstrated the problem of fluctuations in the exchanges, or shown the causes which derange them, elevating them very much at one time, and depressing them at another. They are, first, an increase of the demand in proportion to the supply, which is slight; and, second, a depreciation of the currency, which, in this country, is produced by the banks, and which is always the main cause of derangement. The corollary therefore, of the argument, is, that the banks, instead of regulating the exchanges, disturb and derange them.

If, Mr. Chairman, we had a pure metallic currency, or a currency mixed of paper and specie, but sound, and of the same value throughout the Union, and if exchanges were not monopolized by the banks, but left to be controlled by the inevitable laws of trade, exchange would act as a regulator of commerce. To illustrate: If New York should buy too much of New Orleans, exchange would be against New York. It would rise in rate in proportion as the debt, or balance of trade against New York, and in favor of New Orleans, accumulated. The effect would be, that, in time, the rates of exchange would be so high, as to check the trade of New York with New Orleans, producing a retrogradation, until an equilibrium was restored, by an adjustment of the balance, and payment of the debt. Left to its natural laws, exchange operates as a check against overtrading, precisely as the accumulation of specie under the operation of the Independent Treasury system, will check overtrading. The business of exchange, therefore, should never be in the hands of a National Bank, nor of a company of associated banks, which, by establishing fixed rates, would prevent it from rising and falling, according to the actual state of trade between two commercial points.

I have one more topic, Mr. Chairman, to touch upon, and I will close my remarks.

I have heard gentlemen of the Opposition on this floor talk much about the great distress which pervades the community. The presses of that party harp upon the same dolorous key note given out here. Sir, I have looked about for some evidence, some proof, of the great distress which is said to prevail, and I have looked in vain. Where are the proofs? Where, does it exist? Sir, there is nothing in this cry of distress, which the Opposition party have raised. The community is not so much distressed as gentleman affect to believe; not, at least, to the extent represented. If there is distress it is factitious, manufactured by panic-makers for political effect. The hue and cry has been raised on this floor, sir, and it is reiterated through a corrupt and venal press. The banks and other moneyed interests lend their aid to propagate the falsehood, and to create, if they can, what their own partisans say, actually exists!

The Federal party, in whose hands are the banks, who own and control the manufacturing corporations, and to whom belongs the mercantile capital, and other concentrated moneyed interests of the country, have it in their power to create distress whenever they choose. One of the great leaders of that party [Mr. WEBSTER] long ago predicted, that the business of the country would never be in a settled state until a National Bank was rechartered; which, of course, must be preceded by the installation of that party in power. The Federal party have in their hands, through the joint moneyed interests under their control, the means of deranging business, producing distress, and thus verifying the prediction of their great champion. This, sir, is the modus operandi by which that party accomplishes its object. The banks refuse their accommodations, and thus deprive those indebted, although they may have ample property, of the means of paying their debts. This is one cause of panic and distress. They then contract their circulation, and thus deprive the community, generally, of the medium by the aid of which business is transacted and trade facilitated. This is another cause of panic. Then the orators and newspaper scribblers of that party raise the hue and cry of distress, when none, or but little, exists, and thus alarm the community and destroy that confidence so essential to commercial prosperity. This, sir, is another cause of panic. The manufacturing corporations chime in and help to swell the general chorus, by reducing the wages of their operatives and turning them out of employment. The merchants lend their powerful aid, by distressing and oppressing the mechanics and laborers in their employment and patronage. Thus is another note added to the burden of the song of panic and distress. It is palpable, therefore, that the Federalists themselves, by the agency of the machinery within their control, produce the very effect which they predict; and then, sir, with brazen and unblushing effrontery they turn round and charge the consequences of their own ruthless and wicked crusade against the interests, the comfort, the peace, and the happiness of the community, to the measures of the Administration!

But, Mr. Chairman, with all this powerful machinery, which has been worked with redoubled energy during the present session, the Federal party have not succeeded in producing a panic equal to their expectations, and the means they have employed. I say again, that this distress, which is said so generally to prevail, does not, in fact, exist. So far as facts can be obtained, they prove that the business done in the country during the first quarter of the present year, is nearly, if not quite, equal to the business transactions of the country during the corresponding quarter of the last year. On this point, sir, I am not without facts. I have taken pains to procure statements of the amounts of imports and exports, and the arrivals and clearances at the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore, and statements of the inspection of flour at the ports of Baltimore and Philadelphia, for the first quarter of the years 1839 and '40. They exhibit these results:

NOTE.—The collector of the port of Boston, in his statement, correctly remarks, that "the lateness of the season, in consequence of a very severe winter, diminished the number of arrivals in the first quarter."

I have been unable, Mr. Chairman, to procure returns of the commerce of other large ports of the Union; but, judging from those I have obtained, it is very safe to conclude that returns from the great export cities of New Orleans, Savannah, and Charleston, would exhibit very similar results.

NOTE.—During the quarter ending December, 31, 1812, there were 227.331 barrels, and 14,196 half barrels of wheat flour inspected in the market of Baltimore, the largest amount ever inspected during any quarter previous to 1840.

To these tables, Mr. Chairman, I add the weekly report of the Brighton market, the great cattle mart of New England, dated June 1, 1840, with the remark that the prices are as high now as they have ever been, with scarce an exception:

BRIGHTON MARKET, Monday, June 1, 1840.]

[Reported for the [Whig] Daily Advertiser and Patriot.

Prices—Beef Cattle. We quote a few extra at $7 25; first quality, $6 75 a $7; second quality, $6 25 a $6 75; third quality, $5 75 a $6 25.

Working Oxen—A few sales—$75, 80, 92, 110, and 147½.

Cows and Calves—Sales at $21, $25, $28, $32, and $40.

Sheep—Lots were sold at $3 75, $4, and $4 12.

Swine—Dull. Lots to peddle were sold at $4½ a $4½ for Sows, and $5¼ a $5½ for Barrows. At retail, from 5 to 7½.

These statements show that the exports at the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, vary but very little from those of the corresponding quarter of last year. The same remark is true in relation to the foreign arrivals and clearances. The business done in the flour trade is vastly greater than ever before. If the articles of export were as high in price in our markets this year as last, they would have much exceeded the exports of last year in amount. It is not to be denied that there has been a falling off in the imports, but that should be regarded as a favorable omen, indicating the returning tide of prosperity in the fact that we are beginning to sell more than we buy, and are now liquidating the heavy debt held in Europe against us.

Now, sir, nobody pretends that there was any distress last year. On the contrary, every thing was prosperous and flourishing. The Whigs themselves will not deny this. It appears that so far, during the present year, we have done nearly the same amount of business, and yet it is said the country is greatly distressed. Now, sir, I ask again, where are the evidences of distress, except in the hypocritical and affected lamentations of Whig panic makers? Do we hear of great and numerous failures? In 1819, half of the community failed. Great failures happened all over the country during the panic of 1828. In the great commercial shock of 1837, 200 or 300 merchants failed in New York, half as many in Boston; and large numbers in all the other cities of the Union. Now, sir, we hear of no failures, because none take place. Where, then, I repeat, is the distress which is said to exist? Where its evidences?

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, our country was never richer in all the elements of real wealth and prosperity than at this moment. And were it not for the conspiracy of the banks, and other concentrated moneyed interests, with the Federal party, to overthrow this Administration, our country at this moment would present to the world one of the proudest spectacles of prosperity, and of the triumph of free institutions, that has ever yet been witnessed.

It is true, sir, that the prices of wool, of flour, and cotton, three of the great staples of this country, have fallen. The causes I have already assigned. But I would call the attention of the people, and particularly of the producers of those staples, to the table of prices current which I have before exhibited. By that table it appears that all the products of the farmer and planter, have at different periods of our history, been subject to great fluctuations. During the war, and to 1820, prices were very high. From 1817 to 1836, we had a National Bank. Yet that institution did not sustain the prices of property from 1820 to 1833, the date of the second great expansion of the currency, which ended in the explosion of the banks. During that period of time, dating at 1820 and ending at 1833, prices were generally lower than they have ever been. Yet, sir, that period embraces the Federal Whig era of good times.

In 1817, before the United States Bank went into operation, beef was as high as $15 25 per barrel; pork $18 50; butter 22 cents per pound; cheese 18 cents; flour $14 50 per barrel; corn $1 60 per bushel; rye $1 25, &c; cotton 34 cents per pound; wool as high as 60 cents. Prices have never been higher in this country.

In 1828, during the undisputed reign of the United States Bank, the Whig era of good times, but of real distress and depression, beef was as low as $11 per bbl. pork $8 per bbl. butter fourteen cents per pound; cheese six cents per pound; flour $5 75 per bbl. (in 1827, $5 50,) corn sixty-five cents per bushel; rye sixty-five cents per bushel; cotton ten cents per pound; wool twenty-five cents per pound. Never were prices lower generally than at this time. We then had a National Bank, a high tariff, and a splendid system of internal improvements had been projected; yet never were the farming and planting interests so much depressed; and in fact all other interests, for it was a time of general distress and suffering.

In 1833, sir, when the banks commenced their second great expansion, prices began to rise, the causes of which I have assigned. In these facts, the farmer and planter will see that it is not the measures of the Government to which these great fluctuations are to be attributed. The expansions and contractions of the currency, which the bill on your table proposes to remedy, are the main causes. We have had the expansion and high prices, and now we have the contraction, but not very low prices, except in the articles of flour and cotton, in which there has been a great overproduction; and in wool, which the manufacturers, for political effect, will not buy now, but will be obliged to purchase soon, for, sir, they will not long permit their vast capital to remain unemployed.

The farmers and planters will also see by the tables of prices current, that the prices of sugar, tea, coffee, salt, and all other articles of foreign growth, consumed in their families, have permanently fallen. In this respect, they are permanent gainers by the fall of prices. They have fallen much more in proportion than the staples of their own production.

I am, now, Mr. Chairman, through with my exposition of the causes which produce fluctuations in the prices of property, and the wages of labor, and the derangement of the exchanges of the country. I will now submit in conclusion, a few remarks in relation to the great issue involved in the present contest between the two parties.

It matters not, sir, whether General Harrison is a great general, or whether he is in fact a hero. Those qualifications are very good in their places. Nor is it of the least importance whether or not he lives in a log cabin and drinks hard cider. Neither of them demonstrates his fitness for the exalted office of Chief Magistrate of this great Republic. Besides, sir, neither is true in point of fact; but is a falsehood attempted to be palmed off upon the American people. The farmers and mechanics of this country are not to be convinced by parading through the streets of our splendid cities, the miserable caricatures of log cabins—the humble abodes of the poor, but honest and intelligent settlers of the far West, with all the circumstance and pageantry of hard cider, gourd shells, and coon skins. No, sir, such displays are downright insults to that humble but meritorious class of our countrymen, who inhabit the real log cabins of the country. They are an insult to every intelligent American citizen, who is sought to be convinced of his supposed errors of opinion, by such grovelling mummeries and mountebank exhibitions. Sir, the workingmen of this country have not only intelligence, but they have pride—the pride of conscious integrity and manly independence. And believe me, the insane displays of modern Whigery will arouse in their bosoms a storm of indignation which will ere long burst forth and overwhelm, in its fury, the silly projectors of such dumb shows, invented to deceive and delude them. Think you, Mr. Chairman, that the yeomanry and workingmen of this Republic are to be duped and wheedled out of their rights by a system of jugglery and foolery too disgusting for men pretending to decency and propriety of conduct to be engaged in? Believe it not, sir. That base insult to the intelligence of the American people will be avenged, and the authors and participators in those grovelling and contemptible displays will be covered with shame and disgrace in the crowning victory of this great contest. When they awake from their dream of delusion and infatuation, they will blush at the remembrance of their folly, and hide their heads in confusion. The history of this infatuated period will grate harshly upon their ears some dozen years hence. But, sir, I will not dwell upon the utter baseness of such schemes to delude and dupe an intelligent people. I call that people to the contemplation of the great issue before them, involving, as I believe, the very existence of Republican government, and their own dearest rights and liberties. That issue is, AN INDEPENDENT TREASURY AND POPULAR LIBERTY; OR A NATIONAL BANK AND A MONEYED DESPOTISM.

In Europe, sir, capital, whether it be in money or in lands, is leagued with political power against the people. Here the people are united with the Government, instituted and upheld by themselves against capital. The great contest in which we are engaged is a struggle on the part of the combined and allied moneyed interests of the country to reverse the present order of things, and establish the supremacy of wealth over popular institutions and popular liberty. This, sir, is the issue. The appeal is to the people. I await their verdict without fear of the result.

REMARKS OF MR. HUBBARD,

OF ALABAMA,

In the House of Representatives, May 24, 1840—On the bill granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands.

Mr. HUBBARD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Having obtained the floor to speak upon this bill, it becomes my duty, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, to explain its principles.

It is intended to aid the frontier settlers who have gone upon the public lands, cleared them up, and put them into cultivation—to enable them to secure homes for their families, and to get the benefit of the labor they have done upon the land.

The object of the bill is a good and just one, and will be supported by the House, if not prejudiced by the objections raised against it, on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE,] who have occupied the whole of this day in making objections, which I trust I shall remove from the minds of every member not opposed to granting pre-emptions to first settlers. Nothing can quiet the opposition of the gentlemen who are opposed.

I shall begin with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (who has occupied the House some four or five hours,) and when I shall have disposed of such of his remarks as have any appearance of force, I shall turn to the gentleman from Kentucky, and upon meeting his objections, shall call the previous question, with the view of having the vote to-night; and I now notify the House that I will not yield the floor to a motion for adjournment, the House having already been too long engaged in the consideration of the question before it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts objects to the first section of the bill, which he supposes "contains a new principle." This section only provides, that whenever a man has built his house upon one quarter section, and made his field upon another, he shall have the right to take either, whichsoever he may choose, or he may take eighty acres to include his house, and eighty acres to include his field, so as not to exceed one quarter section in all.

The section appears to me so just and reasonable in itself, that I do not know how to offer argument in its support. It is intended for this purpose, sir, where a man has done most labor upon his house, he can take it; when he has done most on his field, he can enter that; and when, by taking legal subdivisions, he can save both, and get the benefit of all his labor, why not let him have it? It is no new principle; it is only applying an old principle to meet cases not provided for in other bills; but if it were a new principle, it is a just and good one, and such that no one who did not oppose the pre-emption principle, or who did not desire to get part of the man's labor, could object to. I know that it is pretended here, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this would enable the settler to take the best halves of each quarter section, and thereby render the other part unsaleable. If the land he takes is valuable, he would soon desire the other for timber and room, and if worth any thing, would be compelled to purchase, to keep others away. But how does this alter the case, from the way things now stand? Suppose, sir, that the land had never been settled, or no pre-emption had been given; could not any other buyer buy it up in the same way, by bidding off the half quarter sections, that were good, and leaving out the bad, just as the bill allows the settler to take it by pre-emption?

The whole objection is shown to be groundless, to the most common understanding.

I now turn to the second section, and his objections to that. The second section is intended to provide for the man who actually cleared the land or built the house, and who put another man into possession of the land or house. It will provide for cases like this. A man goes with his family and makes an improvement on a piece of public land; his wife may die; he takes his children, if he has any, to her or his relations or friends, as the case may be; he will not, nay, he cannot, live alone in the woods. He therefore rents out his place to some one who wants a place. Now, ought he to lose his labor, or will you give the pre-emption to the man who did not undergo the hardship of the first settlement, or who did not clear it up and improve it?

The bill gives it to the man who went into the wilderness, found the place, and cleared it up; to the actual owner of the place and labor upon it, and not to the person to whom he has rented; and it is right. And, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts would have had much stronger reason to object, if it had been otherwise, and I should have sustained his objection.

I will now proceed to the third section of the bill. This provides that where a man settled upon the public lands before they were surveyed, and his improvement, upon the surveying of the country, was found to be upon section sixteen; then he may take another quarter section not occupied by another person, in the same land district, at the Government price. Now, in this case, the township gets the benefit of his labor, and he could not be placed on a footing with his neighbors without such provision. It is nothing but just and right; and no one who will vote for any part of the bill ought to object to this section.

I now follow the gentleman through the fourth section of the bill, which gives a pre-emption to any one who cleared up and settled a tract of public land, which was taken from him afterwards by a grant from Congress to a State, for any purpose whatever, and the objection stands in precisely the same situation, on principle, with the objection to the sixteenth section case, which, I trust, I have disposed of to the full and entire satisfaction of the House, and to the gentleman himself, if he was disposed to favor these claims of the settlers on public lands.

The fifth and last section has been opposed by the gentleman for two reasons. The first, that by reviving the bill of 1838, "those settlers who did not take pre-emptions under that act, will get still two years' longer credit to take their pre-emptions." Secondly, "That it enables men to have pre emptions on lands subject to sale at private entry," which the gentleman thinks is not right, and that it will keep back patents for lands in this situation.

The first objection is strange to me from gentlemen who can give to banks two or three years' credit for millions of public money, which, by reason of the change in times, the banks allege they were unable to pay. They can vote away hundreds of thousands to the importing merchants, for reputed losses by fire. They can credit them for years upon bonds due, for what they owe the Government; but a poor needy settler upon the public lands, who has worked hard to clear it up, who has lived hard whilst about it, and who, for the same reasons, (the hardness of the times,) needs a little time to enter his home—they cannot afford to credit him. They can indulge others for thousands or millions, but grudge to let a frontier man have even a little time to secure his labor, and a home for his family; and that, too, when they hold the land itself, together with the labor done upon it, for security. Is this the treatment these men have a right to expect from this House? No, sir; I cannot believe it—I know better.

The second objection is too small a matter for much consideration, but is as easily answered as the others. There are but few cases where lands have been offered, and would not sell at public sale, where any man would settle upon them, without first having purchased; because his improving the land, (if worth any thing) would make the place an object for others to buy, and he would therefore be liable to lose his labor, and be moved off at trouble and expense. Therefore no man can be supposed to be upon lands subject to sale at private entry, at the passage of the act, who was able to buy, unless the place has been so poor, that his labor and land together are not worth the minimum price. A few cases, then, of very poor men, on very poor land, may have pre-emption rights extended to them by this section of the bill, but the number must, for the reasons given, be very few, and the land too poor to make either an object of much consideration with this Congress, and the few titles which may be delayed, on this account, cannot work any injury to an upright man. If a buyer, in fraud of the law, was to go to the office, and enter one of these improvements to get the man's labor, and would falsely state that no person was upon it, and the occupant should afterwards be able to raise the money, and pay up for his improvement, and vacate the title, the fellow would deserve to lose it.

One more objections made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I shall quit him, being fully satisfied that I have disposed of his objections. He objects to this bill, because "it will let every occupant now upon the land have a pre-emption, whilst the former bill of 1838 required four months' previous settlement and occupancy." Now the gentleman from Massachusetts, according to this argument, would have no objection to a pre-emption, where a man had settled and cultivated the land some two, three, or four years, and had received some benefit from it; but, a poor fellow who has gone upon it late this spring, and who plants, and cannot more than half break up and cultivate the land, and who has no possibility of making more than half a crop, without getting any thing like half pay for his labor, must be rooted out, and driven off. This is his argument; and it is answered in making a mere statement of its contents.

I now, sir, turn to the objections raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE;] and so far as they are of the same kind with those raised by his friend from Massachusetts, they are already, as I conceive, fully answered.

His objections, growing out of political considerations, I shall not take time to answer; what he has said against Mr. Van Buren I shall pass over, with confidence that it will not seriously effect him.

But he gives it as his opinion, that, if the present bill pass, it will take millions from the Treasury, and has endeavored to support his opinion by referring to a report of the late Commissioner of the Public Lands [Mr. BROWN] who supposed that the pre-emption laws of 1830 "took from the Treasury three millions of dollars."

Now it so happens, that the book containing that report, contains a few facts, which, upon examination, will completely overturn this position.

The book shows that the sales of all the lands in 1829, 1830, 1831, and 1832, did not go but a fraction over two millions of acres a year, and that the average price was nearly one dollar twenty-seven cents per acre.

The same book shows, that in 1835 and 1836, when, according to the gentleman's own statement, no pre-emption laws were in existence, the sales amounted, together, to 32,639,343 acres, which sold for $41,167,637, being about one dollar and twenty-six cents and one tenth of a cent per acre—not one cent's difference in the average price per acre, between the sales when the pre-emption laws were in force, and afterwards when not in force.

It also happens, that, during the time that Mr. Commissioner Brown thought that so much had been lost to the Government by pre-emption laws, money was scarce, and sales were small, as is shown; but in 1835 and 1836, paper money was abundant, speculations ran high, and every body was buying lands that could get to the sales, and forty millions' worth were sold, which sales did not exceed one dollar and twenty-six cents per acre; and this too, when, according to the gentlemans own showing, no pre-emption laws were in force.

Now if, when paper money was plenty, and every thing high, when sales took place to the extent of forty millions' worth, and no pre-emption laws were in existence, the lands did not bring one and a half cents per acre above Government price, what ground has the gentleman from Kentucky, or had the Commissioner, to conclude that, in the sale of about three or four millions' worth, when money was scarce, the Government lost three millions of dollars on the small part that went to satisfy the pre-emption claims of that day? The idea is absurd. It was impossible, and could only have been entertained by prejudices created in the mind of that officer by persons dissatisfied with the execution of the pre-emption laws, from some particular cases, and who had no correct knowledge of the system, as the report shows was the case with Mr. Brown; and, sir, like every other objection to the bill, this also has been found to be only imaginary.

What I have said, Mr. Speaker, is doing but small justice to these frontier people of the new States, who settle upon the public lands, and clear them up. They make roads to the country; they feed, lodge, and protect the wearied traveller. More than that, sir: when your country is invaded, they protect you; and now, when their improvements are selling out, will you not protect them? I think, sir, you will. I have (as I think) answered fully the objections of each of the gentlemen to this bill. As a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, and so frequently called upon and referred to by them, I could not have said less.

One more word in explanation and reply, and I have done. Those frontier men are generally poor and needy, or, at best, men of but small property. When we speak of them, we must, if we speak truth, say "they are poor." And I regret, sir, a remark made by the gentleman from Kentucky, about those "who frequently harp about poor settlers, as demagogues and political hypocrites." I have only to say in reply to that remark, that if the gentleman had been at the Baltimore Convention, and had seen the log pens called "cabins," hauled through the streets, he would not again speak of demagogues or political hypocrites.

[Here Mr. H. was called to order by the CHAIR as not speaking to the bill.]

Mr. HUBBARD resumed. I have sir, said more than I intended when I commenced, but the full and critical examination of every section and sentence of the bill during the whole of this day, warns me that it is time to end this discussion, of which the House is already tired. I shall, therefore, as I promised, end it, by a call of the previous question.

The previous question was called, and the bill passed by a vote of 126 to 64.

SPEECH OF MR. ATHERTON,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

In the House of Representatives, May 27th, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Mr. ATHERTON said: Mr. CHAIRMAN: It was not my intention to have troubled the committee with any remarks on this bill, which has been the subject of so much discussion heretofore, in both Houses of Congress, and throughout the country. But having been instrumental in bringing the bill before the committee for consideration, it may be supposed incumbent upon me to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) who has moved to strike out the enacting clause, and supported his motion by an elaborate argument. And I can only regret that, on account of the illness of my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. JONES] who, I rejoice to see, is so far recovered as to be present in his seat, this duty is not to be performed by one who would discharge it in a manner so much more able and acceptable.

It affords a good omen for the character of the debate on which we have entered, that the gentleman from Massachusetts, notwithstanding the great variety of topics enlarged upon by him, has introduced only those which legitimately appertain to the discussion of the measure before us. Though he did once allude to a certain Dr. Harrison, were it not that he is too well disciplined to suffer his feelings to betray him into any improper degree of enthusiasm, perhaps even that slight aberration might be attributed to that sort of admiration, or, as it has been somewhere termed, "Boswellism," which a biographer may be pardoned for feeling towards his hero.

In confining my remarks to those subjects properly connected with the bill, it will be my endeavor to imitate his commendable example. Without further preface I will, therefore, proceed to state, as briefly as I may, the principles which I conceive to be involved in the measure, and some of the considerations which suggest themselves as favorable to its adoption.

It will occur to those who have examined the bill, that the main principles of the scheme therein proposed, for the collection and safekeeping of the public revenue, are,

1st. That the money of the people shall be safely kept by the people's own officers responsible to them, and shall not be used by corporations or privileged individuals.

2d. The bill makes provisions for reaching, by successive steps, a period when all the revenues shall be collected in the legal currency of the United States, or, in other words, in gold and silver only.

The different sections of the bill contain the details necessary for carrying out these principles. The system, as I understand it, commends itself by combining economy, convenience, and security. The expense of putting it in operation will be trifling, as also the yearly cost of maintaining it. The general suspension of payment by the banks in 1837; their more recent very extensive suspension; the great expenses of the extra session of Congress caused by the refusal of the deposite banks to pay over the public funds committed to their charge, the embarrassment and inconvenience resulting to the Government and to the people from the same cause; the great losses proved by authentic official documents to have been sustained by using banks as depositaries, and by depreciated bank paper; all these, it would seem, must carry conviction to the mind of every one that the inconsiderable cost of carrying the system into effect can bear no comparison with the advantages it must afford. And while it is one of the peculiar merits of the system that it gives neither to the officers of the Government nor to any corporation nor individual power to control the revenue for any other than constitutional and legal objects, it will enable the Government of the people to control, for legal and constitutional purposes, the revenue of the people. The simultaneous refusal of the deposite banks to pay over the funds of the Government in their possession, and the disastrous consequences of that refusal, afford an ample commentary on the propriety, or I should rather say the indispensable necessity, of the provisions necessary to accomplish this object. The system also insures the security of the public funds, by requiring ample bonds from depositaries, by establishing various and salutary checks and guards, by providing for regular periodical inspections and returns, and for sudden and unforseen inspections of the accounts of the agents of Government, and the moneys in their hands. And further still, it guards against that most formidable temptation to embezzlement of the public funds, the liberty to use them, and subjects such use or embezzlement to the punishment of fine and imprisonment.

But it is alleged that the measure will have an effect on the currency of the country, and it is contended by our opponents that this effect will be injurious. It is not denied that it will have an incidental effect on the currency, but its operation, in this respect, so far from deserving to be deprecated, cannot fail to be beneficial.

The only reason for regret, I conceive to be that its operation will be so limited. That the question of an entire specie currency, or any near approach to such a currency, is really involved in this bill, I cannot imagine that any one will be wild enough to contend All must acknowledge that the proportion of specie in circulation in the country to that of paper, is by far too small. Is there a gentleman here who will rise in his place and deny this proposition? Then, though it may justly be regretted that the effect of the bill will be so limited, that effect, so far as it goes to increase the proportion of specie in circulation, must be so far beneficial.

But even were there serious objections in point of convenience, to the scheme as a mere fiscal measure, as I humbly believe there are none, there are other considerations which call for its adoption—considerations of controlling and paramount importance.

It is the system most consonant to the principles of free institutions.

It may be safely laid down as a proposition which cannot be denied.

1. That the taking possession of the public revenue, and using it for the purposes of private gain, necessarily implies, in those thus possessing and using it, control of the revenue.

Were any one disposed to controvert this, a recollection of the bank suspension of 1837, which has heretofore been adverted to, must establish its truth. The banks then controlled the revenue. The people could not control their own money for their own purposes.

Another position is,

2d. That such control of the public revenue necessarily implies a high degree of political power.

This appears equally undeniable. How can a Government be carried on without revenue? Money constitutes the sinews of all its operations. So evident is the truth of the position, as to justify the remark of a great statesman, that "the revenue is the State."

If, then, the two foregoing propositions are uncontroverted and incontrovertible, another follows equally incontrovertible, as it seems to me. It being assumed as a fact, which no one will deny, that the people are the true source of political power, it follows,

3d. That banking corporations, not being politically responsible to the people, ought not to be entrusted with the exercise of political power, and thus ought not to be entrusted with the control of the revenue.

The other consideration alluded to as of controlling and paramount importance, and of a similar nature with the former, is this:

Unlike its antagonist scheme, the system is consistent with the Constitution.

1st. Because it does not recognise the necessity of agents not contemplated or provided for by the Constitution.

Neither banking corporations nor any other corporations are recognised in the Constitution. It is well known to all that the proposition to confer on the General Government power to create corporations, was rejected in the Convention for the formation of the Constitution. Can it be possible that those wise men who framed that instrument could have contemplated any necessity of employing banking corporations to carry on the fiscal affairs of the Government, and yet have neglected to provide for such necessity? To suppose this is to suppose they formed a Government which could not be executed, unless the States should be kind enough to create corporations for its convenience—nay, for its very existence. No one will hazard his own reputation by saying of those great men that they were guilty of so vain a thing. The conclusion, then, is irresistible, that the necessity of the use of banking corporations to carry on the affairs of the Government, was not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

The system proposed is consistent with the Constitution.

2d. Because it provides, so far as the revenues are concerned, for a return to the legal currency of the United States.

Its effect will thus be to prevent the people from sustaining loss on account of their Government being obliged to receive depreciated paper. It will also protect the creditors of the Government from loss in a similar manner. The Constitution recognises no paper currency. It gives power to the Government to coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and prohibits the States from making any thing except gold and silver a tender in payment of debts. The system now proposed avoids the absurdity of receiving in payment and paying out that of which the Government has no right to regulate the value.

I have thus hastily enumerated what occur to me as some of the merits of the measure now under discussion. However feebly they may have been stated, they are, some of them, at least, of grave interest, and mark the system as one of vital importance.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts has attacked this bill at the threshold. His object is not to amend, nor even to offer another system, but to destroy. In his extended and elaborate speech, he has swept up, as with a drag net, all that has ever been suggested on this once fertile, but now almost exhausted subject, and has enforced his arguments with his accustomed ability. In replying to his objections, I shall frequently, therefore, have occasion to recur to the considerations which have been already thus briefly adverted to.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has referred to the origin of this measure, which origin he says the Secretary of the Treasury has given in covert language, by stating the system to have been in practice as early as 1790. Mr. Hamilton was then Secretary of the Treasury. Thus, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Secretary refers the origin of this scheme to Hamilton the Federalist and Monarchist; but, he adds, the Secretary does not tell us that Hamilton's experiment failed. Again, he says, Mr. Woodbury takes up the rejected instruments of Mr. Hamilton. There does not appear to be much consistency in denouncing this scheme as originating with Hamilton the Federalist; and, in the next breath, denouncing the Secretary for taking up a scheme "rejected" by Hamilton. But what are the facts? The system of employing individuals for the safekeeping of the public moneys, was the first system in practice under our Constitution. Banks were employed at the period in our history next after the adoption of the Constitution. Hamilton was the first Secretary of the Treasury. It is well known that he was not imbued with those principles of Republicanism which prevailed in the formation of the Constitution. There can be no doubt that Hamilton was in favor of a Government resembling that of Great Britain.

"Purge the British Government," says he, "of its corruption, and it would be an impracticable Government; as it stands, at present, with all its supposed defects, it is the most perfect Government that ever existed."

It has been said that—

"The denial of such being Hamilton's sentiments, which has sometimes, for party purposes, been attempted, is quite preposterous, when he himself never disguised his opinions."

Though some have been weak or wicked enough to characterize the imputation of such opinions to Mr. Hamilton as a slander, no one will think such a course expedient since the publication of the Madison papers. In the debates of the Convention, there reported, he freely avowed that "he did not think favorably of Republican Government." His aim in his administration of the Treasury Department, undoubtedly was to infuse indirectly into the management of our system of Government those principles of hostility to popular rights, and denial of popular power, which he had in vain endeavored to infuse into the system itself. It is in accordance with all the motives which usually operate on human action, that he should have attempted this. Thus, as soon as was safe or practicable, he departed from the system, the immediate result of the adoption of the Constitution, and engrafted on our institutions the new principle of employing banking corporations as agents of the Government for keeping the public moneys. But it is a remarkable fact that even this he did by indirection and by his own discretion, and not in consequence of provision by law. It is not true that "the first scheme failed." The old Bank of the United States was established in 1791. There is not one word in its charter about its being a fiscal machine of the Government as a depositary of the public moneys. If the system of employing individuals had failed, and on account of its failure another had been resorted to, it is perfect folly to suppose the charter of the bank would not have contained such a provision as would have remedied by law the defects of the scheme it was to supersede. The system of employing individuals as depositaries did not fail. It never has failed, and, from the very nature of things, if properly regulated, it never can. The first bank was not established for the purpose of superseding the system of keeping public moneys first in operation under the Constitution, for there is nothing said in its charter on that subject. The employment of individuals as depositaries was left as much within the discretion of the Secretary as before the charter of the Bank.

Hamilton advocated the Bank, Jefferson opposed it. Hamilton, the Federalist, the Monarchist, got rid of the simple system of the Constitution, which is the system proposed in this bill, as soon as in his power. Such a system did not suit the ulterior views formed by his daring and sagacious mind. I agree that this scheme is the one rejected by Hamilton; but not that it was rejected because it had failed in its legitimate purposes. The gentleman from Massachusetts, so far as he can be understood to take up any scheme at all, takes up the scheme adopted by the Monarchist Hamilton—rejected by the Democrat Jefferson—the scheme rejected by a far higher authority than any single name—rejected by the people.

The gentleman from Massachusetts next makes the startling announcement that the bill proposes to reform, by an express repeal of the Constitution; because the 9th section of the Constitution provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law;" and the 1st section of the bill declares certain rooms and vaults, and safes, which are to be prepared in the building now going up in the western part of this city, to be the Treasury of the United States. He says the Treasury is not local, and cannot be, and entering upon that region

> "Where entity and quiddity,
> And ghosts of defunct bodies lie,"

he declares the Treasury to be "an abstract entity."

He contends that, by this bill, the Secretary of the Treasury is made the secretary of a vault; and that you might as well call the Secretary of the Navy the secretary of a ship, or the Secretary of War the secretary of a cannon. Perhaps it would be quite as intelligible to call the Secretary of the Treasury the secretary of a vault, as to denominate him the secretary of "an abstract entity."

The eleventh section of the bill provides that money shall be deposited in the hands of the depositaries, to the credit of the Treasurer. I appeal to gentlemen whether in most of the States they have not a Treasury established by law; and whether money placed to the credit of the Treasurer is not clearly enough understood to be in the Treasury, not because it is in this or that place, but because it is thus placed to his credit. It may seem singular that there has hitherto been no provision by law blishing the Treasury of the United States; and the propriety of such a provision seems to me self-evident. How does it conflict with that provision of the Constitution, which declares that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law?"

[Mr. CUSHING here rose, and said, that he also referred to another provision of the Constitution which he had mentioned, but did not particularly quote, and he would now give it. It was the provision which declares that "the nett produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States."]

Well, sir, how does the first section of the bill conflict with either of these provisions? Does it authorize any money to be paid out of the Treasury, except in pursuance of appropriations made by law, or provide that the nett produce of duties and imposts shall not be for the use of the Treasury of the United States? The Treasurer of the United States has, for his office, certain rooms, with proper safes and vaults connected therewith, where he is to keep all the public money which is in his immediate custody. But constructively he has the custody of all the public moneys, so far that he, under the laws, draws for them. And moneys, in the hands of a depositary, are placed to the credit of the Treasurer, and are constructively within the Treasury of the United States. But no one would say that the collector, or the deposite bank, or the receiver general, was the Treasury of the United States. The provisions of the bill are strictly and literally consonant to these provisions of the Constitution. But it is otherwise with the system of deposites of public moneys in banks. When a collector pays public money into a bank, and the bank loans it out to a speculator, is that money in the Treasury? Is the individual who uses the money as his own, the Treasury? No, sir; the money in that case is taken out of the Treasury without appropriation by law, or it never goes into the Treasury at all. The public money is taken from the places of its deposite, and used by individuals, without any appropriation by law. Thus the objection which the gentleman from Massachusetts urges, without any foundation whatever, against this bill, is an objection which applies with irresistible force to the scheme of deposites in banking corporations.

The gentleman from Massachusetts next discussed the safety of individual depositaries, compared with that of bank agency, and he objects to the bonds required by this bill as furnishing no adequate security, on account of the large amount which may accumulate in the hands of depositaries. He alludes to the defalcation of Swartwout for upwards of a million; and he also objects to the other checks provided by the bill as cumbrous machines for watching and guarding, and contends that it will be impossible to exercise inspections in all sections of the country.

These objections may at first appear plausible; but when examined, they are discovered to be groundless. There are only a few depositaries under whose custody the amount of money can ever be large. The amount of their bonds will be proportionate, and the appointment by the President, with the concurrence of the Senate, should be a guarantee that none will be appointed who could not obtain sufficient sureties. The bonds of individual depositaries will surely be as secure as those given by bank officers. The sureties in the latter are usually those interested in the bank, who, when the bank goes down, are too frequently involved in common ruin. Besides, in the case of these few large depositaries, their transactions can be easily watched and inspected; and these checks and guards will be in addition to the security of their bonds. With regard to the small depositaries in all sections of the country, there is no difficulty in making their bonds a sufficient security. So where the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts has even an appearance of plausibility in regard to the difficulty of procuring proper bonds, his objection, drawn from the difficulty of exercising efficient inspections, fails altogether, and the reverse. Even in regard to the largest depositaries, the amount on hand at any one time will never be very considerable, unless Congress should pass laws to tax the people to such an extent as to create a surplus revenue, which occurrence no one anticipates. It is also in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury by the bill, and will be his duty, to guard against all such accumulations as could have any tendency to insecurity. Swartwout's defalcation ceases to have any application as an argument in favor of the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but has a directly opposite tendency, when we recollect that it was the result of the operations of years, and took place under the very system of using banks as depositaries, which the gentleman so highly commends. A considerable portion of that defalcation took place while the United States Bank was still employed as a fiscal agent of the Government. Had such a system of suretyship and checks and guards and inspections been in operation at that time as is contained in the provisions of this bill, that defalcation could never have happened.

In pursuing his comparison of security of moneys deposited in banks with that of the system proposed in this bill, the gentleman from Massachusetts asks what is the security of deposites in a bank, and replies, first, the integrity of its officers, and next, the capital stock, as collateral security.

It seems to me to be a sufficient answer, on the first ground, to remark that the officers of banks are not appointed by the people, nor are they agents of the people. Is not an appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a higher guarantee of fidelity and integrity than the selection by a few members of a corporation? If not, why not permit the members of local corporations to select officers who are to exercise other important political trusts? There is also a further and conclusive answer. A larger number of persons have access to the funds in a bank, and the risk is thereby proportionably increased. As to the collateral security of the capital stock, every one that knows the manner in which banking is managed, is aware how little reliance is to be placed on this, and that, in many instances, the capital stock is not paid in. But suppose it really paid in; that security is far more than counterbalanced by the great risk incurred by involving the funds of Government in all the desperate hazards of the business of banking. In the hands of an individual depositary, the public moneys are exposed to no such risks.

But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, there is an additional fact. Swartwout may abscond—the American Bank—the Bank of Pennsylvania cannot—they are perpetually fixed by the local tenure of their existence, and are amenable to law.

The history of these institutions for a few years past furnishes no very strong confirmation of these suggestions. How many instances have occurred of the absconding of bank officers, and how many melancholy proofs that they are no less liable than others to fall before temptation? A bank, to be sure, cannot abscond—but its officers may. Of what avail is it when the bank's treasures are dissipated, and its treasury not even "an abstract entity," but an abstract nonentity—that there is left an intangible, impalpable shadow of the law called a corporation? Amenable to law! I ask whether it be not to contradict all observation and all experience to say that corporations are more amenable to law than individuals are? They have, in numerous instances, procured laws for their especial benefit, and exempting them from their just liabilities. Not only so, but they have defied existing laws and set themselves above the sovereign power that created them.

The gentleman from Massachusetts also argues that banks are subject to similar inspections to those provided in this bill, and thus the security in this respect is equal. In the first place, I deny the fact. The Government of the United States has no power of such inspections over local institutions, and by no possibility can have. Again, sir: suppose the right of inspection equal in the two cases, what would its exercise be worth as applied to banking corporations? Absolutely nothing. The business of an individual depositary would be simple. It would be confined to the transactions on account of the Government alone. You have only to look at his account of moneys received, of moneys paid, and his funds on hand, and you ascertain the state of the affairs of his office. In the complicated, various and infinitely diversified operations of a bank, inspections would always prove as experience shows they always have proved, entirely useless and unavailing.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts says that the conduct of mankind evinces their sense of the superior security of banks, and that if individuals have money, they deposite it in a bank, and do not carry it in their pocket. They place it with some one (I use his language) "whose business it is to keep deposites." Aye, sir, "whose business it is to keep deposites." If, then, the Government appoint officers "whose business it is to keep deposites," and that alone, who are not, like the officers of banks, exposed to all sorts of temptation from the power of using the moneys left with them, nor like banking corporations exposed to the hazards of a fluctuating game of speculation and banking—why shall not the public moneys be safe in their hands? Cannot a vault be constructed for deposites as secure as the vault of a bank? No one will deny this. Suppose an individual to possess vaults and safes of his own equally secure with those of the bank in his immediate neighborhood, and also to have in his employment a person of integrity equal to that of the cashier of the bank, and with equally secure bonds, to open, shut, and guard those vaults and safes. The question is not whether such individual would keep his gold and silver in his pocket rather than deposite it in the bank, but whether he would not consider his gold and silver more secure in his own vaults and safes than deposited in the bank. Is there any doubt on this subject? Certainly there can be none, because, in his own vault, his money is equally secure from theft with the money of the bank, and is exempt from the hazards of the business of the bank, and he has his gold and silver where he can command it. It is not transmuted into a bank debt, and he runs no risk of being obliged to receive that debt in depreciated bank paper, or of losing it altogether through the failure of the bank. In this illustration I have spoken of gold and silver only. But the funds usually deposited by individuals in a bank, consist of the notes of various other banks. And one reason which induces the haste of individuals to deposite their funds in the bank near them, is their distrust of bank paper, and their unwillingness to keep on hand, for any length of time, the notes of various banks.

There is also another very important consideration. Individuals make deposites in the bank in their immediate neighborhood, where they suppose they have an opportunity of knowing the standing of the bank, and providing against emergencies. Would they think it safe to make their deposites in banks scattered over all sections of our extended country? No, sir: far from it.

Thus in regard to all the particulars mentioned, the argument as to the comparative safety of deposites with individuals as contemplated by this bill, and of deposites in banks, is decidedly in favor of the former, and against the latter system. In the former, the guarantee for the integrity of the officers having access to the money is of a higher nature than in the latter. But suppose it equal, in the latter system the risk is greater on account of the greater number of those officers of whose integrity you must be assured. The security to be derived from bonds is more likely to be competent in the case of individuals than of bank depositaries. The collateral security of the capital stock of banks is far more than compensated by the risks incurred by involving the moneys of the people in all the hazards of banking adventure. And the security to be derived from inspections is, in the case of individual agents, available and important; in the case of banks, utterly futile and worthless.

But there is another aspect in which this subject should be viewed, which of itself furnishes a complete refutation of all the arguments which have been urged, or which can be urged, against the security of the proposed system, and in favor of the system of deposites in banks. The revenues have always been mostly collected by individuals. The public moneys pass through the hands of individuals, and are disbursed, to a great extent, by individuals, as disbursing officers, and this whether, in the interim, these moneys are deposited in banks or not. The operation of this bill is very little more than merely to prevent banks from taking the money out of the hands of the individuals who have collected it, and from using it for the purposes of speculation before it goes into the hands of the disbursing agents. Thus, if you require the money to be deposited in banks, you expose the moneys to additional risks. There is, at any rate, and under all systems, the risk of the collecting officers, and the disbursing officers. You have the guarantee of their honesty and fidelity. If you interpose between the collecting officer and the disbursing officer the custody of the banks, you vary and increase the risk. You have the integrity of your collecting officer. If he be honest, and you are safe in permitting him to collect and keep your money until he can pay it over to a bank—his honesty will equally protect you if he be permitted to keep it a little longer, until he be ordered to pay it over to a disbursing officer. Suffer a bank to interpose, and take possession of, and use, the money, after it comes from the hands of the collector, and before it gets into the hands of the disbursing officer, and, in order to be secure, you have to be assured, not only of the honesty of your collector and disburser, but of the honesty of the bank officers, and of the solvency of the institution.

The history of the Treasury, as drawn from public documents, has been referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Extracts were produced from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1834, in which it is said the Secretary condemned the idea of entrusting the public moneys to the keeping of individual agents. Permit me to read an extract from that report, in which it is even then suggested, that events might occur that would render the adoption of that very system expedient and proper. The Secretary remarks:

"It will then become necessary to devolve these duties on some receiver or collector already in office, or on some safe agent not now in office, as has been the practice for years in this country in paying pensions at convenient places near which there was no State bank or branch of the United States Bank, and has long been the usage in some countries of Europe, by having the revenue in certain districts chiefly received, kept, and transmitted through private agents and brokers."

There is also in the same report a suggestion that—

"Banks are not believed to be necessary for the fiscal purposes of any Government."

The gentleman next refers to Executive document No. 10, which he says, on hasty inspection, is calculated to mislead the public. He speaks of the losses by disbursing officers. What argument can those losses furnish against the system proposed? Disbursing officers always have been, and always must be, employed under all systems, and the amount of losses through their defaults has nothing whatever to do with the question under consideration.

But the gentleman contends that the whole loss of the Treasury by deposite banks, from the foundation of the Government to 1837, is only about two-thirds what has been lost by the former collector of New York. Now, sir, I contend that it appears from the document referred to, that the loss to the Treasury from banks is greater than all the losses from the commencement of the Government by collectors, even including the defalcation of Swartwout. The loss from collectors is $2,038,549 81. Add the amount of the defalcation by Swartwout (of which half is probably secured by Government, and which, be it remembered, took place under the bank deposite system) and you have a little over three million. The losses by using banks as depositaries, and receiving their notes in payment of public dues, amount, adopting the estimates made by the Treasury Department, to $6 474,722.

[Mr. CUSHING here rose and said he was considering, in that part of his argument, the question of deposite merely, and thought the subject ought to be thus viewed, and not connected with the receptibility of the paper of the banks.]

Sir, why should these considerations be separated? This bill proposes a system and that system includes both. What right has the gentleman from Massachusetts to separate one part of the system from another? The question is, what are the liabilities to loss incident to the system proposed in this bill? Is it not the system of general bank deposite for which gentlemen contend? Surely it is so, for most of their arguments are based on the impropriety of keeping idle the Government funds. This system of general deposite is, I conceive, necessarily connected with the reception of bank paper. Therefore, I repeat, the advocates of the bank deposite system have no right to separate these classes of losses; and an attempt to do it seems to me to indicate a consciousness of the weakness of their cause, when placed on its true grounds. Besides, if they intimate the possibility of special deposites in banks, in that case the banks are mere bailees, and answerable only for gross negligence, and their security, so much relied on, of the capital stock, vanishes.

Thus we see, sir, that by authentic documents, the losses by banks have been nearly six millions and a half—double all those which have been sustained on account of collectors. Is this estimate too high? Will the friends of the Bank of the United States say this? When it suited the purpose of the advocates of the United States Bank to bring before the country the losses sustained by depreciated currency, how did they estimate those losses? In a report made by Mr. Duffie on the 13th April, 1830, those losses are estimated at $34,000,000. Adopting this estimate, made by an advocate of the United States Bank, the amount which has been lost by banks is $34,974,722—nearly thirty-five millions of dollars—more than eleven times the amount lost by collecting officers. Thus the history of the Treasury, drawn from authentic public documents—thus facts and figures, and the lessons of experience, speak in a voice which cannot be misunderstood, in condemnation of the bank deposite system, and in favor of the measure now before us.

But, Mr. Chairman, why talk about the unfaithfulness of a few individuals who have refused to pay over the public moneys committed to their keeping? All the banks have done this simultaneously and as if by concert. There exists no power in the Government, nor can the Government have the power conferred on it, to punish abuse of trust by these corporations. Neither can the Government guard against their combinations, by which they may exert all their united power to sustain each other against the interests of the Government and of the people. We have recently had a Bank Convention in this country which held its sessions with closed doors. Shall the revenues of the people be entrusted to the secret exercise of a power thus irresponsible? The dependance of the operations of our banks on the foreign money power in England has been most vividly depicted in the message of the President at the opening of the session. And this is aside from the fact that the stock of banks may be in the hands of foreign stockholders, and the revenues of the people be thus far, in this manner, controlled by them. There is no possibility of a general failure of duty, or a general combination among individual depositaries, which shall deprive the people of their resources, and stop the wheels of Government.

In regard to banks, the most recent experience shows that there is not only a possibility, but a probability of these occurrences. Why talk about the danger of entrusting money to individuals? The moneys placed in a bank are entrusted to individuals. And to say nothing of the suspensions, the insolvencies of the corporations, and the disgraceful disregard of all obligations of law and justice, so frequently manifested by them, how frequent, and how stupendous have been the frauds of late disclosed on the part of their officers and managers!

The gentleman from Massachusetts says that the promptings of insolvency "are too powerful for the Government, and that the Government, when duty comes in conflict with these promptings, is always the loser." That is the very suggestion by which the provisions of this bill are strongly commended. The provision which prohibits the use of the public money, and punishes that use as a crime—that principle, and that punishment will afford a security, which alone far more than over-balances all the objections urged. The principle that it was permissible to use the public money, nay, commendable so to do, has been the cause of more defalcations than all other circumstances combined. Individuals have been induced to enter into speculations; they have plunged deeper and deeper in the use of the public funds, which had first tempted them with the hope of extricating themselves by some fortunate issue. At length they have become inextricably involved, and lost their pride and character, and have boldly defied the Government they have plundered, because they have considered themselves only as unfortunate debtors instead of robbers of the public treasure. Thus the defaults are shown by returns to have been more numerous, and of larger amount in the years following the mad speculations caused by the expansions of the paper system. This bill pronounces the first step in the use of the public funds a crime, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Who will assert that this is not a safeguard, worth more in itself alone than the whole of those which can be applied to banking corporations.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, while he deprecates to a great extent the idea of drawing our examples from other nations, yet undertakes to fortify his objections to the bill by illustrations taken from foreign countries. He asserts it as a striking fact that those nations are at the bottom of the scale of civilization which employ individual depositaries and make use of coin; that, in Great Britain and France, which stand highest in the scale, banks are used, and that the station of nations in the intermediate points of the scale is measured by the proportion in which they make use of banks and paper. Does he mean to contend that banks and paper money are the causes of civilization? He admits that some of those countries which he has placed low in the scale, are paper money Governments, flooded with depreciated paper of all sorts. Why may we not with equal justice maintain that this is the cause of their inferior position? Even in relation to Turkey, which country, in one portion of his remarks, he adduced as demonstrating the truth of his position, and as standing among the lowest in his scale of nations, he made the vital admission (and I have taken down his words) that there "the Greek and Armenian bankers have as much to do in public affairs as ever the United States Bank had here."

It may be proper here to notice a remarkable fact in relation to the history of China, and it is this: Paper money has been used by the Chinese at various periods from as early a date as the tenth century. Like all such systems, it was productive of distress and ruin, till finally it exploded entirely; and after the year 1445, it is said their history makes no mention of any further paper issues. It is true that, in France, the notes of the Bank of France are taken in payment of public dues. But those notes are not of a denomination less than five hundred francs, and do not circulate much out of Paris. In a letter, published in the National Intelligencer of May 6, 1840, which refers to a work on finance by Baron Gautier, formerly one of the governors of the bank of France, and sub-minister of finance, the following head of one of his chapters is given:

"From the experience of the Bank of France, it is never desirable that banks should be employed in collections or disbursements of the public revenue."

In addition to these considerations, is the fact that, in France, specie now constitutes five-sixths of the circulation, and in England only three-sevenths. It is pertinent to inquire whether France was not civilized until her Bank was brought into existence.

John Law's scheme, which had as earnest and as able advocates as the present vicious banking system, and which was to carry forward the French nation on the swelling tide of wealth and prosperity with unexampled rapidity, exploded in 1720, spreading over the country such desolation and distress as can scarcely be imagined, much less portrayed. The Bank was not established till the year 1803. Was not England civilized in the seventeenth century? Were our ancestors, when they came here, uncivilized? Were the countrymen of Milton and Shakspeare barbarians? The Bank of England was chartered under William the Third, in 1693—at first as a mere corporation to loan money to Government. Its title was for granting duties on certain articles to those who will loan a million and a half pounds sterling to carry on the war with France, and for conferring certain other privileges. The notes of the Bank at first, and for many years, were on interest, and not properly a paper currency. And there are two facts which show the utter fallacy of reasoning from the use of the Bank of England by the English Government as a fiscal agent, in favor of the use of banks here for a similar purpose. In England, the whole capital of the Bank is loaned to the Government, and thus the Government must always be secure. The notes of the Bank are by law a legal tender, except to the Bank itself, and thus there would seem to be no reason why they should not be taken in payment of public dues. A strange argument indeed would it be, that because the Government of England receives what is a legal tender, our Government should receive what is not a legal tender!

Mr. Chairman, I have heard many glowing eulogiums on the wealth and power of England by the opponents of this bill. A gentleman from South Carolina, in the last Congress, in most vivid colors depicted her greatness, and attributed it to the banking and credit system, and called on us to follow her example. And the gentleman from Massachusetts has also, in eloquent terms, spoken of her vast dominion and her wealth. He has avowed that there is no Government he more respects, and, bringing her example forward as an argument against this measure, asserts that she has reached her present greatness, employing these very agents which we propose to reject.

In his description of the extent of her power, he has repeated the remark that the beat of the morning drum in her garrisons follows the dawn of day circling round the globe. Some, perhaps, might assert that the sun, as it circles round the globe, ceases not to dawn on some monument of her rapacity or injustice. If her civilization and power are owing to the banking system, I would inquire if this system is the cause, also, of her morality, of which we have recently heard something from the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] and which was alluded to recently by the gentleman himself, as signalized in her conduct towards China. And though, in addition to her European influence, she may be, as the gentleman says, the greatest Asiatic power, was not that power acquired by treachery and rapacity and bloodshed, and is it not supported by cruelty and injustice? One of her own orators has characterized it as "an empire which God never gave, sustained by means which He can never sanction." In the gorgeous picture presented to us of her wealth, we gaze at the splendid mansion, within which are gathered, for its lordly inhabitant, the luxuries of a world, and overlook the hovel, whose desolate inmates "cower, shivering and hunger stricken, into their lair of straw." She may be truly called a nation of princes and of paupers. What is the condition of the mass of the people? More than one-sixth of the population paupers! What is the condition of the laboring classes? Look at the accounts especially of the manufacturing districts. The laborer, throughout his whole existence, wrestles in deadly strife with the grim demon of starvation. Parents, after struggling for years, through regard for their offspring, almost without hope, at last yield to despair. Children know not the season of childhood, but, crippled and deformed by incessant labor and watching, and wasted by famine, find only in a premature grave a resting place from their toil and misery. Those who have so frequently enlarged here on the glory and riches and power of England, as proofs of the great advantages of their favorite system, hold up to our view the parks and palaces, the splendid equipages, the overgrown fortunes—aye, sir, the evidences of wealth accumulated, of wealth privileged, of a Government "founded on wealth;" but they say nothing of "the wide-spread wretchedness which is, so to speak, the rank manure which causes all these gaudy flowers to spring up and flourish."

The gentleman says that when you press out bank paper, Government paper comes up; that the Sub-Treasury has been in operation three years, and simultaneously Treasury notes have appeared, and that Treasury notes were previously a war measure. I believe suspension has previously been a consequence of war. And as the gentleman asserts that men sometimes "mistake contiguity and contemporaneity for cause and effect," it appears to me that he has fallen himself into that error. Will any one deny that the issue of Treasury notes of 1837 was caused by the suspension of the banks, and thus owing to the bank deposite system? And the gentleman himself has furnished the answer to his own position; for he compares Treasury notes to English exchequer bills, or Government paper in Spain and Russia, and the similar issues of "all nations in debt." Then it is the being in debt which causes these issues, and not the circumstance of employing individuals as depositaries.

In relation to the argument on the expense of carrying on this system, it is only necessary to say that the objections are not so much drawn from any provisions of the bill, as from that spirit of prophecy which enables the gentleman to foresee "a new corps of clerks." It is not easy to conceive why more clerks than those provided in the bill should become necessary, though it is easy to assert that more will be needed. But Congress must authorize them if they are to be employed, and the Representatives of the people may, I hope, be safely trusted. I repeat what I have before remarked, that the expenses contemplated by this bill of putting the system in operation, and the yearly cost of maintaining it are trifling, as all who take the trouble to examine the details of the bill will see, and those expenses will be far more than compensated by the additional security it furnishes against losses.

Another objection is urged against this measure; that it increases the power and patronage of the Government. But the gentleman here makes a very important admission, to which I call the attention of the committee. He admits that the patronage under this system is less than under the State bank deposite system. I hold the gentleman and his friends to that admission, for it seems to me to cover the whole ground. It is to the banking system that the patronage is incident, and whether a system of State banks, or a mighty institution, extending its branches into all parts of the country, the nature of the danger is not thereby altered. Sir, the admission excludes from the gentleman's argument the State bank deposite system. What is his alternative? There can be no other but an United States Bank. Are the people of this country ready to charter such an institution? The gentleman says that the bill has many features of a bank, though he does not contend that it is exactly a bank; but if an United States Bank be dangerous, so far as this resembles a bank this must be dangerous. I will remark, in passing, that this is not a legitimate argument for him, who, so far as he can be understood to advocate any fiscal measure, advocates a bank. But one point of analogy referred to is singular. He remarks that the average amount of specie in the Bank of the United States was ten millions, and that the amount kept by the depositaries under this bill will be, as is estimated, five millions, and thus the peril, in this respect, will be half as great. I had supposed that one great difficulty with the banking system was, not that there was too much, but too little specie in their vaults. What possible resemblance is there in the cases. The money in the Treasury, and in the hands of depositaries cannot be used by the officers of the Government, nor by any one by their permission. Neither the President, nor the Secretary of the Treasury, nor the Treasurer, nor any other officer, can use one single cent. They cannot lend it. No one can scramble for a loan of the funds of the people for the purpose of using those funds in private speculation. It must be obvious to all that the safekeeping of public moneys, without the liberty of using them, affords no source of patronage. Before a public officer can avail himself of their use, for the purposes of patronage, he must first become a felon—which has not generally been considered a very effectual method of increasing one's influence or power.

But to show that this bill contains that monste not usually so much dreaded by the Opposition—a bank—lurking in the covert of its provisions, the gentleman has undertaken to point out the sections which give reason for this alarm. And I ask the indulgence of the committee, if I speak with some degree of particularity on this topic, that they may see, and the people may see the nature of the attempts which are made to inculcate the impression that this is a bank in disguise.

The tenth section is first specified, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer moneys from the hands of one depositary to another, as the safety of the public moneys and the convenience of the public may require, "to be there safely kept according to the provisions of this act." Is there any thing novel or alarming in this? Does not every one know that this power of necessity belongs to the Secretary? I shall hereafter show that it has always been exercised; and pass on to the sixteenth section, which the gentleman says is still more remarkable. The section is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That all marshals, district attorneys, and others, having public money to pay to the United States, and all patentees wishing to make payment for patents to be issued, may pay all such moneys to the Treasurer of the United States, at the Treasury, to the Treasurer of either of the mints, in Philadelphia or New Orleans, to either of the receivers general of the public money, or to such other depositary constituted by this act as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in other parts of the United States to receive such payments, and give receipts or certificates of deposite therefor."

These certificates of deposite the gentleman contends may go into circulation. Now let us examine this matter. By the eleventh section of the bill, all moneys in the care of depositaries are considered and held "as deposited to the credit of the Treasurer." A person having "public money to pay to the United States" may pay it to one of the depositaries alluded to in the section above recited, and take the officer's receipt or certificate of deposite therefor. The individual owes the United States; he pays the money; he takes a receipt, which is his discharge from the debt; and which is also a certificate of deposite. Deposite for whose benefit? Not for the individuals paying the money; for he owed the money, and has paid the debt. But to the credit of the Treasurer. If gentlemen were to undertake to travel on a currency composed of these receipts or certificates of deposite to the credit of the Treasurer, I imagine they would soon reach their journey's end. Suppose I owed a tradesman on the avenue, and were to pay his bill, and take his receipt, I might, according to this doctrine, pass his receipt as currency!

Equally unfounded in reason is the objection to the 21st section, which provides that no exchange of funds shall be made by any disbursing officers, or other agents of the Government, other than an exchange for gold or silver—that it applies only to Government officers. To whom should it apply? If an individual to whom the Government is indebted has received funds of the Government in payment of his claim, those funds become his own, and he has a right to use them as he pleases. The section contains most important provisions for the security of the public, by taking away from Government agents the power of exchanging Government funds for those of inferior value, and imposing the latter on Government creditors, and thus speculating on their loss.

But reference is also made to the 23d section, which is in the following words:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all Government drafts for payment at the place where payable, and to prescribe the time according to the different distances of the depositaries from the seat of Government, within which all drafts upon them respectively, shall be presented for payment; and in default of such presentation, to direct any other mode and place of payment which he may deem proper; but, in all those regulations and directions, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to guard, as far as may be, against those drafts being used or thrown into circulation as a paper currency or medium of exchange."

The gentleman says that this section consists of "words and words only," and that you cannot, by any power of Government, prevent drafts being used as currency. If the section is composed of "words and words only," it can do no harm; but I apprehend it will be found to contain some ideas also. It is a section of limitation. It contains a limitation on the laws and practice as now existing, and as they always have existed. Why so much alarm now on account of Treasury drafts? All gentlemen who have received payment of claims on the Treasury for their constituents, know that a Treasury draft is no novelty. Such drafts have always been used, and by necessity always must be; and it makes no difference whether they are drawn on banks or individual depositaries. If these constitute a Treasury bank, such a bank is now in existence, and has existed ever since the foundation of the Government. If they are to constitute a circulation of twenty, twenty-five, or thirty millions of dollars, why has not such a circulation heretofore been, why is it not now, in existence? The fact that such a circulation has not prevailed, scatters at once to the winds all these fine-spun theories. The amount of Treasury drafts outstanding at any one time is usually quite inconsiderable. On the 19th of May last, it was only $762,956 02, and three-fourths of that amount had probably been issued within a week previous.

In a report of Mr. Baldwin, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, made to the House of Representatives, May 22, 1794, the following passages may be found:

"The duties of the several officers of the Treasury Department, with regard to the collecting, receiving, keeping, and disbursing public moneys, and regulating and keeping the accounts thereof, are as follows:

"The Secretary of the Treasury superintends the collection and receipt and the disbursement of public moneys. In consequence of this, all authorities for transferring them from one public agent to another, or for the final disbursement of them, originate with him. He directs the drawing of moneys into the Treasury, and regulates the time, manner, and circumstances, subject to the sanctions prescribed by law; and judges exclusively of the other officers of the Department, when, and what disbursements are to be made—subject, nevertheless, to the check of the Comptroller, who, in countersigning warrants, is jointly responsible with him for their being conformable to appropriations by law, and to the further check and settlement of the accounts of all persons to whom he may have caused advances of public money, by the Auditor and Comptroller. All warrants for the payment of money into the Treasury, or for the payment of money out of the Treasury, are first signed by him. It is also his duty to decide on the forms of keeping all public accounts.

"The Treasurer keeps and disburses the moneys of the United States. All his receipts, as well as his disbursements, are sanctioned by warrants of the description already given. As incident to these duties, he draws, under the direction of the Secretary, all bills which are drawn for public moneys arising from sources foreign or domestic; which bills, as already mentioned, are always registered, or entered and countersigned, by the Register, or in the case of domestic bills, by his confidential clerk, in his stead."

And yet gentlemen talk about transfers of the public funds and Treasury drafts, as if these things were now for the first time heard of! It would have been safer for gentlemen of the Opposition to have continued to deal in general charges, than to have undertaken to specify the particular provisions which constitute this measure a bank. I trust a sufficient illustration has been given of the nature of the efforts which have been made to convince the people that this is a bank, and should undervalue their intelligence, did I believe that such efforts could meet with any success.

I will dismiss this part of the subject by remarking, that the Secretary of the Treasury can, by his regulations, prevent Treasury drafts from being used as a currency more effectually than any general law, for he can alter those regulations as exigencies may arise, and such regulations, the bill, in express terms, makes it his duty to prescribe and enforce.

Next, sir, suffer me briefly to reply to some of the objections to the currency feature of this measure. The gentleman asks "if specie is to be the universal currency," and objects to a specie currency that it is dependant on foreign countries, and identified with all the vibrations of business in Europe.

It is not the fact that we are entirely dependant for specie on Europe. The precious metals are, to a considerable extent, produced in some parts of our country. But lay that fact entirely aside, is the argument legitimate? Shall the use of tea and coffee be discontinued because we do not produce those articles? It is a well settled fact, that, by the laws of trade, specie will always flow in where there is a demand for it. But does the gentleman contend for an entire paper currency—a paper currency which is to be a substitute for the precious metals, and not for a paper currency founded on the metals, and a representative of them? He will not say he does. Then, sir, his argument operates with threefold force against himself. Suppose the banks to issue only three dollars of paper to one dollar of the precious metals in their vaults; though it is well known they issue paper in much larger proportion. If the fluctuations in foreign countries draw abroad one million of specie, three millions are taken from the circulation. Thus, on such a circulation, the vibrations in foreign countries must operate with triple force.

The question is put whether we will throw away that credit which increases in proportion as institutions are free? If, by credit, is meant a sound, healthy, and safe credit, that credit which alone is congenial to free institutions, no one is more favorable towards it than I am. But if the gentleman means the modern credit and banking system which has already involved so many in ruin, and had so injurious an effect, not only on the public prosperity, but on the public morals, I conceive it to be founded, not on just "confidence," but on credulity. It is nothing more nor less than John Law's scheme revived. Confidence and credit were never carried to so great an extent as under that scheme in France, and it was under the rule of that profligate tyrant, the Regent Duke of Orleans. No one will, I believe, contend, that, then, France was distinguished for her "free institutions."

It has been stated that the appellation of this measure is appropriate, because it constitutes a Treasury "independent" of the people. I had supposed this appellation referred to making the Treasury independent of banks, and as I do not agree that they are the people, think it appropriate in that sense. The gentleman also urges the oft repeated argument that it furnishes for the Government a "superior currency, of specie and Government paper, and to the people an inferior currency." Yes, sir, these were his very words. If my recollection serves me, on one or two occasions the gentleman has contended that a Government paper currency was the worst of all currencies, and likened it to the old continental money. But let that pass. I defy the ingenuity of man to show that the currency received and paid out by the Government of the people is not to that extent also the currency of the people. If then specie be, as the gentleman admits, a "superior currency," why shall the people not enjoy it? If bank paper be an "inferior currency," shall the people have it forced on them for the benefit of banks and bankers? The gentleman has introduced the resolutions passed by the Legislature of his State on the subject of the measure before us. I ask permission to read from the Morning Post, which, as the gentleman has also read an extract from that paper, I presume he will consider good authority, a sketch of some proceedings which took place in the Legislature of Massachusetts when those resolutions were before them. And I would respectfully inquire of the gentleman whether he may not have been imprudent in making admissions which his friends in the Legislature most carefully avoided. The third resolve of the Legislature is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Sub-Treasury bill, by giving to the Government and its officers a different currency from that provided for the people, and by increasing the power and patronage of the Executive, is hostile to the genius, and may be destructive to the permanence, of our Republican institutions."

"Mr Rantoul rose to propose an amendment, by striking out the word 'different,' in the second line of the third resolve, and substituting therefor the word better.

"He said he supposed the friends of the order intended to put forth something strong and pungent against the Sub-Treasury bill, and as the words 'different currency' did not intimate whether a better or worse currency had been promised, he presumed that his amendment, rendering that point definite, would be acceptable.

"Mr. Gray of Boston was perfectly satisfied with the severity of the resolves in their present state.

"The question was then taken, and the amendment negatived.

"Mr. Rantoul then proposed to amend the said resolve, by striking out said word 'different' and inserting instead the word worse.

"A member in front of the Speaker said he felt strongly inclined to move the previous question.

"Mr. Rantoul said he should not express any surprise at such a motion, but would remind the House that for the last ten weeks the Sub-Treasury bill had been assailed daily, without one single word having been uttered in its favor.

"The question was then taken on substituting the word worse for 'different,' and the amendment was negatived.

"Mr. Rantoul now moved to amend, by striking out the whole of the first resolve, and inserting a new one, made up of passages extracted from two speeches made by Daniel Webster in Congress in 1816:

"Resolved, That the framers of the Constitution were HARD MONEY MEN. They had felt, and therefore duly appreciated the evils of a paper medium. They, therefore, sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States is gold and silver coin. This is the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad; that this Government has a right, in all cases, to protect its own revenues, and to guard them against defalcation by bad or depreciated paper; that the only power which the General Government possesses of restraining the issues of the State banks, is to refuse their notes in receipt of the Treasury; that bank paper not being a part of the legal money of the country, it cannot, by law, be received in the payment of duties, taxes, or other debts, to Government; that, as to the opinion advanced by some, that the revenues cannot be collected otherwise than * * * * in the paper of any and every banking association which chooses to issue paper, it cannot for a moment be admitted. This would be at once giving up the Government; for what is Government without revenue, and what is a revenue that is gathered together in the varying, fluctuating, discredited, depreciated, * * * * promissory notes of two or three hundred distinct, and, as to Government, irresponsible banking companies? IF IT CANNOT COLLECT ITS REVENUES IN A BETTER MANNER THAN THIS, it must cease to be a Government; that it is quite clear that by the statute all duties and taxes are required to be paid in the legal money of the United States, or in Treasury notes; that if Congress were to pass forty statutes on the subject, they could not make the law more imperative than it now is, that nothing should be received in payment of duties to the Government but specie. The whole strength of the Government, we are of opinion, should be put forth to compel the payment of duties and taxes to the Government in the LEGAL CURRENCY OF THE COUNTRY."

The gentleman from Massachusets assserts, "that it is a fallacy that a specie currency is provided for in the Constitution," and that the word "currency," is not used in the Constitution. I am happy that the advocates of the United States Bank have discovered at length that the word currency is not in that instrument; for I well recollect hearing a long argument from a distinguished Opposition orator of my own State, in favor of the constitutionality of that institution, founded on the power which he said was given in the Constitution to regulate the currency. No one can read the debates in the Madison papers without agreeing with Mr. Webster, in the sentiment expressed by him in 1816, that the framers of the Constitution were "hard money men," and that they "had felt, and therefore duly appreciated the evils of a paper medium." The Constitution confers on the Government the power "to coin money, and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." It prohibits the States from making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender, and from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. This is sufficient to show, that so far as the Government is concerned, at least, "the legal currency of the United States is gold and silver coin." The first law on the subject, after the organization of the Government, under the present Constitution, which was passed in 1789, prescribes that the "duties and fees to be collected, by virtue of this act, shall be collected in gold and silver coin only;" and even the resolution of 1816, which contains the first legal provision, authorizing the reception of notes of specie paying State banks, recognises gold and silver as "the legal currency of the United States."

Can it be true, as the gentleman asserts, that the "Constitution leaves it to somebody else to provide currency" for the Government? What somebody else? The Constitution does not point out the persons or corporations by whom it shall be provided. If, then, according to the Constitution, the currency is to be provided by others, Government is bound to take that currency, no matter what it is, and our revenue may be paid in bills of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the Patapsco Canal Company, which the gentleman held up here in derision.

Another objection is urged that, according to the language of a resolution adopted by the House last year, we have no right to do that indirectly which we cannot do directly; and that this being a bill for collecting and keeping the public revenue, we propose to affect the currency, which is a subject we have no business with. I reply that there is no indirection here. The object of the bill is, as it purports to be, to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue. So far as it relates to its effects on the currency, those effects, however desirable they may be, are entirely incidental. The bill refrains to act on currency at all, except so far as to provide that the revenue shall eventually be collected in gold and silver coin, which alone by the Constitution is a legal tender, and of which alone, by the Constitution, we have any right to regulate the value. Suppose the bill provided for the receptibility of the paper of certain banks, as the gentleman and his friends desire. This would clearly be more liable to the reproach of "acting on currency," because it would give to the paper of those banks an additional circulation and an additional value.

The gentleman says the pet bank scheme exploded, and left the ground covered with patients bruised, and with broken arms and mangled limbs, and the President, who ought to have been their physician, left them to their fate, and would not prescribe even a single plaister, and that he is, therefore, for calling in Dr. Harrison. I fear, from the sentiments of his friends, this renowned sage would have nothing else but plasters to prescribe as a remedy, and those of the worst sort, namely, shinplasters; and that, like the celebrated Dr. Sangrado, who, when his patients were dying of his prescriptions of bleeding and warm water, told them to double the dose—for a disease caused by overbanking, he would prescribe—a Bank.

Allusion has been made to the suspension of the banks in 1839, extending over the South and West, and including Pennsylvania, and the gentleman triumphantly remarks that it was not Pennsylvania, with her Van Buren Governor, that weathered the storm, but New York and Massachusetts. The boldness manifested in treading upon this ground is, to say the least, a subject of admiration. The suspension has taken place in that portion of the country most immediately under the influence of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, the great regulator. Who that was here at the extra session, does not remember the glowing eulogiums passed upon that Bank on its solvency—its fidelity—nay, its patriotism? Apparently the Opposition would then have eagerly seized any opportunity to have made that institution again the fiscal agent of the Government. What is now its condition? Hopelessly bankrupt! The term which has been boastingly applied to it of "great regulator," has become one of bitter sarcasm:

"The desolator desolate,
The victor overthrown,
The arbiter of other's fate
A suppliant for its own."

This condition is not owing to the refusal of a recharter by the United States Government, for the president of the Bank has announced that the Bank was stronger under the State charter than before. And yet the Democratic party have been denounced again and again for not rechartering that institution! They have been denounced, until a recent date, for not employing it as a fiscal agent! Will any one now say that institution should have been rechartered, or is now worthy to be employed as the fiscal agent of the Government? No, sir. If, then, gentlemen have been so much mistaken in their struggles for this Bank, I ask them how they know they are not quite as much so in their arguments in favor of chartering another?

But the gentleman says some are for reforming, some for destroying the banks, and asserts that his sympathies are with the former. He acknowledges that he is "for infusing a larger quantity of specie into circulation. Then, I ask, whence his objection to this bill? To infuse a larger quantity of specie into circulation will be its acknowledged effect. Unless the Opposition are for an entire paper currency, what possible objection can they have to the measure, so far as regards its effect on the currency, for that effect can only be to increase, in a limited extent, the quantity of specie in circulation. Let them come out frankly, if such be the fact, and acknowledge that they are for an entire paper currency—a currency not the representative of coin, but the substitute for it. It is generally acknowledged that coin will not circulate to any great amount in company with paper of equal denomination.

Mr. Burke is reported to have sent word to Pitt, that if he issued one pound notes, he would never see another guinea. Mr. Huskinson, in 1826, gave it as "his opinion—an opinion not hastily formed, but the result of long and anxious observation—that a permanent state of cash payments, and a circulation of one and two pound notes, could not coexist."

We have been accused of broaching newfangled doctrines and trampling on the fathers of the Republic. I ask leave to read an extract from a letter of Mr. Jefferson, written, I think, in 1813:

"At the time we were funding our national debt we heard much about a public debt being a public blessing, that the stock representing it was a creation of active capital for the aliment of commerce, manufactures, and agriculture. The paradox was well adapted to the minds of the believers in dreams and the gulls of that size entered bona fide into it. But the art and mystery of banks is a wonderful improvement on that. It is established on the principle that private debts called bank notes, become active capital and aliment to the whole commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of the United States.

Permit me also to read part of a letter from George Washington, the father of his country, to Thomas Stone, dated February 16, 1787:

"I do not scruple to declare that if I had a voice in your Legislature, it would have been given decidedly against a paper emission upon the general principles of its utility as a representative, and the necessity of it as a medium.

"To assign reasons for this opinion would be as unnecessary as tedious. The ground has been so often trod, that a place hardly remains untouched. In a word, the necessity arising from a want of specie is represented as greater than it really is. I contend it is by the substance, not with the shadow of a thing, we are to be benefited. The wisdom of man, in my humble opinion, cannot at this time devise a plan by which the credit of paper money would be long supported; consequently depreciation keeps pace with the quantity of the emission, and articles for which it is exchanged rise in a greater ratio than the sterling value of the money. Wherein then is the farmer, the planter, the artisan benefited? The debtor may be, because, as I have observed, he gives the shadow in lieu of the substance; and in proportion to his gain, the creditor or the body politic suffers. Whether it be a legal tender or not, it will, as has been observed very truly, leave no alternative. It must be that or nothing. An evil equally great is, the door it immediately opens for speculation, by which the least designing, and perhaps most valuable part of the community, are preyed upon by the more knowing and crafty speculators."

None can forget how frequent and loud have been the charges made heretofore against the Democratic party of being agrarians—of attacking property and the rights of property, and the interests of the wealthy part of the community. Recently another part is played, and gentlemen of the Opposition are suddenly seized with an unwonted regard for "the poor laborer." But it is a little inconsistent to play both these parts at once. One objection brought against this bill by the gentleman from Massachusetts is, that it is "alarming to capitalists;" another, that it will operate injuriously by "confining trade to capitalists." He asserts its effect will be, by reducing the price of production, to benefit the manufacturing capitalist and the planter, at the expense of the laborer. Sir, it is one of the chief recommendations of the measure, to my mind, that its effect will be to increase the value of the wages of labor. What does it avail the laborer for you to give him five dollars, or even five hundred dollars, in nominal amount, for his day's work, if the whole will not buy him a single breakfast? Of all other persons, the laborer is the one most injured by the violent and sudden fluctuations incident to the present paper system. In these fluctuations, labor is the last thing to rise, and the first to fall. The laborer is frequently suddenly thrown out of employment. He is also, from not knowing the state of these banking institutions, which varies daily, more than all others likely to be defrauded by depreciated paper. The sharper and speculator are constantly on the look out, and see the storm coming from afar in season to escape, and it bursts on the farmer and the laborer, who are quietly, and without suspicion, following their daily occupations. As these are somewhat important considerations, I beg leave to refer to an authority that will, I presume, be deemed conclusive on the subject by gentlemen of the Opposition. The extracts which I will read are from the message of Mr. John Davis, who is now a Senator, delivered to the Legislature of Massachusetts in 1834. The sentiments therein expressed were, no doubt, the result of his calm and impartial reflections; they came from him when he was bound by his oath, and every obligation of honor and of gratitude to recommend those measures which he thought would be for the benefit of the people who had made him their Chief Executive Magistrate, and when, in their utterance, he could have had no partisan purposes to answer. Mr. Davis, as Governor, said:

"There is doubtless a difference of opinion as to the causes which produce the great vacillations in the money market. At one time the premium on capital falls below the legal rate of interest; at another, money can scarcely be had on any terms. There can, however, be little doubt that the small quantity of specie in circulation is one of the causes tending to produce these disastrous fluctuations. If a panic should seize the pubtic, if distrust should overshadow our banks but for a day, all payments in specie would cease, for the funds on hand do not amount to one twelfth of the bills in circulation and those deposites they are bound to pay on demand. This disproportion between specie and paper cannot be materially increased. If the quantity of specie is diminished, the paper circulation must be curtailed. If it is increased, the paper may also be increased. The paper, therefore, fluctuates as its basis changes."

"The disastrous fluctuations which we experience (he adds in 1834) are to some extent to be imputed to the fluctuations in specie, (meaning in amount, not in value) and the smaller the amount of specie in the county, the more likely they are to occur. The most obvious remedy, therefore, against the recurrence of this calamity, and the most certain method of saving the active industry of the country from the devouring vortex of this almost periodical disaster, which comes of curtailing discounts, is to increase, by some judicious regulations, the quantity of specie in circulation to such an extent that these occasional drains shall not curtail the circulating medium so as to produce such consequences. If the circulation of small bills had never been permitted, but their places had been supplied with specie, the quantity now in circulation would be large, and would greatly strengthen the confidence of the public and the ability of the banks, as it would flow in to supply the place of that drained off, and thus supersede, to a great extent, the occasion for these forced curtailments of discounts which always prove injurious to the public. The States which have adopted this course, are best supplied with specie, and if the whole country could be prevailed on to suppress small bills, great relief would be realized from it."

"Experience has long since proved that a metallic currency is least liable to fluctuations, and therefore best adapted to the purpose for which it is designed; and it is to be hoped the earliest opportunity will be seized to return to it, so far, at least, as to rectify the present credit system of paper currency, and prevent its pernicious fluctuations."

"Fluctuations visit all who have property, and all who work to acquire it, with injury, and compel them to submit to severe sacrifices. What is called a scarcity of money, only means that the banks do not discount. Upon a pressure thus occasioned, we have seen good estates dwindle, until their possessors were left bankrupt. We have seen laborers thrown out of employ, or their wages greatly reduced; and business either suspended or dragging those engaged in it towards ruin. We have seen, also, great anxiety and dismay pervade the whole public."

"Believing that under our present [credit] system we may be again witnesses of these scenes of suffering, I cannot relinquish the hope that your wisdom will devise some way of giving greater stability to the local currency."

Here we have the doctrine laid down that the small quantity of specie in circulation tends to produce these disastrous fluctuations—an increase of the quantity of specie in circulation recommended, and the suppression of small bills pointed out as a measure of relief—and the fluctuations of the paper system are referred to as the cause of laborers being thrown out of employ, and their wages greatly reduced.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has asserted that the manufacturers of the North do not desire to stand apart from the laborers, and if they believed they were to gain by this measure they would "disdain to receive a boon at the expense of the laborer." Quite high-minded, truly! I ask, sir, if this is consonant with what we know of the operations of self-interest, and the history of human nature? I know that, to a certain extent, the interest of the laborer and the capitalist may be theoretically identical. It is for the interest of the laborer that the capitalist should realize sufficient profit to enable him to pay large wages. But practically their interest is not the same. It is the interest of the capitalist to reduce wages as low as possible, because the lower the wages, the greater are his profits. You say you cannot trust individual agents, selected for their integrity of character, with the safekeeping of the people's money, for fear they will steal it; and do you tell me that it is safe to trust the interest of the laborer to their employers alone, because the latter would "disdain" to receive a boon at the expense of the former? The President and the Administration wish to crush the laborer! What possible motive can they have for such an attempt, which could only operate to their own injury and disgrace? I repeat, sir, that it is for the interest of the capitalist to reduce the wages of labor in proportion to other things, because thereby his profits are increased. Can, then, the interest of the laborer be safely left to these great capitalists and large manufacturing corporations? Sir, it is nothing more nor less than the doctrine, "let Government take care of the rich and the rich will take care of the poor." No sooner was the speech of Mr. DAVIS of this session delivered, than it was hailed by these friends of the "poor laborer" as a signal for commencing the manifestations of their regard. These corporations began to reduce the wages of their operatives; but I have never learned that they have cut down the princely salaries which their agents and other officers enjoy—salaries, some of them, in my own State, double in amount to those of the Governor or Judges of the Superior Court? Have these capitalists ever shown any particular modesty in refusing to accept special privileges, or any "disdain" of benefits in which others could not equally participate? Have they not always been ready to besiege the halls of legislation, both State and National, in order to procure the passage of laws to subserve their own interest? I ask this committee, then—and I ask the people of this country—whether, if the manufacturing capitalists really believed the effect of this bill would be to reduce the wages of labor below their proportion to other things, they would take the trouble to be so clamorous, as most of them are, in opposition to it? This regard for he poor laborer is somewhat similar to that which prompted such expressions of indignation from many of the Opposition presses against the President for his recent order that the laborers employed by the United States should only be obliged to work ten hours a day—a regulation so highly conducive to the comfort and benefit of the laboring man, and which enables him to devote a portion of time to his family and to mental improvement.

Time will not permit me to dwell longer on these topics, as the lateness of the hour warns me to hasten as quickly as possible to a conclusion. I have already referred to the fact, that the public money is, and always has been, collected by our own officers. If they can be trusted to collect it, why may they not also be trusted to keep it for a short time? It must be greed for gain, and the selfish and monopolizing spirit incident to moneyed institutions, that urge the banks to come in and ask, nay, demand the use of the money of the people. Thus are they prompted to wage a war on the Government of the people. It is a remark of Burke, in his speech on economical reform, "that the cold commendation of a public advantage never was, and never will be, a match for the quick sensibility of a private loss;" and that "when a considerable number of persons have an interest in railing, they will be apt to bring some degree of unpopularity upon any measure." In no other manner can we account for the desperate opposition which has been carried on against this bill. To a well regulated bank the use of the funds of the Government is not desirable, because the amount must be subject to continual and sudden variations. When these funds, on which discounts have been made, are suddenly withdrawn to meet the exigencies of the Government, the loans of the bank are contracted, the institution is embarrassed, and the community distressed. What right have banks to the use of the moneys of the people for purposes of private gain? Suppose there were no banking corporations, and that this branch of business was conducted by private bankers. Would you give to these individuals, or to any of them, the liberty of using the people's money to trade on it? Would not this clearly be considered a special and illegal privilege? There is another consideration which is of grave importance. If banks and bankers are to have the public money to increase their own profits, their interest certainly will cause them to desire those deposites to be as large as possible. Let any reflecting man answer the question whether it is the part of wisdom to make it the interest of a numerous and powerful portion of the community, that the people should be taxed to the greatest possible extent? Is it the part of a true representative of the people, to advocate a system which makes it the direct interest of so powerful a class, for the sake of enhancing their own profits, to increase the expenditures of the Government, and the burdens on the people? I think not.

To use the words of Mr. Webster, "what is a Government without revenue?" It is necessary for the Government of the people to have the control of the revenue for legal purposes. The moment that control fails, the people suffer. Shall all this power be exercised by irresponsible corporations? It is an acknowledged fact that, on account of their exemption, and that of their members, from individual responsibility, corporations will frequently be guilty of that of which every individual composing them would be ashamed in his private capacity. Is their interest always that of the people? Experience has too plainly shown the reverse. Are banking corporations actuated by conscience and honor, or even by an ennobling ambition, or are they moved by the spirit of pecuniary gain alone? Would you select a corporation to exercise any other important trust in Government? How degrading is the idea that corporations can be trusted, but man cannot.

I will now ask the attention of the committee for a few moments to the nature of the objections which have been urged here and elsewhere against this measure. Those objections are utterly inconsistent with each other, and suicidal. And they are, in many instances, objections drawn from effects, which even the objectors themselves acknowledge the bill will not produce. When the opponents of a measure are driven to resort to such shifts, an inference may fairly be deduced that reasons, with them, are not "as plenty as blackberries" The gentleman from Massachusetts assumes that the bill is to create an entire specie currency, and argues against that. Next he assumes it is to create a paper currency, and argues against that. He argues against the bill because the depositaries created in it will not be so safe nor convenient as a bank or banks. Next he argues against it because, in so many respects, it is a bank. His whole argument is based on the superior safety of banks as depositaries, and the propriety of receiving their paper; yet he admits that the State bank deposite system has failed, and involved the Government and people in common bankruptcy and ruin. He objects to this scheme because, he says, it gives a superior currency of gold and silver and Government paper to the Government, and an inferior currency to the people. Yet a large portion of his speech was devoted to proving that specie is an inferior currency, and adducing arguments in favor of a currency of bank paper. He objects to the example of Holland as applicable to us, because the inhabitants of that country are enabled to use specie on account of the limited extent of their territory. Yet, he says the Dutch are too wise, and have been too long used to business, not to use paper. He contends that those countries which use banks as depositaries and take their paper, are the highest in the scale of civilization, and would almost seem to make the "banker with his notes" the prime cause not only of civilization, but of liberty. He argues that the disuse of banks and the use of specie indicate barbarism, and refers to Turkey as a country scarcely within the pale of civilized nations. Yet, he says the Greek and Armenian bankers have as much to do with the administration of public affairs in Turkey as ever the United States Bank had in this country. He intimates that Government paper is the necessary result of dispensing with the use of banks as depositaries; yet again, in the instances of England, Spain, and Russia, he speaks of Government paper as the necessary consequence of being in debt. And while he distrusts a reference to foreign countries, whose institutions are so dissimilar to our own—he pronounces an eloquent eulogium on Great Britain, and would seem to attribute her greatness to her credit and banking system. He admits, in so many words, that there is less Executive power and patronage in this scheme than in the system of pet banks. Yet he objects to the scheme on account of its patronage, and the whole drift of his argument is in favor of employing banks. He contends that if an United States Bank is dangerous, so far as this resembles a bank, this scheme must be dangerous also. Yet who can divine his scheme, if it be not the State bank system, or this very United States Bank. And when he lays it down as a principle indisputable, that great power to do good is necessarily connected with equal power to do evil, what an irresistible argument has he furnished against the expediency of such an institution! He has expressed his hope that this measure was not to be supported by an "idle clamor against banks." I believe, sir, this measure can only be opposed by an idle clamor in their favor—a clamor, the justice of which is disproved by arguments, drawn from analogy—from the nature of corporations—from the nature of man; contradicted by the lessons of experience—by the dictates of common sense—and, I had almost said, of common honesty.

With regard to the assertion that this system was put in operation by the President of his own mere motion, it is sufficient to say that so far as it has been in operation, it was by the express provisions of law. If the President or the Secretary had disregarded those provisions, they would have subjected themselves to impeachment, and would have richly deserved it. Have the advocates of the banks become so bold as openly to require that the laws of the land shall be set at naught by the agents of the people, for the benefit of those corporations? The gentleman inquires if the apprehension of this measure has caused so much distress, what will be its effect when it passes and becomes a law? Yet, again, he contends that it has been in operation three years already. He asserts it is an Executive measure, and that it has been condemned by the people, because it was rejected by the members of the House of Representatives of the last Congress, who, he says, came direct and "unsophisticated" from the people. Now it is well known that the members of the last House were not elected in reference to this measure. Most of them were elected before the suspension by the banks; and the time of their assembling here was the time of their reception of the President's message which first recommended the measure.

This, then, is what is meant by a Representative coming "unsophisticated" from the people. For a representative to be unsophisticated means that he does not know, and has not the means of knowing, the sentiments of his constituents. I had supposed that the popular voice might be more truly expressed by representatives who knew the will of their constituents, and were elected to carry that will into effect. That is the case with regard to the members of this House in relation to this bill. The remark of a gentleman of the Opposition made here the other day is correct; that every member was sent here as being either for or against this measure. This measure was before the people in the elections of members of the present Congress. But the gentleman complains that the appropriation bills which are "to supply the necessities of the Government itself" are thrust aside. A novel complaint truly from that quarter! When we desire to take up an appropriation bill, the cry of the Opposition is, "you do nothing for the people—you hasten to provide for the Government and for office holders, and disregard every thing else." Now, when we insist on taking up this bill, which the people have said ought to pass, we are accused of not providing for the necessities of the Government. The gentleman says that he knows not why the measure is brought forward, except for the reason that the Opposition have taunted the Administration and dared them to do it. It was not very patriotic in them if they supposed the bill was to be productive of so much desolation and ruin, to indulge in taunts which were to have such an influence! But I confess I have never seen any thing in their powers of sarcasm to induce me to believe their taunts could possess so much power. If their taunts have had so much effect, I can only say that their taunts are much more powerful in favor of the bill, than their arguments are against it. The gentleman also says that it is the course of wisdom and policy that this bill should not be passed now, because if there should be a change of Administration the bill may be repealed. Thus the intimation is thrown out, that in case of the defeat of Mr. Van Buren's re-election this measure is to be repealed? What must follow! An United States Bank. The defeat of Mr. Van Buren is to be the triumph of the banks over the people! Are the people ready to submit to that triumph? No, sir, they will support him who has stood by them in this deadly contest, waged against their rights, their liberties, their interest, and their honor. The Opposition, it is said by the gentleman, at least have ground of hope that the Administration will be put out of office, and that "wiser and better men" will succeed. It is sufficient to observe, in reply, that the gentleman belongs to a party whose "vocation" it has been for many years, and I trust and believe will be for many years to come—to hope—and that the opinion of individuals as to their own wisdom and virtue is not always the best evidence either of that virtue or that wisdom.

Mr. Chairman, let me for a moment advert to the extraordinary course pursued by the gentleman from Massachusetts. When this bill was taken up in committee, he immediately made a motion to strike out the enacting clause, which motion, if successful, causes the rejection of the bill. After he had made this motion, he turned to me and asked for arguments why the bill should pass. He made the motion to destroy the bill, and then requested me to give him reasons why he should not do what he had already done. Yes, sir, he "shrunk" from his own motion. It became my duty to suggest that the measure was not a new one to the members of the House, nor to the people, but had been discussed and made the test in the elections of members of the House, and that he, having made a motion, the effect of which, if successful, would be to destroy the bill, it was incumbent on him to give to the House and to the country the reasons which had induced his course. After this—after he had thus shrunk from his own motion, when he vauntingly said "he would not shrink from the challenge," it indicated a state of mind somewhat similar to that of the renowned Robert Acres, who, when on his way to the field of combat, to which he had summoned his antagonist, exclaimed to his second, "we won't run, will we, Sir Lucius."

All acknowledge that some legislation is necessary on the subject of the collection and safekeeping of the public moneys, for the security of the public. We have brought forward the measure in favor of which the people have deliberately decided. Do gentlemen propose any substitute? No sir! An attempt is made, not to amend or improve—not to substitute another plan—but to destroy and defeat this measure. Is it their object to defeat every thing else, in order to drive the country into the adoption of an United States Bank—acting on the principle that it is not "by arguments, but by suffering, that the people are to be convinced?" We have a right to say to the Opposition: "if you object to this scheme, show us a better. Explain to us your substitute. Be not, like your candidate for the Presidency, dumb as to your intentions. Bring forward your plan. Why will you not do it? It is because you dare not. Yes! it is because you dare not, for you know that the plan which, in reality, you favor, is odious to the people of this country."

Permit me, sir, to read an extract from a speech delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts in the second session of the last Congress. After alluding to the results of a few State elections, which at that time were considered by him as exhibiting a result unfavorable to the Administration, he exclaimed—

"And how does the President receive the declared will of the people? What says he, the chief, the elect, the one representative of those claiming to be the exclusive Democracy of the Union. Does he bow in ready, in respectful, in humble submission to the decision of the supreme power of the Republic, the people pronouncing judgment in the majesty of their sovereignty against the favorite measures of the Administration? No."

Sir, when the gentleman uttered this language, the people had not expressed their judgment on this measure. The present is the first Congress which has been elected since this measure has been before the people. Directly, and in the election of their representatives, who were to vote for or against the measure, have the people, "in the majesty of their sovereignty," pronounced judgment in favor of this bill. Do the gentleman and his friends bow "in ready, in respectful, in humble submission to the decision of the supreme power of the Republic? No, sir! They accuse the people of being "decoyed by the voice of the tempter," and they are striving by all the means in their power to set aside their solemn verdict.

Something has been intimated about a "chance majority" in the House. Probably this charge refers to the admission of those members from New Jersey who were elected by the people, and the rejection of those who claimed seats by virtue of the Governor's certificate. We desire the opinion of the people, and not the opinion of the Governor of New Jersey. But, sir, if the members chosen by the people of New Jersey were ejected from this hall, and their places supplied by those claiming under the Governor's certificate, there would still be, in my belief, a majority in favor of this bill. Gentlemen have proclaimed—perhaps some have even flattered themselves with the hope—that the friends of the Administration did not sincerely intend to carry the measure through. If there be a single member of the Democratic party on this floor who is not ardently desirous to pass this bill, I do not know him. We should be treacherous to the doctrines we profess—treacherous to what we believe the principles of the Constitution—treacherous to our constituents, did we not do all in our power to ensure the success of a measure which we deem so essential to the public welfare. Notwithstanding the strenuous efforts which will be made against it, this bill is destined to pass—the people have willed it; and its adoption will be a triumph of reason and argument over the clamors of faction—a triumph of the intelligence and firmness and honesty of a community who understand the value of their free institutions, and know how to preserve them in their purity.

SPEECH OF MR. JOHN DAVIS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In the House of Representatives, June 27th, 1840—On the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. DAVIS said: Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to the consideration of the great and important national question now before the committee, I will read an extract from the Boston Courier, a modern Whig paper. It is as follows:

"As well might a blacksmith attempt to mend a watch, as a farmer to legislate. What mischiefs are sure to be enacted, when a man born to nothing but the plough tail, undertakes to legislate."

Mr. Chairman, I am the kind of person herein described. I was born to no inheritance but the plough tail; and I have ploughed all day from sun up until dark, since I have been elected to a seat on this floor. I know very well, sir, that this is not an uncommon opinion in a certain quarter. It is as old as the Constitution under which we live. Whether I am qualified for this station or not is a question alone for my constituents, who have sent me here.

As I have not heretofore consumed any of the time of the House, I now ask the indulgence of the committee, while I present some of the reasons that will influence my vote on this important question.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED,] who has just taken his seat, the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, [Messrs. SERGEANT and COOPER,] and the gentlemen from Kentucky, [Messrs. POPE, WHITE, and ANDREWS,] as well as most other gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this bill, have charged the present Administration with being the cause of the suspension of specie payments in 1837 and 1839, and all the evil consequences attending them; such as the derangement of the currency, the issuing of shinplasters, the reduction in the price of produce, and turning the poor laboring man out of employ to starve; for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] informed us that they were in a state of starvation. All these evils they say have come upon the country by Mr. Van Buren's tampering with the banks; for which he has been called a currency tinker and other odd names. Now if this be true, as charged over and over again on this floor, and in the Opposition papers, it is the strongest reason that has been offered why a separation of the Government from the banks should take place. Nothing that the friends of the bill have said in its favor can be more striking to the public mind than that—if the President has the power to do so much mischief, it should be taken from him. Had I been opposed to this bill when I came here, (which I was not,) I have heard enough from its enemies to convince me that it should pass.

I am pleased that my honorable colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. SERGEANT] has at length made known to us the principal cause of the opposition to this bill. He, of all other gentlemen on this floor, has had the best opportunity to be informed on that particular subject. He represents the bank interest of Pennsylvania, and of all other men in best acquainted with their views, wishes, feelings, and interests. In examining this bill, the gentleman said that the amount of money appropriated in it was $21,000. This appeared on the face of it; but there was something, he said, that was covered up in it which was hid from public view, but which would be perfectly apparent when he mentioned it. The Secretary of the Treasury, and the friends of the bill, he said, had admitted that it would require five millions of dollars to be all the time in Treasury. Here, said Mr. D. I think the gentleman has misunderstood the Secretary. He said that there would not be likely to be more than that amount in the Treasuey at any one time, and not that that amount would be all the time in the Treasury. The interest on that sum, said the gentleman, at 7 per cent. will be three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to which add the twenty-one thousand dollars, makes three hundred and seventy-one thousand dollars; but you may double this sum, said he, for it will take ten millions of dollars instead of five, and that will be seven hundred and forty-two thousand dollars per annum, drawn from the tax payers unnecessarily by this bill. This, then, said Mr. D. may be said to be the reason given by the bank interest for their opposition to it.

I have taken some trouble to look into this interest account, by examining the monthly returns of the Bank of the United States for the sixteen years that she was the fiscal agent of the Government; and then taking the annual returns of the deposite Banks from the removal of the deposites to the suspension in 1837, and the following has been the result of that examination:

Amount of deposites in the United States Bank according to the monthly returns:

1818	$7,609,501 90	1826	$6,993,350 45
1819	2,960,718 08	1827	7,623,228 18
1820	2,965,018 58	1828	8,032,255 80
1821	2,337,071 46	1829	8,168,025 59
1822	3,485,118 30	1830	7,899,904 29
1823	6,874,418 31	1831	8,186,241 21
1824	8,081,076 98	1832	11,337,722 21
1825	6,393,366 74	1833	8,529,040 61

The average annual amount in the Treasury during the above period was $6,717,191 17. Upon this I had calculated an interest of 6 per cent. but as the gentleman, who understands interest better than I do, has charged 7 per cent. he will not complain, I trust, if I should adopt the same rule for his friends, which will make $7,523,254 11 whole amount of interest received on the deposites. But this is not all. I am informed that the rule of banking is to issue two dollars in paper for every dollar of deposites, and loan that out also. If this is the fact, then the interest account of the United States Bank alone is $22,569,662 33.

In the deposite banks, I have taken the amount reported to be on hand at the end of each year. I now show the balance in the Treasury, as presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury.

1834	$11,702,905 31	Interest	$702,774 31
1835	8,892,858 42	"	533,571 50
1836	26,749,803 96	"	1,604,988 23

If this amount was all the time in the banks, the interest accruing on it at 6 per cent. would be $5,599,445 47; but at 7 per cent. it will be $6,524,986 40. Apply the same rule to this that we did to the other, viz: that they issue two dollars in notes for each dollar of deposite, and loan that out also, and you have the sum of $19,574,858 21. Add this to the profits of the United States Bank, and you have the round sum of $41,144,420 44 realized by less than one hundred banks, by their having the custody and use of the public money. This explains the reason, to a great extent, of the opposition to the bill now under consideration. Those gentlemen who live by their wits, and not by their labor, understand all these things.

Here it will be proper to remark that a portion of the money in the United States Bank belonged to the sinking fund, under the act of March 5, 1817, setting apart ten millions of dollars to pay the interest and also to reduce the principal of the debt of the Revolution and late war. On the 12th of February, 1816, the whole debt amounted to $123,630,092 95. On the 30th September following it was reduced to $108,745,818. The whole average annual amount in the bank for sixteen years was $6,717,191 17. Of this sum I think it is fair to charge $2,000,000 to the sinking fund, leaving $4,717,191 17 as the amount applicable to ordinary expenses all the time in the Treasury for sixteen years. From this it would appear that the sum of $5 000,000, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, is not much out of the way, and not $10,000,000, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] supposed.

The worst times said the gentleman, that the country has ever seen, has been under the Sub-Treasury system. Now I am certain, said Mr. D. that my honorable colleague does not intend to mislead the committee or the public in this matter, but he has surely forgotten the distress in the country about twenty years ago. I will here relate my own personal experience at that period; and experience, we all know, is the best of teachers. It is not necessary, therefore, for me to go to the statistics of the country, when my own experience is a component part of them.

In 1816, wheat brought, in the Philadelphia market, where the gentleman resides, $3 per bushel; corn from $1 75 to $2; oats 75 to 80 cents.

In 1821, prices sunk down so low that wheat brought only 62½ cents, corn 31 cents, and oats only 18¾ cents per bushel. I ploughed the ground, and sowed the seed, cut it, threshed it, and hauled it to market, at both those periods. The land on which this grain grew cost, in 1815, $125 per acre, and at that time it would not bring more than $50. Mechanics, who had received $1 25 cents per day, and were found, were reduced down to 62½ cents, and many were out of employment altogether, and other laboring men received wages in the same proportion. Land fell from $125 per acre to $50, and in some cases lower. Hundreds and thousands of honest farmers who had passed the meridian of life, and, by a long course of industry, had accumulated a little property to make them comfortable in old age, if they were one fourth in deb for their land, and were pushed for it, the whole was swept from them. Or if a man had one farm clear, and a second one for which he owed one-half the purchase money, it took them both to pay the debt. As gentlemen of the bar generally fatten on the miseries of the people, I presume the gentleman did not experience any embarrassment at that time.

What will the farmer say at this time? Why, his produce won't sell for as much as he formerly got for it.

Here again I will give you my own practical experience. My last year's crop brought me more money than any one crop of the last three years. The increased quantity more than made up for the diminution of price. This is the case also with many of my neighbors. I recently received a letter from a farmer in my neighborhood, who informed me that he had sold from his last year's crop 437 dollars worth of hay; and that he had 4 or 5 tons yet to spare, which would make it up 500 dollars. He had beside this, his wheat, corn, and oats to sell, and he owns and works only about ninety acres of land. We farmers know that when we have an abundant crop (all other things being equal) the price will be lower than when the crop is short. It is therefore not always the best times for farmers when prices are very high, because it is generally owing to a short crop. It requires a certain quantity of grain for the use of his family and stock, and if he consumes it all, the high price is of no advantage to him. We had better have two hundred bushels of wheat at one dollar, than one hundred at two dollars per bushel. For example: say that it takes 50 bushels for bread and seed. In that case we would have 50 bushels left, at two dollars, making $100, and in the other case we would have 150 bushels left at $1, making $150. But, sir, we are like other men—we like big crops and high prices too. We have, however, heard of the country being ruined so often from the Opposition within the last few years, that we understand their object. You want, gentlemen, to get our votes, and then you could control our money; but your Whig panic speeches fall still-born upon us.

I will go to the laborer, says the gentleman; and what will he say? Why, I formerly got money that answered my purpose; but now I am out of employ, and my family is starving.

Men starving in Pennsylvania! Sir, this is news to me. I thought the complaint was that grain was too low. This is certainly what was said to the farmers. Since a panic has been attempted to be got up here, I have frequently heard from home on the subject of labor and wages, and find that our mechanics are well employed in my immediate neighborhood at former prices.

This is, perhaps, an exception to the general rule; and the reason is obvious. We have no bank near us, nor have we any thing to do with them. Every man keeps his own money, and no bank marks our checks good without paying the money. We don't build, nor employ mechanics of any kind, until we are able to pay for what we get done, without going to bank for the money. Our business is, therefore, regular. I have been watching the course of events for the last few years, and have noticed the changes and fluctuations that have taken place, and am of the opinion that the embarrassment of the country is owing to overaction by banks, or to their unsteadiness in their accommodations to the business community. I find generally, where men are thrown out of employment, that it is for want of a continuance of bank accommodations to carry on business. Too many of our business men depend on bank loans to carry on their business; and when that is withheld, they are compelled to discharge their hands. It is a lamentable truth that the banks have too much control over the business of the country, and therefore can produce a panic at pleasure.

"I don't like hard money," says the gentleman. "I would rather have paper; it don't wear out my pocket so much. Why, shall the people be compelled to buy silver to pay their debts? We have too much gold and silver in this country. We have erred in this, as in every thing else. Fifty-five millions of your foreign debt is occasioned by the importation of gold and silver. Send back your fifty-five millions and pay your debts, on which you have to pay $3,300,000 interest."

From the gentleman's account, we have erred in this, then, said Mr. D. as in every thing else: that is, we have committed an error by bringing gold and silver into the country instead of merchandise. Times change, and with them gentlemen's opinions change. When the gentleman received twenty thousand dollars for going to England, as agent for the United States Bank to bring in specie, it was all right to bring specie into the country; but now it is all wrong.

One thing I presume is certain; no man that heard the gentleman will charge him with being a hard money man. The only thing for our consideration, on this subject, is, was it better for the country to bring this money in gold and silver, or merchandise? The States have created stocks since 1820, amounting to $174,696,994, and over which the General Government have no control. They found their way to Europe. The above amount was all that was brought over in specie, and the rest was brought over in merchandise. One of the great evils that has afflicted this country, has been an over-importation, and yet the gentleman would have imported fifty-five millions more, in preference to the precious metals. Such is his aversion to hard money. Perhaps this exportation of hard money is advocated to justify the United States Bank in exporting specie, as she has done, to the amount of $8,712,000, in about fourteen months. This seems to be carrying out the gentleman's principle in full. At the same time that the gentleman advocated sending this fifty-five millions of specie out of the country, he also advocated a National Bank, as well as some six or eight other gentlemen. Now, sir, I want to ask these gentlemen whether their bank is to have a specie basis? and if so, where is it to come from? From the best estimate that can be made from the statistics of the country, the amount of gold and silver in the United States is about eighty-five millions. Of this, 33,105,155 is in the banks, as is shown by their last return, and the rest is in circulation, or in the hands of the people. The project of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr POPE,] and the only one submitted, was for a seventy million bank, so restricted that it should only issue two dollars in paper for one in specie. Under this plan one of two things is certain; either that your circulation will be small, or you must have a large specie basis. And where, I ask again, is it to come from? Can you get what is in the hands of the people? Or will you, after all your professions of friendship for the State banks, receive their notes in subscription for stock, and then call on them for their hard cash? Or will you go to England for it, and increase the indebtedness of which the gentleman complains? These are questions worthy of your consideration, and I, for one, would like to have them answered. Creating more banks is like feeding Vesuvius with oil; you only increase the flame.

The gentleman has furnished us with a long account of the expenditures, and also of losses by the agents of the Government, from its commencement. In this the gentleman has imitated his party. He has dealt in generals, and not descended to particulars. I have also looked over document No. 10, of the present session, and find that the amount lost by disbursing officers, exclusive of trust funds, and payment of the public debt, are as follows, to wit:

General Washington's first term, 13 cents per $100; second term, 27 cents per $100; John Adams's, 83 cents per $100; Mr. Jefferson's first term, 32 cents per $100; second term, 64 cents per $100; Mr. Madison's first term, 130 cents per $100; second term, 112 cents per $100, Mr. Monroe's first term, 205 cents per $100; second term, 216 cents per $100; Mr. J. Q. Adams's, 66 cents per $100; General Jackson's first term, 19 cents per $100; second term, 26 cents per $100.

It will be remembered that Mr. Madison's administration was during the embargo and war, and therefore more agents were necessarily employed. Mr. Monroe's administration met with less opposition than any Administration since the adoption of our Constitution. Now, sir, look at the pattern Administration of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS;] the loss per hundred dollars was 66 cents; and the prodigal and wasteful administration, as his enemies term it, of General Jackson, only lost 19 cents per hundred dollars the first term, and 26 cents the second term. This is always the case, gentlemen; when we draw you into particulars, you make a tremendous noise about others, but always waste the most money yourselves.

Now, gentleman, we will look at another item, I mean the whole amount of loss to the Government during each Administration. It is as follows:

Washington's	1st term, from	1789 to 1793,	$686 46
	2d term, from	1793 to 1797,	82,359 84
Mr. J. Q. Adams,	from	1797 to 1801,	85,179 98
" Jefferson's	1st term, from	1801 to 1805,	61,872 69
	2d term, from	1805 to 1809,	122,478 51
" Madison's	1st term, from	1809 to 1813,	374,654 23
	2d term, from	1813 to 1817,	688,836 51
" Monroe's	1st term, from	1817 to 1821,	880,111 67
	2d term, from	1821 to 1825,	1,568,476 17
Mr. Adams,	from	1825 to 1829,	2,278,558 47
Gen. Jackson's	1st term, from	1829 to 1833,	299.798 51
	2d term, from	1833 to 1837,	1,305,305 45

Now, gentlemen, what do you think the hard fisted, honest farmer, for whom you seem to be so much interested, will think of this, when they see it? Out of $7,748,318 89 of the earnings of their industry that has been lost to them in 47 years, your pattern administration of Mr. Adams lost $2,278,558 47 in 4 years, being an annual loss of $569,639 61, and leaving but $5,570,960 42 to be apportioned among the other Administrations for 43 years, making an average annual loss during the whole 43 years of only $129,557 21. And yet you are the men who are loudest in your professions of economy.

The gentleman from Adams county, Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER,] told us that the decree of party had gone forth, and this bill was to pass. He says in 1833, when the experiment began, we had as good a currency as any country ever had; but the bank was to be broken down, and therefore the deposites were to be removed.

The decree of party has gone forth, is the language of the gentleman. If he had said the decree of the PEOPLE had gone forth, he would have been correct. If there is any one question upon which the people of the district that I have the honor to represent, is more united than another, it is on that of an entire separation of the Government from the banks of the country, which has been an unprofitable partnership. They desire that their money shall be collected in the legal currency of the country, and be kept in such manner as that it can be at all times controlled by their representatives to pay the honest debts of the Government. They have seen with deep humiliation that, whilst in the midst of peace and prosperity (when our land was flowing, as it were, with milk and honey) with an overflowing Treasury, their representatives could not control it. They have seen the banks, who had the care of it, close their doors and place the Government at defiance, professedly to keep the precious metals from going out of the country; when, in the same year, 1837, the imports of specie exceeded the exports $4,510,165. Therefore, the reasons given could not have been the true cause. They have seen an additional expense created for the people to pay by calling Congress together to provide for the defalcation of the banks; and, when met together, the President was importuned to recommend to Congress, at the earnest solicitations of the merchants, too, to grant them indulgence in the payment of their Government dues; for destruction, they said, awaited them, if he did not, because they could not pay them in such money as the Government would receive. He did recommend the indulgence asked, and he did not stop to inquire whether the merchants were his personal or political friends; or whether, by such recommendation, he would strengthen or weaken himself. No, sir—no such thing. He acted like a faithful public servant should do. He looked at the interest of the whole country without regard to party. On the 10th of October, a bill passed the House of Representatives unanimously granting the indulgence asked for. This act dried up in part the sources from which the Treasury was supplied, and it became indispensably necessary to provide for the deficiency to meet the engagements of the Government under laws passed by Congress. It was proposed to use the credit of the Government by issuing Treasury notes. But, sir, what was the conduct of the merchants, the banks, and their friends? Every paper under their control, and all the Whig orators in and out of the House, commenced a war upon the Government as soon as they were relieved from destruction. They turned round—I had like to have said viper like—to sting to death the hand that had saved them.

The vote on supplying the Treasury with means to pay its debts, was a strict party vote, or nearly so. If there could be found the same number of farmers in Pennsylvania that would act with such ingratitude, I would disown them.

To show that this measure is popular among the people, I will give you the election returns for the years 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839, the last three years when this Independent Treasury bill was made a test question:

	Mr. Van Buren.	Opposition.
1836	761,968	744,350
	744,350
	17,918 majority.
1837	819,203	927,213
		819,203
		108,010 majority.
1838	955,715	1,066,245
		955,715
		110 530 majority.
1839	1,004,004	962,586
	962,586
	42,418 majority.

Opposition majority in 1833, - -	110,530
Mr. Van Buren's majority in 1839,	42,418
Error in Pennsylvania return, -	18,000
	170,948

The above calculation was taken from a Whig paper, except Pennsylvania, and therefore they, whose organ it was, cannot object to it.

This statement exhibits some curious facts. In 1836 Mr. Van Buren's majority was 17,918 votes. When Congress met in September, 1837, the politicians foresaw that the suspension would produce an embarrassment amongst the people, and especially those depending on banks to carry on their business. A war of extermination was waged against the Administration. The Whig orators predicted great distress, and made many panic speeches, and circulated them amongst the people. The banks, to aid their friends to fulfil their prediction, put the screws on the people, as will appear by their own returns on the first of January, 1837, when their loans and discounts in the United States amounted to $525,115,702, and on the first of January, 1838, they only amounted to $485,631,687; being a contraction in one year of $39,484,015. Such a sudden withdrawal of accommodations of such a large amount of money could have no other effect than to embarrass business men. This was all charged to the Administration, and therefore had some effect on the public mind in 1837. The change against Mr. Van Buren on the popular vote at the election was 125,928 votes. At the extra or called session, Mr. Van Buren recommended the Independent Treasury system. It then became the subject of attack by the Opposition In 1838 there was but little change, only about 2,520 votes. This subject was canvassed freely by the people, and in 1839 the "sober second thought of the people" made a change in favor of the Administration of 170,948 votes; and yet with this fact staring you full in the face, we are told that the people are opposed to this great national measure. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] informed us that he would prove by all the modes of attaining public sentiment, that the people were opposed to this measure: but how did he fulfil that promise? He took up the returns of 1836, 1837, and 1838, and then stopped. The returns of 1839 did not happen to answer his purpose, and were omitted by him.

We are charged with being enemies to the banks of the countrry. How is this charge made out? We are desirous to confine them to their legitimate business of banking, and then they will be regular. They can always calculate with certainty, the extent to which they can accommodate the public; but while ever their accommodation depends on the public deposites, and commerce fluctuates as it has done, we must expect those sudden revulsions. But, sir, the banks may well exclaim, "save me from my friends." They have charged over and over again that we will destroy them by refusing to let them have the public money; and also, refusing their notes. What inference is to be drawn from this? Why it is, that the banks cannot stand without being propped up by the Government. This is what their professed friends say of them here, and I think great injustice is done by it to such of the banks as are sound. But if this be true, that they are in this condition, so rotten as to be unable to stand alone; it is another good reason furnished by yourselves, gentlemen, why a separation should take place. I would prefer the specie clause, and cash duties, going immediately into effect, so as to prevent foreign merchants from trading on the the credit given them on duty bonds to the great injury of our own merchants and manufacturers. If the Government was to continue to receive the notes of banks, every bank in your large seaports would be subject to its will, for it could destroy them at pleasure, by receiving their notes, and then calling on them for specie, when they must either comply with its dictates or be so crippled in their operations as to be neither able to benefit themselves or the public.

In refusing to receive their notes the Government does nothing more than the Bank of the United States did towards the other banks. It received but few of the country bank notes in payment of Government dues; but this was all right, because it was done by the bank, and no political capital could be made against the Administration, and therefore nothing was said about it.

But it is said that we want a bank to regulate the currency, exchanges, &c. I have looked into this matter and find that the exchanges have been more deranged during the existence of the United States Bank than since.

In 1831, when the bank had been in operation five years, the notes of many of the banks in Pennsylvania were from 10 to 60 per cent. under par; New York country banks from 10 to 75 per cent.; Massachusetts 12 per cent.; District of Columbia 70 per cent.; Georgia 40 per cent.; Ohio from 50 to 80 per cent. In 1837 there was another pressure, when Pennsylvania country banks were from 5 to 75 and 80 per cent. discount; Delaware from par to 25 per cent.; Maryland from par to 80 per cent. In 1833, when it is said we had as good a currency as any country ever had, Pennsylvania was from par to 2 per cent; Alabama was from 10 to 20 per cent; Louisiana from 6 to 8; Mississippi from 5 to 6; Tennessee from 4 to 5; Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, no sales; Kentucky from 20 to 25. Since 1833, the rates of exchange have not been so high, or bank notes so low. By this it will be seen that some gentlemen's memories are not so very good, when they say that we had the best currency the world ever knew. But, say they, the United States Bank paper was good. Admit this, and what does it prove? Why, that you had one currency for the Government and another for the people—the very thing you now condemn. The above rates will be found in Senate document No. 457, session of 1837–8. The United States Bank shaved the notes of its own branches from 1 to 5 per cent.; see Spencer's report to House of Representatives, January 19, 1819. Banks, like individuals, will have a credit abroad in proportion to their standing at home.

If they stand high in public estimation at home, and always redeem their notes when presented, in gold and silver, they cannot sink lower at any point than the difference in transporting the gold and silver. Why is it that bank notes in the same State, and even in the same town, differ so much in value? Is it not owing to their standing in public estimation? But we are told that the laboring classes would be much benefited by the establishment of another National Bank. These things have been promised before, without being realized. I happened to be in Harrisburg, in Pennsylvania, when the United States Bank bill of that State was under consideration. Its friends there, like the friends of a United States Bank here, prophesied that great good would result from it—that we had in that State a large and enterprising class of men, who possessed all the qualifications requisite to make them useful; but that they were without the means to go into business—that farmers, mechanics, and others, who were in debt, would be greatly benefited by it—that money would be so plenty that interest would be reduced to four per cent. and perhaps lower—in fact, it was the very bill to benefit the middle and lower classes. This was the profession. Now for the practice. Money had become so plenty in Pennsylvania, or at least in that section where I reside, that men who could secure it well, could get what they wanted at five per cent. per annum. This was a very common rate of interest. But in less than twelve months after the Bank was chartered, notice was generally given either to pay in the money or to pay six per cent. interest. This was all fair. We, who were in debt, had no cause of complaint. It was only the effect that the charter of the Bank had upon us. All these things I know from experience, because it took between thirty and forty dollars per annum from me; but in Philadelphia it was much worse than in the country. To such an extent was the wild and visionary spirit of speculation encouraged, that it created such an additional demand for money that interest rose to ten, fifteen, twenty, and as high as thirty-six per cent. or three per cent. per month, and it was exceedingly difficult for ordinary business men to get accommodations at all, when the shaver and speculator could command his millions. Nearly all the money was lent out through brokers and bank officers at extravagant rates of interest. In this case, gentlemen, you professed as much friendship for us farmers and laboring men as you do now. Is it then at all surprising that we should be unwilling to trust you again?

But a bank is wanted as a regulator. We in Pennsylvania have some experience about this regulation of the currency. On the 9th of October last, the evening of the election, and after the returns from the city and county of Philadelphia were mostly in, the bank officers held a meeting to consult about the propriety of suspending specie payments. Fourteen banks were represented, and five were for suspension and the big bank was one of the number for suspension; and nine were against it. Therefore it is reasonable to suppose that the nine banks who were unwilling to suspend, were able to continue specie payments. But the next day when the big bank opened, she sent word round to the others that she suspended forthwith, and the rest followed her example. The consequence has been the withdrawal from circulation of nearly all the precious metals, and their place was filled with the worst trash that ever disgraced any people. The best informed men of that State are of opinion that nearly all the banks in Pennsylvania could have continued specie payments, and that they were entirely solvent; but we had a regulator, and they must follow her regulations. But for the noble stand taken by Governor Porter to see that the laws were faithfully executed, and that no note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars should be issued, the whole State would have been again flooded with shinplasters as it was in 1837; for the universal law regulating currency is, that two kinds of the same denomination will not circulate together. Where one is more valuable than the other, the least valuable will be kept going, while the other will be hoarded up. For instance, if you have five dollars in gold, and a five dollar bill, you will part with the bill first; but if you had no note, the gold would then be used. Stop the circulation of all the five dollar bills in the country, and half eagles will soon take their place.

The bill now under consideration differs in two very essential particulars from the late practice in the kind of money to be received, and the manner of keeping it between the time of receiving and disbursing it.

From the commencement of the Government, the public money has been received and disbursed by officers appointed by the Government, and therefore if they were dishonest, they had an opportunity to embezzle it; and besides all this, you had to risk the safety of the banks. Under this bill you have but one set of officers; and if bank officers are more honest than other men, their services can be had; but this I do not admit. In all Governments, and also in large private transactions, more or less losses will occur from faithless agents; and this will always be the case until man becomes infallible.

One of the strongest reasons why this bill should pass at the present time is, that it is generally conceded that the readjustment of the tariff will come up for consideration at the next session of Congress. That period will, perhaps, be the freest from objections to considering the subject, of any time that can be selected. After a storm we usually have a calm; and a calm will, therefore, be likely to succeed the coming Presidential election, and it will, moreover, come on before parties divide off on other Presidential candidates. The members will come together freer from excitement than usual, and therefore will be better prepared to act with that calm, cool, and deliberate consideration that its importance requires. I would here say to the high tariff men at the North, and to the anti-tariff men of the South, that you should meet together upon some middle ground with that spirit of concession and compromise that actuated those men to whom you are indebted for the form of Government under which you live. If either extreme should succeed, injustice may be done. Pennsylvania occupies that ground. While she will never be behind her sister States in furnishing the necessary means to support the Government, in either men or money, at the same time, so far as I am informed, her people do not desire more taxes to be levied than will meet the necessary expenses of the Government; and in laying them, she will ask discriminating duties to protect the manufacturing interests. This is the first deliberative body in which I was ever honored with a seat, and this is my first effort in this body; and as one of the Representatives of the Keystone State, if I could suggest any thing for the consideration of Congress that would tend to harmonize their conflicting views on that interesting and heretofore exciting question, it would be very gratifying to my own feelings; but, sir, if you permit the banks to enter the list of interested partisans, you will have your gallery and your lobby lined with their officers and agents, advocating a high tariff, and all for the interest of the dear people professedly, but in fact to create a large surplus for them to trade upon. Should you employ the banks again as depositories, I doubt not but the prediction of my honorable colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. SERGEANT] will be fulfilled, and that ten millions of dollars will not be too large an estimate for the balance in the Treasury. There has been some effort made to agitate this interesting question at the present session; but of all times that could be selected, this would be the most unfortunate for the country.

I have been no little amused, sir, to hear the very kind professions of friendship from the gentlemen in the Opposition, to the interests of the farmers, mechanics, and laboring men. Yes, sir, the real hard fisted men, as they are called. These professions are made by men in this hall, who can scarcely turn over the leaves in their portfolio without their silk gloves on. Now, sir, I don't doubt their sincerity, but are they as competent to judge of their interests as practical business men are? While they profess one thing, they practice another. Yes, sir, they are for exclusive privileges and monopolies—the very antipodes of the poor man's interest. They are too much like the banks—they form combinations and control a larger amount of labor that depends mainly upon bank facilities to carry on business. When there is any sudden revulsion in the money market, as it is called, the poor man is either forced to consent to a reduction of his wages, or be thrown out of employ altogether; and their rights as citizens are too often infringed upon by being forced into a compliance with the views of their employers, especially in politics. I ask the business and laboring men of the country to look round and see whether the leaders of the Whig party do not seem to be delighted with the present distress of the country, because it will have the effect to place them in power; and whether the banks and all the moneyed men of that party are not aggravating it to its utmost stretch of severity even to bring you to starvation, as the gentleman from Philadelphia would have it? The labor of any country is its wealth; and when you protect the interest of the laborer, you promote the interest of the country: but, how is this to be done? is the great question. Here the parties seem to be at issue. The Democrats contend that the laborer is best rewarded who receives his pay in the kind of currency of which a month's or day's wages will buy most of the necessaries of life for his family. For instance, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOLLEMAN] informed us, the other day, that he knew a man that received thirty thousand dollars for one month's work, in continental money, and then gave it all for a uniform coat, worth only thirty dollars, in hard money. Now, if this man had received forty dollars in hard money for his month's work, he would have had ten dollars left; but when he got $30,000, he had nothing left. This is a fair illustration of the position of the two parties; for the Opposition contend that the largest nominal amount, without reference to its value, is the best wages.

Now, sir, if this bill will be the means of taking away the props that have held up and supported rotten institutions, and will weed them out from amongst the sound ones, we shall soon return to a sound circulating medium; and the man who receives his week's pay on Saturday night will be certain that his money will be good until the end of the next week. The changes and fluctuations in the prices of produce always operate more injuriously on the poor man than on any other class, because his wages are the last to rise, when a general rise in prices takes place.

In Pennsylvania contracts are usually made in the winter for the succeeding summer, both for building and farming operations, and the prices fixed by the day, month, or year, as the case may be. Mechanics generally fix their prices in the winter, or early in the spring, from which they cannot well depart; and it not unfrequently happens that before the season is half over, their bread and meat advances in price from 25 to 50 and in some cases 100 per cent. yet their wages remain stationary. This frequently happens after the grain has been sold by the farmer, and the mills are nearly empty, the whole crops of the country, or nearly so, being in the hands of the speculators. In Philadelphia, building is generally done by contract made in the commencement of the season. The competition being great amongst master builders for business, every thing is estimated at existing prices, under which hands are engaged, &c. but before the buildings are half up, the price of living advances 50 or 75 per cent. and the workmen, in justice to themselves and families, turn out for higher wages, and, consequently, in many cases, the undertaker loses by the contract. It is the sudden changes and fluctuations that unsettles business, destroys confidence, and operates so much against business men, and which are believed to be caused mainly by expansions and contractions in the circulating medium.

Our best writers on political economy, as well as our ablest statesmen, inform us that the currency of a country stands in the same relation to the body politic, that the blood in our veins does to the human or animal system; the regularity of both being alike necessary to a healthy action. If this principle be correct, the following statement will show the cause of our embarrassment. In 1835, January 1st, the amount of bank notes in circulation was $103,692,495; in 1836, it increased to $140,301,038; in 1837, it increased to $149,185,890; in 1838, it was reduced to $116,138,910; in 1839, it was increased to $134,170 955; and in 1840, it was again reduced to $106,968,572. By the above, it will be seen that, from 1835 to 1836, the increase of circulation was $36,608,543; and from 1837 to 1838, it was reduced $33,046,980; and in 1838, it was increased $22,042,045; and between the 1st of January 1839 and 1st of January 1840, it was again reduced $27,212,384. If the Opposition be correct, (which I do not admit) that the Administration has produced those changes by what they are pleased to term a war on the banks, then they have furnised the very best reason that can be given for the separation. That these changes have affected prices, there can be no doubt; and this is all charged to the Administration. If crops fail, and bread becomes high, the poor man is told that the President has been the cause of it. If crops are good and we have a double quantity, and prices fall, the farmers are told that the President has done it.

If Mr. Van Buren is chargeable with the low price of produce—but which I do not think correct—we will try some of the gentlemen's favorites by the same rule, and see how they stand. The average price of flour in Philadelphia during Mr. Adams's administration was, agreeably to Hazard's Register, a good Whig paper, $5 14½; Gen. Jackson's first term, $5 61; second term, $6 16¾; and Mr. Van Buren's, $7 26. Now, gentlemen, if high prices are an advantage, where does your favorite Administration stand? I say here, without the fear of contradiction, that flour was lower during his Administration than during any four years together since 1790.

By comparing the years in which the banks issued most excessively, with the excessive importation and excessive sales of public lands, it will be seen that they kept pace with each other, and that the whole action of the body politic was stimulated by the excess of bank paper; and vice versa when a contraction took place. If then the Independent Treasury bill, now on your table, will tend to check this excess, it will do much good, and I trust will be of lasting benefit to the people of this Union.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 11, 1840.

Mr. FLOYD rose and said—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The history of the proposition "to provide for the collection, safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," contained in the bill now under consideration, affords, as, I think, much instruction for those who would learn aright the character of the American people, and is alike creditable to the distinguished individual at the head of this Government, who first proposed it for the consideration of Congress, and to the intelligence of our fellow-citizens, who, through their agents, here assembled, are, as I apprehend, about to carry it into effect by the form and sanction of law.

The peculiar situation of the currency, when the plan of an Independent Treasury was first laid before the country by the President, in his message of 1837, is doubtless well remembered by all on this floor, and as I then thought, and still think, imperatively called upon the Chief Magistrate to propose some plan by which the treasure of the people, collected from them and held in trust for them by their servants, should be safely preserved for its appropriate uses, and not subjected to the embarrassments and losses which had been and might again be occasioned, by the reckless cupidity of unprincipled corporations.

The whole army of moneyed monopolies throughout the country was utterly prostrate and flat; and the numerous retinue of camp followers, consisting of directors, stockholders, counsellors, attorneys, brokers, debtors, and runners, in Congress and out of it, were unable to give them any aid. The currency—if currency it could be called—consisted of bank paper, for which not a dollar of money could be obtained, and which was in truth little more than a certificate of the great gullibility of the people, and the fraudulent bankruptcy of those who issued it. Even Baal himself ceased to be a God. The great idol of the Federal party—the United States Bank—having exhausted its energies in a fierce warfare upon the "old Roman," and in the payment of bribes, in the shape of immense counsel fees, to Senators and Congressmen toppled headlong down, from its own rottenness, and the wrecks of the State banks were scattered throughout the country in such a profusion of corruption, that the whole land stank. Shoals of speculators and merchants, who had hoisted all sail to catch the prospering breeze, and were riding, as they supposed, on the top billow to wealth and luxury, were, by the receding wave, left like shell fish high and dry upon the sand, to gape and rot. The people themselves, in their associated capacity as a people, did not escape unscathed. Their treasure, which they had contributed for their general welfare, had been entrusted for safe keeping to those faithless agents, the banks, and a call upon them for payment was as ineffectual as would have been a call upon the dead to arise; they had neither the disposition to pay, nor the ability.

The lobbies of the State Legislatures were overrun with bank vermin. All the well known appliances of the banks were put in requisition to procure the sacred power of the States to sustain and support an insolvent banking interest. The stockholders of banks in the Legislatures needed no prompting to promote their own interest. To such in the Legislature as owed the banks, threats, direct or indirect, were used, while others were assailed by the most abject entreaties—for the veriest beggar for cold victuals cannot "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" with more suppleness than a bank aristocrat, whenever "thrift may follow fawning." And so effectually was the object pursued, that throughout this whole confederacy of sovereign States, I believe without one exception, the legislative power of the State was brought to bow in submission at the feet of the bankrupt moneyed associations. But, sir, while the several States were wrought upon by bank influence from within and from without, to blot their statute books with infamous suspension laws, legalizing the frauds of the banks, and sanctioning their continuance, enabling them to reap a harvest of wealth from the ruin they had themselves occasioned, the people were subject to the tender mercies of their own agents, and were compelled to receive their own money in a depreciated currency; and in paying their servants, their military, civil, and naval officers, the hardy soldier, the gallant sailor, and the laborer on public works, were compelled to make up in quantity what the bank currency lacked in quality.

Such, Mr. Chairman, was the situation, but faintly described, of the currency and the currency making institutions of the country, when the President of the United States, the highest public servant of the people, elected by themselves—by their free, unbiassed suffrages—to watch over their interests, in the discharge of his duty, proposed to Congress, and through Congress to the country, that national honor and honesty—a proper discharge of national obligations—yea, justice to themselves, required that the people should keep their own money in their own way—trusting none but servants selected by themselves for their integrity and fidelity, and dissolving, forever, a connection with the banks, which had proved so disastrous.

And, sir, how was the proposition met by the Federal party in this House and in the country? By unqualified, bitter hostility. The propensities of privileged orders are the same in all countries. Do the nobility of England grasp with less energy their titular distinctions, because all the causes which led to their creation, and all the circumstances and associations which gave them worth and grandeur, have long since passed away? and because the tinsel glitter, which distinguishes them, is but the phosphorescent glow which marks their decay? Not at all. And the Federal party in this country, which apes, at an humble distance, the aristocratic mummery of Great Britain, never buckled on their harness in defence of their favorite privileged institutions with more zeal, than when those institutions had shown themselves to be utterly worthless and corrupt. Well, sir, they opposed, they defeated, the Independent Treasury plan. Did they propose any thing in its stead? Nothing—like Satan, they had power to do evil, but neither power nor inclination to do good: they had strength to prevent this measure, but no ability to propose a better.

"Too ignorant to teach, too proud to learn"

they contented themselves with the poor honor of being able to destroy. Sir, if there has been derangement in the finances of the Government, and if, from that derangement, the business of the country has suffered, let the blame lie at the door of that party, which held a majority upon the question of finance in this House, during the last Congress. It is not with them to deny, that they had the power to regulate the finances of the Government. They had that power—they had a majority of this House; the journals and the recorded votes show this fact. Why did they not propose a plan for keeping, collecting, and disbursing the revenue? Had they not the capacity, or had they not the courage? Why at least did they not discharge their solemn duty by making the attempt to save their country from the disasters which they allege have occured for the want of a good financial system.

Sir, the Opposition is indefensible upon this point, and no one can doubt that they feel themselves to be so, who was present a few days ago, and witnessed their extreme sensitiveness, when the honorable member from North Carolina [Mr. MONTGOMERY] "like an eagle in a dove cote," fluttered the Federal forces in this House by charging their delinquency home upon them, and proving it from the journals. But, sir, "the second sober thought of the people, never wrong, and always efficient," has prevailed. Upon this issue, every member of this House was elected. Upon this issue the Administration may safely consent to stand or fall. By this issue the Opposition professed themselves willing to abide, until completely routed and overthrown; they have scattered to the winds every issue which involves reason and principle, and have betaken themselves to the hopeless task of cozening the intelligent voters of this country, by appeals which rate the intellect of the laboring man on a par with that of his horse.

Mr. Chairman, I propose briefly to examine the principal features of the system now under consideration, and to compare it with the antagonist measures to which the Opposition are supposed to be friendly.

First. The bill proposes that the money of the people shall be collected, kept, and paid out by responsible agents of their own, selected for that express purpose, instead of the banks, which have been hitherto employed as financial agents.

There would seem, at first blush, to be nothing very startling in the proposal that, in a free and Republican Government, where all power emanates from the people, and all officers are, or should be, responsible to them, that so important a class of public servants as those entrusted in any way with the revenue of the country, should derive their authority and feel their accountability, according to this most salutary principle of Republicanism. If an individual appoints an agent for any particular service, he selects that agent with a view to his qualifications and responsibility, and he prescribes the mode and manner of performing his duties, and exacts security for the faithful execution of his trust. Why should not the people of this country, in selecting their agents, have the benefit of the same wholesome mode of appointment? Whence comes the irresistible necessity of appointing, as financial agents, those in whose selection the people have no voice, upon whose corporate existence no moral obligation can rest—no reproach for delinquency can attach—to whom a reputation for honesty or dishonesty is alike indifferent, and who can be subject to no punishment for their crimes, however enormous and base? Whence, I say, is the necessity which seems to rest upon the minds of gentlemen in the Opposition that the people of this country must continue to employ agents of this description? What are the qualifications requisite in a financial officer? Are they not honesty, capacity, and responsibility? And are not all three of these secured by the bill under consideration? As for those of the Opposition who say that men of sufficient honesty cannot be found, I respectfully request them to confine the declaration to themselves and friends. I make no such confession, and submit to no such imputation for the party with which I act. But, if honest individuals cannot be found, how is the matter helped by employing banks? What are bank officers but individuals? and was it ever heard of, that a man became more honest by becoming an officer of a bank? Nay, sir, is not the danger in this respect greatly increased by employing banks as depositories? for, besides the risk that the collector of revenue may be dishonest, you then have the additional risk that some one out of the score of bank officers may be so. So far, then, as honesty may be considered a desirable quality in an agent, the system proposed by the present bill has a decided advantage over the deposite bank system; besides, by it, the people may select their servants from among themselves, and may choose any one of the whole mass of citizens of the United States, while, by appointing the banks as fiscal agents, they must trust to the honesty of the officers of the bank, who are selected sometimes for their morality, and sometimes for their knavery.

Then for the capacity of the agent. What superiority is claimed for the banks, in point of financial skill, over individuals? Does the magic of a bank charter endue those who hold office under it with superior wisdom? Such a proposition is absurd in theory; and the deplorable history of banking institutions for the last few years, most fully proves that they do not possess skill enough to save themselves from the disgrace of suspension and insolvency.

Now, sir, what is the responsibility of the banks? What is the security they offer which cannot be procured equally well by an individual? What is the security you have had from the deposite banks? Why, it has been according to the most approved form of the modern "credit system." You have had the banks as corporations for principals, and the individuals composing the banks for sureties; like modern commercial paper, in which A and B, as members of a firm, draw a note, and, to make it perfectly good, A and B, as individuals, endorse it; and, with all this boasted security of the banks, they have been utterly unable to pay to the people the money entrusted to them for their safe keeping; and while the agents of the deposite banks are in your lobbies begging you for a postponement of the day of payment for the money they owe you, their friends upon this floor are urging you to try them again—to trust them with more money, for the purpose, perhaps, of enabling them to pay what they owe already. Sir, I should blush for my country, if I could say that citizens of the United States could not be found who were trustworthy as Government agents. I should state what all men know to be false, if I declared that banks were more honest than individuals. But, sir, there are knaves enough, both in the banks and out, and with the utmost care dishonest persons may be selected. For such this bill provides, in a way in which it is impossible to apply it, or any legal provision, to corporations, and that is, by bodily punishment. The seventeenth section of the act declares any use, by loan, or in any other way, of the public money, an embezzlement, and punishes it with imprisonment. Sir, if you could have brought this salutary provision to bear upon the directors and officers of the pet banks, your Treasury would have avoided much of the embarrassment it has experienced.

At the first proposal of the Independent Treasury plan in 1837, there broke out afresh the controversy which has ever existed, and ever will exist, in this country, between the people and the moneyed aristocracy, and privileged classes, and that is the question involved in this bill, which draws out such fierce opposition. Shall the people govern, or shall they submit to be bound hand and foot, and abide the dictation of the aristocracy of associated wealth. Such is the issue, and every Democrat who tenders or accepts any other issue in the present contest, is unjust to himself and to his principles. That the doctrines held by the Opposition are odious, they know right well—they are offensive in the nostrils of the people, and it is not strange that they should attempt to conceal them, or that they should attempt to get up issues, in which the principles which lay at the root of the opposition to this bill may not come directly in question. Those, sir, who approve of this bill, should make it their duty to show that opposition to it arises from those only who would establish a favored, distinct class among us, to be supported without labor, at the expense of the many.

Mr. Chairman, call it radicalism, if you will—call it Jacobinism, if you please—the fact, nevertheless, is, that in this country, every great political contest has been, and every political contest upon principle will be, a war between the rich and the poor—on the part of the rich, a war of aggression—on the part of the poor, a war of defence. The arrogance of wealth is almost universal—the possessor of riches most naturally slides into the belief that the property which gives him advantages in the procurement of the luxuries of life over his poor neighbor, should confer additional personal importance and superior political rights. Hence it is that the Democratic party is continually undergoing a process of purification and rejuvenescence, if I may so speak—those who have grown old and grown wealthy, leaving it to find more congenial principles and associates in the ranks of the aristocracy, while their places under the Democratic banner are filled with enlistments from the young men of our country, whose only prospect of success in life, whether their aim be wealth or honor, depends upon the preservation of the free, untrammelled, uncontrolled, unprejudiced rights of each citizen.

The bill under consideration is the poor man's bill. It gives him nothing, it is true—he asks nothing. It is the poor man's bill, because, like few bills passed by law makers, it takes nothing from him; it leaves him a clear field, and he asks no favors: it operates with equal and exact justice upon all; it knows no man otherwise than as a citizen of the United States; and whatever may be his rank or calling, from that of a farmer, the most noble of all, down, down, down, to the banker, who lives upon privilege—it shows no favor and imposes no disability. Is it not the duty of those who represent all, to adopt such measures as will afford equal protection to all, and show favors to none? Why, then, and by whom, is this measure opposed? Sir, I will examine this question at some little length.

The Independent Treasury system is opposed by those classes of citizens who have hitherto preyed upon the Government—who have had the custody and the use of its money so long, that they have come to regard it as their own—and who consider their own particular interests as deserving the peculiar fostering care of the Government, to the exclusion of all others. Sir, I mean the merchants and bankers, and those connected with and dependent upon them by the operations of their business. It is from those, and from their public organs, that proceed the most terrific bellowings against this bill. The public treasure is about to be wrenched by the people from their clutch. Think you they will yield it without a death struggle?

A wise man has said, in most apt words, in regard to legislation: "Touch but a bristle of the commercial interest and the whole sty will be in an uproar." How fully has the truth of this assertion been manifested during the last few years in this country? Could all the Federal jeremiads of the last two years be uttered at once, it would make an uproar of lamentation which would drown the thunders of Niagara. Were all the papers in the pay of the banks and the merchants, which have been filled with mourning for their lost plunder, spread out in this broad land, they would cover it as if a deluge had departed and left a pestilential scum.

The farmer has been at work, planting his corn, dropping three kernels for himself, and two for the banks. The mechanic has been at work in his shop, striking three blows for himself, and two for the banks; for it is in about this proportion that yoursystem of paper money robs the producer of his earnings, and by a silent, but sure process, transfers them to the coffers of the banker; but the merchant, the broker, and their whole army of dependants, have been agonizing to repossess themthemselves of the public treasure—you have had panic speeches without number; and pestering committees of from ten to ten thousand. The press has groaned with arguments to show that the interests of these classess should be protected at the expense of all the rest. Every mail has been loaded with speeches to prove that Government is organized to foster the few at the expense of the many. The daily sheets in the pay of those interests, filled with vituperation against those who stand for popular rights, flutter in every breeze, and are borne abroad on every gale; and here upon this floor, at this session, as at former sessions, you hear from the Federal party denunciations, fierce and fearful, against this most safe, most just, most necessary, most Democratic measure.

It is complained, by the opponents of this bill, that it proposes to keep the public money from circulation. "Ah, there's the rub;" farewell, public deposites, say the banks—farewell, loans of the public money, say the merchant and speculator—farewell, bank suits, cries the attorney—and farewell, bank facilities, and bank counsel fees, say the bank Senators, and members of Congress. It is estimated, that under this bill, not more than five millions of dollars will be on hand at any one time—but, whatever the amount, it is to be safely kept, until paid out in the ordinary operations of the Government. And it seems to me, that it will be in abundant time for the friends of the banks and the merchants, to propose to borrow more of the Government, when they have paid up what they borrowed years ago. But, sir, how, and to whom, do the opponents of this bill propose that the public money should be loaned—with whom deposited? Is it proposed that the farmer shall have the benefit of it? not a dollar: or the mechanic? not a cent: but they propose to dispose of it according to the old fashioned Federal rule—take care of the rich, and the rich will take care of the poor: in other words, they propose that the banks shall have the custody of the money—that they shall loan it to the merchant and speculator, who are their principal customers.

Now, sir, if it be so wrong for the people to keep on hand their money, a few days, between the time of receiving it from the public debtor, and the time of paying it to the public creditor, why do not gentlemen propose some plan, by which it may be deposited directly with the farmers or mechanics of our country? Why must the preference be given to the wealthy bankers? Will any one here venture to say, the bankers are more honest than our farmers and mechanics? I had rather, much rather, trust those who live in log cabins, than those who live in bank palaces. I mean the true log cabins, such as I can show you in my own district, and not such as you see hereabouts, and which truly represent those who build them, for they are mere shams, built of slabs, and filled with gentlemen in ruffled shirts and silk stockings. Sir, we shall hear no such proposition—true as the needle to the pole, the Opposition will propose no measure, which does not, in some way, aid the moneyed monopolies of the country.

And what are these institutions which, in the opinion of gentlemen, are entitled to so much consideration at the hands of the people? Why, sir, they are associations of individuals invested by the beneficence of State legislators with all the rights of the whole people on a particular and pretty important matter, that of making a currency —some of the legislators granting the monopoly, being generally interested in the association which they aid to incorporate. They are not necessarily, or generally, at the outset, wealthy, though by the operation of a bank charter they soon become so; for it is one of the excellences of a bank charter that it turns into money lenders those who have most need to borrow; nor have they necessarily any credit, for the essence of modern banking is the "credit system," which is no more like credit then a horse chestnut is like a chestnut horse; they commence without cash and without credit; and going on without work by the mere magic of a bank charter, by which they exchange their own notes without interest for the notes of others bearing interest, they draw into their coffers the wealth of the country, roll in luxury and splendor; have their hordes of officers and attorneys; command legislators and Senators by their wealth; have, at their nod and beck, thousands of debtor slaves; demand and carry, in your State Legislatures, whatever their cupidity may, from time to time, require; and furnish in this country what the nobility of Great Britain furnishes there—an aristocracy having no feeling or interest in common with the people at large, but considering them as their chartered privileges, make them their hewers of wood and drawers of water. Such are the institutions which many desire should have the benefit of the public deposites; and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] asked a day or two since, where do the friends of the bill deposite their money? Do they lay it away in a chest, or do they deposite it with the banks? There is no doubt that generally those who have any considerable amount of paper money deposite it as speedily as possible with a bank; and why? Let us see. Suppose the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts receives ten or twenty thousand dollars in bills of various banks, about the solvency of which he knows nothing, and can know nothing, would he not be unwise if he kept them over night? He would as soon think of keeping on hand a cargo of fresh fish. So if there is a bank in his neighborhood which does not suspend oftener than once a year, he hastens to it with his paper money, deposites it, and the bank has such a high opinion of it, that it sends it back to the place where it was made, by the very first opportunity. Sir, I doubt if there is a bank in the United States, at this moment, whose bills the honorable gentleman would feel safe in keeping for six months.

Mr. Chairman, when the people deal in solid coin, there will be no need of that peculiar promptness with which all now act who have on hand any paper money. There will be no need of playing "Robin's alive" with our money, when we have it in solid coin. Then let the banks suspend or break: the mint drops will not suffer.

But we are told that the banks, to be used as depositories, should be good specie-paying, solvent, honest banks! Where is such a one? Is it that which suspended yesterday? or the one that failed outright the day before? or the one from which the cashier embezzled half a million last week? or that which is expected to blow up to-morrow? An honest, solvent bank!—a white crow!

Mr. Chairman, it is said that this bill will cripple the State banks. If it were calculated to have that effect, it would not injure it, in my opinion. But I deny this. In what way does it affect them? It prevents no man from borrowing their money, or from receiving their notes; nor does it prevent them from going on, as heretofore, in the full tide of profitable extortion: and the head and front of this objection is, that, although the bill leaves the people to be shaved, according to the bank charters of the several States in such case made and provided, it refuses to let the banks have the public money, to aid them in that praiseworthy operation. You cannot cripple the State banks; they are beyond your control: and it is because you cannot regulate them, that you should have nothing to do with them.

Again, sir, it is charged that this bill is an attack upon the "credit system." If it could cut up that system by the roots, eradicate it forever from the land, it would be a glorious bill indeed. I am no enemy to credit; it is the nerve and sinew of industry—the life blood of enterprise; it is as much the property of an individual who will earn it, as his money or his farm. He that trims the midnight lamp to qualify himself for his business; he that rises early, and sits up late, and eats the bread of industry; he that squares his conduct by the strictest rules of morality; will not fail to establish with his fellow men a character for honesty, capacity, and industry; and that character is his credit. But the "credit system" is, in all its moods and tenses, a system of villany; and I appeal, without fear of refutation, to the experience of this whole country, under the operation of that system for the last few years, for proof of what I say. It has destroyed honest credit; it has almost destroyed our commercial character; it has swept millions of its blind devotees and innocent victims into the whirlpool of irretrievable insolvency; it has carried poverty and wretchedness into thousands of humble dwellings, which were before the abode of competence and happiness; it has exchanged many a happy home and fireside for the poor-house; it has degraded the moral character of your people, both at home and abroad; and your State sovereignties—aye, sir, the hitherto sacred faith of your States—has been under the "credit system," and is now hawked about the streets of European cities like a broken winded horse, by a town crier, and finds no purchasers. I will give but one instance of the effect of this system upon State credit, and I do so with deep humiliation. The State of New York, "my own, my native land," while carrying on with careful energy and good husbandry her magnificent public works, borrowed money upon her credit. She pointed the money lender to her income, and to her actual resources, for his security; and her promises to pay were eagerly sought for, and taken at a premium of from five to ten per cent. Within a year or two, the State, under a "new impulse," has embarked under the auspices of the "credit system;" and her stocks, in a single year, fell twenty-two per cent. below par;* and for every seventy-eight dollars the State received, the farms of her people are mortgaged to pay one hundred dollars, with the interest on the one hundred dollars. Your money lender is no fool; he knows that the prodigality which borrows without the means of paying, is near akin to the morality which will repudiate the debt when it falls due. Sir, if this bill will destroy this source of evil, and restore us a sound and healthy credit, its passage should be announced from city to city, and from village to village, by the ringing of bells and the roaring of cannon.

Second. The bill proposes that the revenue, by progressive proportions, shall eventually be collected in the only currency known to the Constitution —solid coin.

A stranger to the influence which private interest has exerted upon the legislation of this country, and to the all-pervading power of banking associations, would appear astonished, that under our national compact, the Government or its officers, had ever presumed to authorize the receipt of any thing else than coin for its revenue.

"Those who formed the Constitution were hard money men," says a distinguished Senator. They had seen the deplorable effects of a paper money system, and they therefore recognised, in our treaty of union, no money or currency but the precious metals; and to prevent, if possible, the future use of paper money, they expressly provided that it should not be in the power of the States to make any thing but gold and silver coin a legal tender for the payment of debts. Such are the prohibitions of the Constitution; but unfortunately there is no barricado against cupidity; there is no law, written or unwritten; there is no Constitution, though purchased by the death of the brave and inscribed with the blood of patriots, which can stay the stealthy, serpent-like progress of crawling avarice. In the teeth of your Constitution Congress passed a law making the bills of a United States Bank receivable in the payment of revenue; and worse still, by a resolution of 1816, Congress stamps the notes of the United States Bank and the notes of other banks, as an illegal currency—as a currency unknown to the Constitution, and, therefore, no currency; and at the same time authorizes them to be received for debts due to the people. The words of that resolution fully bear me out in this position. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall see that all debts due to the United States shall be paid "in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable or paid on demand." Now does not this resolution show that the very Congress which incorporated the United States Bank, considered legal currency one thing, and bank notes another thing, as indeed they are? Those who oppose the specie clause of this bill are, of course, in favor of receiving the notes of banks for revenue, and, consequently, in favor of receiving for debts due to the people something which is not known to the Constitution as money or currency, and which has expressly been declared by a bank Congress to be different from "the legal currency of the United States."

Mr. Chairman: It is worth while to inquire whether there is any good reason for blotting out the Constitution and following some new light kindled by private interest. The collection of revenue is understood to be, to enable the people to discharge their debts—to pay their shipbuilders, sailors, soldiers, &c. Now, did this Government, from the time of its foundation to the present time, ever contract a debt to be paid in any thing besides the "legal currency of the United States?" I may be mistaken, but I doubt if the opponents of this bill, friendly as they are to the credit system, would authorize any such contracts. Such being the case, Mr. Chairman, is it the part of wisdom for the people to collect what is due to them in a currency which they cannot pay out to their creditors?

But, say they, none but the notes of specie paying banks—none but notes redeemable in specie, should be received. A specie paying bank—an egregious humbug! Redeemable notes—a monstrous fallacy! Why, sir, there has grown up with this credit system a technical jargon, which is flippantly enough mouthed by "the trade," every phrase of which is cunningly contrived to hide a falsehood under the semblance of truth, or to set ignorance agape while his pocket is picked. Redeemable bank notes! There is no such thing—there never was. The phrase is not applicable, in truth, to any bank in this country which is doing

* The following paragraph is taken from the Journal of Commerce, a leading Whig paper in the city of New York, of September, 1839:

"A sale of $100,000 New York and Erie Railroad stock, bearing 4½ per cent. interest, payable quarterly in New York, was made on Saturday, at auction, under the direction of the Comptroller, and taken by Messrs. Prime, Ward, and King, as follows: $10,000 at 79, $10,000 at 78½, $30,000 at 78, and $50,000 at 77½, the closing price. The stock is redeemable in 1859, and was sold on terms—one-third down, and the balance in thirty and sixty days."

a profitable business with its usual circulation out. If a bank has one hundred thousand dollars of bills in circulation, with but ten thousand dollars of specie in its vaults, those bills are not redeemable, whether any have been refused or not—and when the whole bank circulation is two or three hundred millions of dollars, and there is not more than eighty millions of dollars in the country, in the banks and out of them, that circulation is not redeemable; and it is untrue, except in the bank vocabulary, to say that it is so. A single fact will show you the meaning of the phrase "redeemable notes," and will show the value of notes which are redeemable in bank parlance. On the 9th day of May, 1837, every bank note in the city of New York was redeemable in specie, according to the true intent and meaning of the bank jargon. Not a bill had been refused payment—not a bank had refused to pay such of its bills as were presented. On the 10th day of May, 1837, every bank note in the city of New York was irredeemable—not a dollar could be got for it—yet, sir, was it, in truth, worth any less on the 10th of May than it was the day before? The banks had the same specie on hand—the same notes of their debtors—the same property of every kind—the bank officers were as honest—yet, in the twinkling of an eye, millions of paper money, just such as the opponents of this bill would have you receive, became just such as they would have you not receive; and this change, which is at all times liable to occur, you have no means to prevent, for the local banks are beyond your control; no foresight can predict it, no sagacity arrest, no skill can remedy. Sir, is it the part of wisdom to collect your revenue in a currency so uncertain as this, which to-day is, and to-morrow is not? Your gold and silver changes not; put it safe in your strong box; it is good to-morrow, next year, next century; it loses neither weight nor value; it never suspends; it is never irredeemable; your soldiers, and sailors, and workmen will not refuse it, nor will they suffer by its being below par. Put it on board your men of war, and send it around the globe; the country is yet undiscovered in which it is not known and appreciated as a valuable circulating medium. The experiment of receiving bank paper for revenue has been tried, and it miserably failed. The Government is yet suffering on account of the non-payment by the banks of their notes, received for revenue. The notes of specie paying banks, notes redeemable in specie received in 1836, and deposited with the banks, are yet unpaid; and these very institutions, which cannot, or will not, pay their debts, insist, by their friends here, that you should trust them again. We are told, with something of a chuckle of triumph, that the late President adopted the State bank deposite system, and pronounced them good and sufficient for all the purposes of depositories; and we are urged to adhere to a system which he, "the noblest Roman of them all," approved. Sir, the fact and the argument show the character of the two parties. In an evil hour, the Democratic party yielded to the clamor of the banks and merchants for the deposites, and ordered them to be made in the State banks. That plan failed; they have abandoned it, determined to trust them no more, but to regard the economy of the old Scotch proverb: "He that cheats me once shame fa' him—if he cheat me twice, shame fa' me"—while the party which "learns nothing and forgets nothing," would "totter on in blunders to the last."

Sir, there is another plan for keeping the public money, and for furnishing a circulating medium, and that is by a United States Bank; this, has, in one instance, been avowed to be the measure of the Opposition upon this floor; and would, I suppose, be generally acknowledged, were it not that such an avowal would be a blur upon the escutcheon of a party on whose banner is inscribed "OFFICE, NOT PRINCIPLE," and whose virtue, like that of the Venetian women, is "not to leave undone, but to keep unknown."

Mr. Chairman, if it is in the power of experience to establish a truth, then is it proved beyond all question that the United States Bank was a failure. I speak of it as a bank, and not as a Government agent, supported and sustained by the money of the people; and as a bank, I say it was a failure. I appeal to this whole country, whether from the time that Bank ceased to be a Government Bank; from the moment it took a State charter; although he that should have known best, declared it to be a better charter than the other, and more profitable to the stockholders—I say, sir, I appeal to the whole country, whether from that moment that Bank did not take the down hill road; and although in its steep-down course, he who had directed its destinies hitherto, deserted it, declaring it to be in a prosperous condition—I ask whether that United States Bank, with the same capital—a better charter, the same directors, the same field of operations, is not now in ruins? And, sir, if, while that Bank was the Government agent, it was able to make large dividends, to pay large counsel fees to Senators and Congressmen, to publish large editions of political electioneering pamphlets; and, if when it ceased to be a Government agent, it became insolvent; is it not "confirmation strong as proof of Holy Writ," that all those immense profits and means of profligacy were drawn from the Government, and not from its legitimate operations as a bank? And yet, in the face of all these facts, a large party in this country is in favor of such an institution. I should be at a loss to account for such an obliquity of reason, did I not sometimes fancy that I could hear the leaders of that party, saying to each other in the language of Demetrius, the silversmith: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth."

It is further objected to this bill, and especially to the specie clause, that its effect will be to establish an exclusive metallic currency in this country. If such a result could be brought about by degrees, so as to produce no commercial distress; no sudden fluctuation in prices; no unjust effect upon existing contracts, it were in my opinion a consummation devoutly to be wished. And, sir, I rely upon the experience of the whole world, in all ages, under all Governments, and under all circumstances, for the proof of what I say, when I assert that, from the time that Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah of Ephron, the son of Zahor, for which he paid "four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant," down to the present time, gold and silver have been "current money" every where—while I assert that no paper money, which was not guarantied by the faith of a Government, ever passed as "current money" out of the country in which is was made; and I challenge the friends of paper money here or elsewhere, to point out that system of paper money, whether of a Government or of banks, which has not failed. Sir, what is the objection to an exclusive metallic currency—and I lay aside now the inconvenience of the change, whatever that inconvenience may be—what is the objection? Why, you are met at the threshold with the cry, there is not enough—not enough? Did ever any one find out how much would be enough? No man ever did. No man ever can; and they who pretend to tell you with any certainty, are, in my opinion, quacks, who presume upon the ignorance of others, to assume a character for greater knowledge for themselves. I do not pretend to say how much is enough; but this I know, that if in proportion to our industry, enterprise, and production, we did not have a fair proportion of the gold and silver in the world, it would be the first instance in which the laws of trade, which, unchecked and untrammelled, are the laws of God, failed to administer good and ample justice.

Another objection to a specie currency, is its inconvenience of transportation. Well, sir, let us see what this really amounts to—and the objection comes, you will remember, from those who profess themselves to be the hard fisted, hard working, log cabin men. Fancy yourself, Mr. Chairman, stopping at the log cabin of a Whig, in an Illinois prairie, where what is lacking in choice viands will, I dare say, be more than made up by a right hearty welcome—and the good man of the house, who has lately received a speech of one of his friends here, is bemoaning the wretched state of the country, and his own sad condition in particular—and, among other things, laments that paper money will not pass at the land office—that he wishes to enter a section of land adjoining his farm, for which he has the one hundred dollars of gold in his chest, but that the inconvenience of transportation is such, that he is compelled to forego the purchase. You ask him how much the gold, necessary to pay for the land weighs, and he tells you about five ounces! about as much as a good sized jack-knife!

Mr. Chairman, this is a fancy sketch—the log cabin gentry of your cities may be bent to the earth, under a five ounce weight—but there is no log cabin man in Illinois, and I have seen many of them, who would look his horse in the face, and utter such an absurdity. Sir, the good people of this country would little know the extent of their misery and suffering, but for the opposition efforts here and elsewhere.

There is little danger, Mr. Chairman, but that the merchant, who has half a million of dollars, which he wishes to send from New York to Charleston, will find the ways and means of doing it. Your concern, and mine, should be to provide, so far as we can, a good currency for the men of small means—a class which comprehends nine-tenths of the people of this country—that the man who has ten dollars, and wishes to travel ten miles, may have that which is valuable when he sets out, and will not spoil before he reaches the end of his journey.

Most heartily do I wish that a bank note below the sum of twenty dollars might never again be seen in this country; that the hand-to-hand currency—that in which the mechanic receives his monthly, and the laborer his weekly wages—might be in the precious metals, upon which he would be charged no discount; of which he could lay by a small portion for a rainy day without fear of its spoiling; and in which he would no longer be the victim of that most current form of scoundrelism, counterfeit and depreciated bank paper. Sir, the losses by counterfeits and broken banks fall most grievously and almost exclusively upon the poor man. I do not doubt that the merchant, who receives a million of dollars a year, suffers less in this way than the laborer, who gets but a hundred and fifty. The first, never moves without his counterfeit detector and his weekly or daily list of broken banks; and if, by chance, he takes a bill which is below par, one which his deposite bank will not receive, it will nevertheless answer perfectly well to pass away to his cartman or potter, when Saturday night comes; and he, sir, takes it to the grocer to purchase provisions for his family, and there suffers a deduction of five, ten, or fifteen per cent. from his earnings. Sir, if your moneyed men lost as much in proportion as the working classes do by bank paper, every bank charter would be repealed in six months. Does the laboring man complain? To whom shall he utter his complaints? To his employer, think you? He dare not: he must submit; his family must eat less, or perhaps starve more; another boy or girl must be taken from school and put to service for a bare living; and him that is cheated, wronged, defrauded, his hard earnings wrung from him each Saturday night by this damnable system of legalized indirection, Monday morning's sun must find at work without a murmur, or it will find [him discharged.

I would that this bill might have one half the effect in bringing about a metallic circulating medium that its enemies attribute to it. I should then think still better of it than I do. But it will do something; it will at least prevent the people's money from being used to sustain anti-Republican institutions; it will take a little power of doing injury from them. They can, under this bill, no longer beat the cripple with his own crutch; they can no longer lend the people their own money, and, by their most approved deposite system, make the owner of money pay interest while he is being cheated out of the principal.

The monetary affairs of this nation will no longer be subject to irresponsible corporations; it will be at least refusing the sanction of this Government to the creation, or the perpetuity of a distinct and privileged class, forming a moneyed aristocracy, more odious and more dangerous than any other aristocracy which ever existed, because their privileges are stolen from the mass of the people, and their immense income is an immense extorion. This bill effects, in this most desirable reform, but little; it can effect but little; the subject is not one on which you can exercise a direct and efficient authority; the subject is under the control of the State Governments. Had we the power, I should be in favor of doing much more than this bill can do, to check the rapid strides of the moneyed oligarchy; for, as I live, I believe that the first civil war which this country sees, will be a rising of the people to demand a restoration of their rights, which have been apportioned out by your legislators among the favored few. And if this system is to go on increasing in all its blasting, withering influences upon the prosperity of the people, the moral character of the country, and the honor of your Government; the sooner that crisis arrives the better; and when it does come, may God speed the right.

SPEECH OF MR. LUCAS,

OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, June, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Mr. LUCAS addressed the committee substantially as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The main object of this bill is to provide for the safekeeping of the revenues of the Federal Government, during the intermediate space between the collection and disbursement.

These revenues, independent of those arising under the Post Office Department, consist of the duties imposed on importations of foreign goods, which the importers pay to our custom-house officers, stationed at our ports, and appointed by the Executive, with the advise and consent of the Senate, and held, by existing laws, to bond and security for the faithful performance of their duties; and, secondly, of the proceeds of our public lands, which are also paid into the hands of another set of receivers, located at the several land offices established by authority; and, also, commissioned by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and held to bond and security in like manner.

These are the revenues from time to time accruing to the Government, and such, sir, the sources from which they are derived, for the safekeeping of which, during the period indicated, the bill proposes to provide.

In practice these revenues have always been, from the foundation of the Government, collected and received by public officers thus appointed, and, also, disbursed in like manner, by another set appointed in the same way. So that in point of fact, the hundreds of millions of public revenue, which have thus accrued since the establishment of the Government, have passed through the hands of collectors and receivers, in its collection, and then again, in the payment out, through the hands of disbursing officers, and thus the whole has passed twice through the hands of different sets of public agents, and all appointed by the Executive, with the advice and consent of the Senate; and so must all that shall hereafter accrue, wherever and however we may provide for its safekeeping in the mean time. And I affirm in this connection, upon the faith of our public records, that our revenues have been thus collected and disbursed by these numerous agents, with but comparatively trifling loss to Government, upon the whole amount, taking in and including the whole entire period of our history; and in this respect, this bill proposes no change, except to throw some additional guards and counter checks around these officers, and the manner of their discharging their duties, the better to secure their faithful and regular performance, and the safety of the public money, in its passage into and through their hands; and no other change herein than this can be made. Collecting and disbursing offic annot be dispensed with. Collections and disbursements must continue to be made thus. I say they must, sir, under any system which it is possible to adopt for the safekeeping of our revenues. It was the practice before, and during, the existence of the first and last United States Bank; and, also, during the State bank deposite system.

Now, sir, for the mode which this bill actually proposes. A plain analysis of its provisions will now place the subject fairly in one connected view as candor requires it should be exhibited.

What is the plan? Simply, sir, that the Government shall keep in its Treasury, which the bill will establish, as well as collect and disburse its own money by its own officers. In other words, and more detail, the bill provides that the Government revenues shall be kept, according to law, in its Treasury, by it to be established, and as it always has been collected and disbursed; by its own officers, to be appointed in the same way as those are, and always have been, who collect and receive it in the first place, and as those are and always have been who disburse; and to be also held, in like manner, to bond and security, for the faithful performance of their duties. It next, by new provisions, prohibits them from using or loaning the same—provides rules of rigid accountability—requires frequent settlements—throws every possible guard and check of this kind around it, to prevent and detect its being used or loaned, which it pronounces embezzlement, and that a felony, against which it denounces severe punishment, declaring that any collector, keeper, or disbursing officer, who shall offend herein, upon due conviction, shall suffer not less than six months', nor more than five years', imprisonment in the penitentiary, besides being subjected to a fine equal to the amount embezzled. And that the Treasury may hereafter be fixed and have locality, and more than a name, it declares that separate rooms, to be furnished with vaults and fireproof safes, shall be provided in the new Treasury building in this city, which shall be "the Treasury of the United States," and be under the keeping and control of the Treasurer of the United States; and as the amount of revenue accruing in the following places is large, it requires that like rooms, with similar vaults and safes, shall be provided in the custom-houses at Boston, New York, Charleston, and St. Louis, to be under the care and keeping each of a receiver general and assistants; and designates the Mint at Philadelphia, and the Branch Mint at New Orleans, for the same purpose in those places, and the treasurers as the keepers; which may be considered as branches, or necessary parts of the common Treasury. While under the clause, familiarly called the SPECIE CLAUSE, one-fourth part of the revenue is required to be collected in gold and silver the first year, one-half the second, three-fourths the third, and in June, 1843, the whole amount; so that from that period, the revenues of the Federal Government will all be collected, kept, and disbursed in the constitutional currency.

This is the Sub-Treasury, or Independent Treasury, which this bill will provide for the safekeeping of the revenues of the General Government in its own Treasury, under its own officers, disconnected from, and independent of, banks and corporations, national or State; which will secure from the disasters incident to such union, and the evils of receiving bank paper money—disasters and evils which experience proves will inevitably follow revulsions in trade, which produce bank suspensions, and which are occasioned by bank expansions and contractions, as certainly as that the tide flows and ebbs. This is what the bill will effect, which will only be complying at last with the constitutional requisition, to collect in the only "legal tender," which every creditor may demand, and pay in the same, and to keep our money in the Treasury of the United States; for having failed so long so to do, we have sadly suffered.

Why, then, is the measure so bitterly opposed? Sir, by whom is it so opposed? I will draw the line between the friends and opponents, and make the issue direct. How stands the fact? The Democratic party, sir, advocate it, the Whig party oppose it. And what is the Whig party for? For nothing, sir. That would be discreditable to their patriotism. To come to the point, are not all who oppose it either the advocates of a National Bank, or of the State bank deposite system? Is there any fourth or other plan than these three? No, sir, no other has ever yet been heard of. I assume this position as undeniable. The Whig party, then, would have no United States Treasury, but a United States Bank, or a league of State banks, and insist that the Government ought not to collect its dues and pay its debts in the constitutional currency, but should receive and pay outpaper money, such as these uncontrollable corporations will furnish without limit. For the history of banks in all countries proves you cannot regulate their issues. And such paper money as they will issue, and reissue when collected, is to be kept by these corporations to use and trade upon; to be as capital, and to constitute the basis of new issues—money that may be current to-day, inconvertible and worthless to-morrow; an arrangement by which, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, and of every principle of equality and justice, one corporation, or a few, to the exclusion of the great body of the people, are to be favored, and loaned the whole revenue and credit of this common Government, almost indefinitely—its vast treasures, its millions and millions! And what is the process?

Paper money is first issued by these corporations, then again received by them on deposite, to be thence redrawn again into circulation in disbursements, and so on, in a circle—and all this through the agency of this hard money Government, with a Constitution that recognises nothing but gold and silver as a legal tender—forbids privileged orders—requires equal laws, even-handed justice, equal burdens, and which repudiates the idea of special favors—an arrangement that makes the Government, in violation of these sacred principles, not only the receiver, depositor, and disburser of paper money, instead of the constitutional currency, but the agent of these corporations to expel it, and substitute their promissory notes, whereby it becomes accessary to revulsions and suspensions, which visit, sir, periodically, loss and suffering upon the many to favor the few.

Is it strange, then, that it should now, after all that has happened from its past connection in this way, with banks, and the receipt of their paper, propose to return to the Constitution, by the adoption of this measure? Why not do so? Is it pretended by any, it is not sanctioned by the Constitution? Not at all, sir. On the contrary, that has been always universally admitted; and not only so, but it has been often shown that this is the very mode of collecting and keeping our money intended by the framers of our Constitution—men who were too wise and jealous of their liberties, to entrust the Government with the keeping of its own money, if fraught with any of the dangers asserted. Sir, whatever doubt there may exist about the constructive power under the Constitution to incorporate a bank, there can be none about the intention of its framers. There cannot possibly be the shadow of a doubt, that it was not intended by them we should create a National Bank; for the proposition came up in the Convention in several shapes, and was rejected each time. The "power to emit bills of credit," being inserted in the original draft of the Constitution, these words were expressly stricken out and rejected by a vote of 9 States to 2. (See page 1343, Madison papers, vol. 3; and pages 1354, 1576, and 1577.) Where the proposition the power to grant charters of incorporation and an amendment to the same to create a bank was positively rejected by 8 States to 3.

The fact that we have created two National Banks, claiming the power by implication, in the teeth of these repeated rejections of the proposition to confer the power, does not conflict with my position, that the framers of the Constitution did not in fact intend to give the right, and did not grant it; from which it necessarily follows, that they did not and could not have intended that our national treasure should be kept in a National Bank, because they could not have intended it should be kept in an institution which they not only did not design to give the Government power to create, but thus actually refused to grant it. And it is equally clear, that they did not intend our revenues should be kept in State banks. The rejection of the proposition to invest power to create a bank or corporations, applies to them with no less conclusiveness. They intended to confer no power on this Government to create banks at all, or to make paper money, and so none to create banks for itself, or for the States, or to compel the States to create for themselves; then they could not have intended our Federal revenues should be kept in institutions of the States, which they meant to give this Government no power to create, and none to compel the States, and which the States might not choose to create, or if they did, not to continue, or if they did, might refuse to let this Government use. It is thus equally clear, the framers of Constitution did not intend this Government to keep its money, either in a National Bank or State banks, and as perfectly certain that they did intend that it should be kept in "the Treasury of the United States." And how keep it there, without having one, and how then, except in the manner proposed by this bill, in vaults and safes, and by and under the necessary number of officers constitutionally appointed? I then take my stand on this demonstration of intention, and say to the opponents of this measure, the authors of the Government, who they admit were wise, prudent men, considered this a convenient, a proper, and a safe mode, which they denounced, and the very one that should be adopted. They accordingly, in the first Congress, passed a law directing our revenues to be collected in gold and silver. I refer to the act of the 31st of July, 1789, which directed "that the duties and fees to be collected by virtue of this act shall be received in gold and silver coin only," &c.

They then felt no apprehensions about this extension of Executive patronage which seems so much to disturb the present Whig party. Such fears had no place in their patriotic bosoms. They feared a National Bank and the evils of paper money; they dreaded these, and refused the Government power to create the one or emit the other. Whence come, then, these dire apparitions? Are they the effects of the Bank distillations infused into the heart of the body politic since those purer days? What else but hallucination springing from such a source, inspire arguments such as we hear, which, carried to their conclusions, would deny that this hard money Government could exist a year in safety, or the people prosper, without a National Bank, or State banks, which its wise founders denied it the power to create or use, to keep its money for it and to make it to boot—arguments that would prove, if true, in the face of history, no ancient world of nations existed, and some free, and with Governments Democratic to a fault, and that a majority of modern times do not now exist without banks and paper money—arguments that would prove, if true, that we could not find honest men to keep Government money in palaces or "log cabins" until we make them bank men, bank officers, and bank keepers!

We know how, and by whom, this constitutional requisition and duty of the Government to collect its revenues in gold and silver, and keep it without the aid of bank corporations, was first violated, and paper money and State bank agency introduced, and how afterwards a National Bank was got up, and its paper and agency substituted. We all know Alexander Hamilton, in a few days after the passage of the act of September, 1789, by the first Congress, creating the Treasury Department, was appointed Secretary, and, in a few days after, in violation of the Constitution and of the law of the 31st of July preceding, already recited, issued his circular to the collector at Baltimore, to receive the notes of the Bank of North America, and of the Bank of New York, in payment of the revenue, "as equivalent to gold and silver;" and how, in 1791, he succeeded in getting up the first United States Bank by his intrigues and influence over some of his followers, because he and they had a speculation to serve, and went for building up the British banking system and its appendages in this country; and, by chaining them fast to the wheels of the Federal Government, to enlarge its sphere and extend its original powers, and thus change it from what it was, and was intended to be, by its framers, into what they always wished it to be. An account of the getting up of the first United States Bank, and the means, is given by Mr. Jefferson, and to be found in his memoirs. I will not stop to read it.

Let me then tell the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] that Mr. Woodbury, in his report from which he quoted, does not say, as he intimates, "that Alexander Hamilton originated the idea of the Sub-Treasury"—not at all: Mr. Woodbury only states that Mr. Hamilton recommended something similar. Sir, Alexander Hamilton violated the Constitution and the positive law of the 31st of July, 1789, and substituted bank agency and bank paper. The idea of a Government keeping its money by individual officers, is almost as old as the world. It began when Governments commenced; and that honorable and very learned gentleman should know it continued to be the only mode in use, for ages before banks or paper money were thought of. Here, it began with our Government, and was put into operation by the breath that breathed entity into our free Constitution, after freeing us from monarchical thraldom and dangerous practices. What is there in this measure, then, to frighten us, more than the sages of the Revolution saw in it? Nothing, sir, nothing. Why should there be? Is it pretended that Americans of this generation are less honest and trustworthy than every people of the ancient, and a majority of the modern world? Who rises with this sentiment? Who casts such reproach upon his countrymen? This Government reposes on the virtue of the people. Democracy confides in men, and not so much in moneyed corporations, whose tendencies go to corrupt. Ours is a Government of the people, and its beauty, its practicability, its strength, and its superiority, consist in its representative feature. The people are sovereign, and the source of power; but how do they govern themselves? How manage their public affairs? Need we be told, they appoint from among the mass, representatives agents for a term, to legislate within the pale of the Constitution, whom they entrust to administer Government, and even to make laws affecting life, liberty, and property? Sir, even the sword and the purse, and the question of peace and war, are thus confided for the time being, to these trusted agents. And from the passage of this bill, this law, which any subsequent Congress may repeal, the people have nothing to fear. But let us not charter a National Bank, in violation of the Constitution, with immense capital and a charter to run for twenty or thirty years, and irrepealable for that time, to make and regulate our currency, and to hold control, to boot, of our vast revenues. Do this, and in my opinion, it will not only regulate our money matters, the prices of labor and property, but rule the country and control its destinies. There have occured frauds in the collection, keeping, and disbursement of public moneys, by individual officers, here and in all countries. But what of it? We cannot dispense with them? We must use human agency, though all trusts are liable to be abused. Government itself, and even ours, the best on earth, or that ever existed, is like a necessary evil, and every power and office under it, liable to be abused. But is this to be urged against the continuance of our wise system of free Government? We must use human agency in the keeping of our revenues. To bring the question to the practical test: What are banks? Who compose them? Who keep them and their revenues, which, like those of the Government, all come from the people. It is but a different mode of taxation. Do bank officers never rob and run off? And if a bank may be supposed to have more ample means than an individual Sub-Treasurer and his securities, which I am not disposed to grant, as nothing but their stock in trade is bound for their paper and debts, yet upon whom falls the loss, in case of defalcation by a bank officer? Must it not be made up at the sacrifice of it stockholders and note holders, and thus fall upon the few? While in the case of a Sub-Treasurer, the deficit, after the exhaustion of the means of himself and sureties, if any, will fall upon the millions of the people, composing the nation, and so be but a drop to each.

But leaving the comparison, as to the honesty and means of banks and individual officers, to be settled as it may, the great matter is, how stands the great question of expediency and general safety? Banks, from their very nature and business, all having generally from four to five paper dollars out, to every one in their vaults in specie, to redeem with, cannot be safe depositories; nor can it be expedient to make them the depositories of our revenues.

They are liable to the hazards of mismanagement, and the consequences of overtrading, into which the strongest instincts of our nature are ever plunging them, to increase their profits. They are running a careering race of gain, upon the same fluctuating current, without any certain steerage. Blind fortune governs all. They generally expand and contract under the same influences, and suspend and explode together from the same causes. They are exposed to the common disasters of their connection with each other and with commerce and trade, the fluctuations in the current of which depend much upon the seasons of the year, which they cannot foresee, guard against, or control. No, sir, they cannot escape the revulsions in that uncertain current upon which they float, and which experience proves are frequently occurring, bringing upon banks, and those engaged in trade, and the common mass alike, panics, suspensions, and losses; and whether they come in peace or war, these revulsions, I affirm, have their origin in banking and the paper money system, and the unrestrained and abused species of credit growing out of them. Indeed in this country so lightly do all banking institutions rest upon the bosom of their element that one adverse blast may suspend them—the disastrous consequences of which event, in a country that trusts almost entirely to them for its circulating medium, as all must where they exist, as bank paper expels specie, are indescribably oppressive to the poor laboring mass, constituting the bulk of the population. With us, experience proves these revulsions occur often and suddenly, and that they are becoming more frequent and terrible as banks and paper money increase, and the credit system which they foster, is extended, which marks the source of the evil. Banks in the United States have lately increased beyond all precedent, being now double what they were only some eight years ago, and far beyond the increase of our population and resources; and this is owing mainly to the gambling spirit which overbanking engenders, which is another evidence of the source of these revulsions. Another alarming danger is, that they not only increase, but they perpetuate their own power, as they expel specie; and they will continue to do so to a more alarming extent if made the depositories of our vast revenues. The measure under consideration will interpose a considerable check to these evils—will tend to restrain overbanking and overtrading, compel banks and merchants always to keep a constant supply of specie to meet the revenue duties, which will keep specie in the country for the basis of the paper circulation and common use.

These revulsions, I say, are becoming more frequent and disastrous as these causes increase, and as our commerce expands and becomes more involved, and especially with England and her banking and credit systems, with which ours is connected, and but a part. And since the use of the application of steam navigation on the ocean, it will become more and more so, and our system more closely united and dependent. That, sir, is already fast overcoming space and time, and actually drawing the whole business of both countries into one great whirlpool, by which connection we are already brought to an alarming extent under the control of the Bank of England. Nothing, Mr. Chairman, is more true, and nothing more appalling!

To this connection and control over us, we trace the impulsive causes which brought upon us the suspension in May, 1837, which dissolved the financial connection between the Banks and the Government, with between thirty and forty millions of whose money, consisting of their own notes, which instantly became inconvertible and irredeemable, they suddenly let down, and left the Government to stop also, for the want of funds; a thing unprecedented in history, which it was that induced the President to recommend the adoption of the remedy under consideration. Sir, what were the causes of that revulsion? Does any one now doubt but that it was overbanking, stimulating overtrading in England and this country, that led to that catastrophe? Of these impulses, and the consequences in England, of this overbanking and trading there, and of the disasters, we have a glowing description in the Manchester report, (extracts from which Mr. L. here said he would include in his speech, if he wrote it out.)

In this country, we all know the stimulating causes. We know the one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty millions of State stocks from time to time thrown into the foreign market, with our enormous revenues arising under our high tariff, which poured their flood into the deposite banks at the rate of so many millions, and which was swelled by the overbanking and overtrading in England, and by the course of the United States Bank co-operating here, led to and filled the tide that overwhelmed us. Recorded facts prove this. The average excess of our imports over exports from 1832 to 1837, was about twenty-four millions each year, and some fifty millions in 1836 alone, with an excess of at least eight millions of specie, flowing in annually during the same period, drained partly from the Bank of England, and the return, this excess of specie in part of the sales of State stocks, while the balance no doubt came in merchandise, through the contrivance of the banks, and helped to swell the amount of the tariff duties.

These vast revenues, flowing into the deposite banks, stimulated and enabled them to extend their circulation and discounts, with the co-operation of the United States Bank, to almost an incredible amount. For, ill-fated policy led to the insertion of a provision in the law which not merely invited, but as it were, compelled the deposite banks to expand. The same causes started up new banks throughout the Union—and all alike extended their circulation and discounts until every branch of business was overdone, and every channel of trade full to overbowing. The wildest speculations were projected. Men every where became rabid for gain, and the whole country rife with speculation. The sales of the public lands increased from some eleven millions in 1833 and 1834, to some in 1835 and 1836, and the last year (1836) were about twenty-four millions: and the excess of our imports over exports, also amounted that year to some fifty millions, as before mentioned. Still speculators could be seen flocking around our wild domain. This was the process. Borrowing of banks, buying with their paper, paying in the same, and the deposite banks receiving and reissuing on the same, in an endless circle, which threatened to exhaust the whole, and to convert it into worthless bank paper in exchange, till General Jackson issued the specie circular, that much denounced measure, productive of so much good, which put a stop to the process.

In this situation of affairs of bloated prosperity and redundant paper currency, a revulsion commenced in England. The Bank of England began to contract—the other banks were, in turn, seized with panic—suddenly, every interest and every branch of trade was suffering paralysis, till the whole kingdom was seen writhing under the torturing operation of a general contraction, begun by the great regulator, the Bank of England, and followed by the rest. The revulsion, as depicted in the Manchester report, was awful. Its effects immediately reach us; the chord of sympathy uniting our systems violently vibrates; suddenly, to the utter surprise of the great interior of the country, alarm begins in this country; presently, some of the most extensive mercantile and manufacturing establishments, and many of the principal houses and firms in New York, Philadelphia, and the rest of our cities along the great chart of trade, begin to totter and fall, dragging down with their crash hundreds and thousands, some failing for thousands, some for hundreds of thousands, and not a few for millions and millions! The great agricultural mass, and other laboring classes, composing the great body of the nation, who personally have nothing to do with banks, never see inside of them, but are engaged at home, in peace and quiet, earning their bread by the sweat of their brow, are aroused as from a dream. They know not what is the cause, but the city papers have brought them the news; the next arrival brings the account of a suspension of the banks. And what was the acting agency forcing on the scene. Simply as I have said, overbanking and trading had taken place in England and this country, which from our connected banking and credit systems, and our commercial relations, must necessarily happen; and the shock having commenced in England, by the course of the bank of England as just described, the thing is inevitable. Our banks seeing the coming storm, have prepared to meet it. They have overbanked like the banks in England, and must follow their example—accordingly, with our great regular at their head, they simultaneously ceased to discount, and commenced curtailing and contracting; they have from four to ten paper dollars out, for every dollar of specie in their vaults; they refuse further loans, and call in their paper and debts, and their customers, in debt, many of them, at home and abroad, thus cut off, on the one hand, and pressed on the other, must stop business; and as one push makes more, so one stop makes many. The rush commences—the crash begins—the scene of ruin widens over the Union; thus from country to country, from city to city, from house to house, and from man to man, in almost an endless chain, till distress and bankrupcy overwhelm almost without number. Then is ripened a plentiful harvest; forced sales of the unfortunate poor begin; at which speculators, and the few too rich to be much affected, fatten on the spoils of these bank brok victims. They more than repair their losses out of the suffering poor. And what shall stop the scene? Nothing, sir, not even in this free land. As well you attempt to allay the raging sea at full tide, with a pebble, as pass stay laws. It must turn its course. It must calm itself. The banks must have their time to resume, which they cannot do, till they continue long enough the application of the torturing screw, to call in their paper and debts, and replenish their specie. They are above all law. You dare not compel them to resume at once. They would grind their debtors, and their paper depreciate to nothing. They will resume in their own time, which means when they get ready, which sometimes means, just when they please, to suit the state of politics. In the mean time the country must writhe out its year or more of agony, which produces an awful ebb in the tide of business and the prosperity of the whole nation, and a woful ebb in the fortunes and prospects of thousands and thousands, with no returning flow. They may date their ruin back to the the crisis, and drag out the rest of life in poverty. And without reform, what better is there in prospect? How often shall we have suspensions after suspensions.

But honorable gentlemen may urge, though I am not aware that it has yet been, that as the deposite banks, with the indulgence that was extended them and the merchants on their bonds at the called session, have been able able to pay up since, without loss to Government in the end, the argument against the deposite system has little force.

But will any honorable gentleman tell me, if the Government had not given them time, how much we should then have lost—how many banks and merchants would have failed—and what would have been the full extent of bank paper depreciation throughout the Union? And if the Administration had cared only for itself and office holders, as so often charged, and if its principles and policy led it to war on the banks and the credit system, and "to take care of itself, and leave the people to take care of themselves," would the President have recommended, and "the party" have passed, relief laws for these delinquent banks and merchants?

And if we had not done this, I ask, what would the people have suffered, saying nothing about loss to Government, in addition to what they actually did suffer from that bank catastrophe? Can any man estimate it? But, sir, I stop not here. In talking about losses sustained by Government from its past connection with banks, by defalcations, and from the receipt of depreciated bank paper, in payment of its revenues, in comparison with its losses by collecting and disbursing officers, and document No. 10, of this House last Congress, with the report of the Committee of Ways and Means therein referred to, of 1830, from Mr. McDuffie, shows that the losses by the banks have been the greatest. I ask any gentleman to tell me, as I am not for separating the Government from the people, nor their losses, what the people have suffered altogether, first and last, from repeated bank suspensions, broken banks, depreciated bank paper, derangement in the currency, and sudden falls in prices of produce, labor, and property? I ask, but I expect no answer, Who could estimate the whole amount, or even the interest? I do not look back to the days of the Revolution to include the three hundred millions of paper (I give the lowest estimate) that perished on the hands of our fathers. Let the losses during that trying struggle pass forgotten. I only go back to 1811, and include the successive expansions, contractions, and suspensions up to the present—say the expansions in 1814, 1817, 1818, 1823, 1831, and 1834, and those since. Every body must remember these, and the ruinous contractions which followed. Mr. Gallatin's report at the Philadelphia convention states that no less than 165 banks broke and blew up from 1811 to 1830. He does not state how many millions of paper dollars they altogether had out, that died on the hands of the unfortunate holders, and no one knows; but all must know the amount was enormous! But the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, by Mr. McDuffie, of 1830, informs us—

"The Government borrowed, during the short period of the war, eighty millions of dollars, at an average discount of 15 per cent.; giving certificates of stock, amountiug to eighty millions of dollars, in exchange for sixty-eight millions of dollars, in such bank paper as could be obtained. In this statement Treasury notes are considered as stock of 20 per cent discount. Upon the very face of the transaction, therefore, there was a loss of twelve millions of dollars." &c.

The report again proceeds:

"But the sum of sixty-eigkt millions of dollars received by the Government, was in a depreciated currency, not more than half as valuable as that in which the stock given in exchange for it has been, and will be, redeemed. Here, then, is a loss of thirty-four millions, resulting incontestably from the depreciation of the currency, making, with the sum lost by the discount, forty-six millions of dollars."

And the said document, No. 10, proves our whole losses by public officers only some eight millions altogether. These were losses to the Government only.

But, I ask, what have been the losses of the people? How many thousands were caught in each net drawn by each contraction after an expansion, and what the amount of loss upon the whole, and what the suffering in every form? Look at the millions and millions of property of every kind in the whole country—the multiplicity of contracts and transactions between man and man, including sales and purchases of land, and all kinds of property; and the vast amount of demands and debts existing between so many people at each crisis; and the course of business, and the sudden fall of prices. Buying on credit when every thing was high, by reason of the undue expansion, making money plenty, and bloating prices, and having to pay when the contraction followed, and prices fell, with the scarcity of money; one creditor, then, breaking up his debtor, and he himself, in turn, being broken up by another, and so on, through the lengthened train of thousands and thousands.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RAMSEY] gave us the other day an account of the scenes in his State, as set surth in a report to the Legislature. It seems some thirty banks, on one occasion, were created in that State at a time; and the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] who preceded me, also informed us how it was in his State, where, he says, about forty odd banks were made at one session, about the same period. And you, sir, well remember how it was in Virginia. In my native county, I recollect lands ranging during the expansion from fifty to seventy dollars per acre, suddenly fell to a range of from fifteen to thirty dollars per acre, and the prices of every thing in proportion. Men bought during the expansion, and improved, after paying half the purchase in cash, and in a short time, when contraction came, had the same farms sold from them, under trust deeds, to the vendors for the balance, without satisfying it, even with their improvements in. They lost what they had paid, lost the land, and their improvements, and were broken up; and not a few transferred from their new homes to the public jail! And it appears it was even worse in Pennsylvania and Kentucky, where they had made more banks.

Sir, could the records of this whole land, of all the courts in the country, and the memories of all the sufferers and victims of bank sacrifice, covering the whole period since 1811, and taking in each crisis, be drawn upon for the simple facts as they occurred, and the amount of losses and every case of suffering be put down in parallel columns in one vast book; one side presenting the number of suits, judgments, and executions, with the gross amounts of each, costs and fees included; the other, each case of calamitous issue thus produced, not of record in court, but in sad memory, if such a thing could be done, and that mighty book could be spread out in our midst this moment, in this hall, if this spacious hall could hold such a book, could honorable gentlemen have the heart to look upon that vast book, and the amount, and stand up here and tantalize us, and denounce a measure intended to save the revenues of the Government from disaster, and interpose some check upon these banks, to prevent these expansions and ruinous contractions, and the recurrence of similar scenes! Ah! sir, if such a book could be spread out before the body of the people—the great laboring classes, who lived by their labor—have nothing to do with banks, and with whom the banks will have nothing to do—who never inside of banks or the bank built palaces of the rich, who lived off of their labor alone—how long, think you, sir, their patience would bear, after we had told them honestly the whole truth, that it is the laboring mass at last, that suffers most, by the working up and down of this miserable system, such as no other country has ever tolerated; for it is better in England? Take the last twenty-eight years, and the repetition of these scenes is without a parallel in the history of the world. Sir, by the operation of this system, and even under the reign of the boasted regulator, I unhesitatingly say, thousands and thousands have been consigned, at each successive suspension, without crime or fault, to bankruptcy, poorhouses, and prisons, and their innocent families to beggary, in this free and wide spread land of plenty! I assert, sir, that by every suspension from 1814 to the present, millions of property at each crisis have passed, by the process, and the greatest portion of the whole, from the laboring classes, ruined by the sudden contractions of these privileged corporations, owned by a few, into the hands of speculators, who labor not at all, or of those who were so rich, that when property fell one half in price, still had the means at their command to buy and repair their losses out of the sacrificed property of those whose all was little, and that sold under the hammer. I mean the laboring poor, who, when their all is thus swept, yet must meet in the face the misery of low wages, for wages at such times, in the general decline of prices, are the first to fall. I repeat it, the natural, necessary working of the system is, under these sudden changes, to transfer the property of the laboring classes into the hands of speculators, and those of the rich. As wages fall first, those dependent on their labor are the first to get in debt, the first sold out, and the very class without means to buy, and who feel keenest and deepest when thus beggared, the ills of low wages, while the speculator buys their sacrificed property, and grows rich by the next expansion by holding on; so the rich, who have much, retain what they have, and repair their losses by buying bargains at sales. This is the necessary operation of a system that favors the few with loans, and robs first, and then ruins the many. What has made so many rich and so many poor, in your large cities? What has converted half our people almost into speculators? What has swelled the fortunes of a few in England into millions, and made paupers of about one third of her entire population, and is doing the same thing in our bank cities, but the working of this open and shut system, from all connection with which this bill proposes to relieve this Government, and to remedy, to some good degree, the fluctuations of the system itself?

These suspensions have occurred in this country, and all since 1816, under the regulation of the United States Bank, when no act of this Government, up to 1833, was ever blamed as producing them—when there was no removal of the deposites, and no specie circular, but when banks had the furnishing and regulation of the currency, and the keeping of our vast revenues, to trade upon free of charge, to aid their system of favoritism, to make "the rich richer, and the poor poorer."

Who, then, is for the readoption of the State bank deposite system? The Whig party? Has a single gentleman come out for it? No, sir; not one. What party opposed its inceptive introduction at the time of the removal of the deposites from the United States Bank into them? They afterwards opposed the passage of the law to regulate the system. They denounced it afterwards as "the pet bank system," and predicted it would fail and explode, as it did. And it is matter of history that they timely sought, with the aid of a portion of the Democratic party, to secure the recharter of the United States Bank, which lent its vast power and patronage to carry the measure. Its expansions and contractions, and the writhing of the people under the screw at the critical moment, is not forgotten; nor the subsequent conduct of that institution to defeat the re-election of Gen. Jackson, who, after the act to recharter was carried through both branches of Congress, put his veto upon it, which the people ratified by re-electing him by an overwhelming majority.

What did the Whig party next do after this veto, for which act they denounced the "hero of two wars," and the President of the people, as a tyrant and despot? Did they fall into the support of of the denounced pet bank system? Never, sir, till it had failed and exploded, and fulfilled their prediction, and was abandoned, from necessity, by the Democratic party, and this Independent Treasury recommended and taken up. They then, as if disbelieving in their own predictions, at the moment of their fulfilment, opposed the Sub-Treasury, without presenting any scheme, or avowing themselves for the deposite system or a National Bank. But they opposed the Sub-Treasury, and doubtless the mass of the party, with their great leader, preferred the State bank system to it. And why? Because they viewed it, as he declared he did, as a convenient "half-way-house" to a National Bank; because they believed it would fail again, and end in that? No, sir, that party never has been for the pet bank system, but has looked forward with anxiety to another National Bank. That party, aided by a portion of the Democracy, about the expiration of the charter of the late bank, procured an act from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, continuing its existence, with the same name, with the addition of Pennsylvania, the same capital, the same stockholders, with increased powers and privileges, and the same president and other officers retained, and even its old books, that it might go right on; and it did, and shortly after, armed itself still further, by establishing a new agency abroad, where so much of its capital was, and still is held. There, where ruled, and now rules its great prototype, in that "sea-girt isle," where rolls around the bank-built palaces of the few perpetually, the tide of wealth, drawn from the labor of the many—the laboring poor, who toil sixteen hours out of the twenty-four each day, to gain a mere living, leaving a pauper list of millions groaning in squalid poverty, dependent on the scanty crumbs of public and private bounty, for existence, under "hope deferred." A state of things, I again say, our banking and its credit system is beginning to present here, in our large cities, where banks and money have sway, and but for the length and breadth of our rich and cheap domain, would grind their victims with more facility, owing to the greater density of population that would have grown up. This pet institution was thus continued, and glory was claimed for the triumph. It was still to be the balance wheel of the paper and credit system, and great regulator of the currency; and was even pronounced by its distinguished president, "stronger than before."

Yet, after this grand flourish, and after its great head had even graciously announced, moreover, the restoration of peace between the two contending parties, his bank and this Government, soon came the grand suspension, in May, 1837; and the Government of this Republic was, by the catastrophe, brought, almost in a day, by a bank crisis, to a sudden pause in its course, with between thirty and forty millions of revenue on hand. And where would honorable gentlemen tell the world it was? Why, in the Treasury of the United States! Yes, sir, with this immense amount of revenue, and all the world at peace, and when, just before, the times were most prosperous—nothing but one universal gale of prosperity seen setting in from every quarter, and earth teeming with a superabundance of every production—at such a time as this, the country is convulsed, and Government itself brought to the point of stopping, as it were in an hour, with this great regulator, timely chartered, and continued without a moment's suspense, in full power and operation, and this Government, the while, sustaining and cherishing your select, best State banks, with its vast revenues!

In this state of things, the President was obliged to call Congress together to devise and provide relief for Government, banks, and people. He did so, and recommended indulgence to these delinquent banks, and to the merchants, and the issuing of Treasury notes, on its credit, to enable it to do this; and, to secure the Government in future, in peace and war, from similar catastrophes, he urged a perpetual divorce between Government and banks, and the measure proposed, in this bill, an alternative thus forced upon the Government, as it were, by the banks and merchants, for, by that state of things which they had brought on the country, the Government, and themselves, it became necessary.

And what else could he do? He could not recommend a National Bank. He had just come into office under a solemn pledge, that he held this Government had no constitutional right to create such an institution. So both his oath and his honor forbade. Besides, he came in pledged "to tread in the footsteps" of him who had vetoed a bank bill, which the people approved. On the other hand, there lay before his eyes the present "regulator" prostrate in its self made ruin, beneath its own rebound. The State bank deposite system he could not recommend the readoption of that, under the circumstances. Its failure and explosion had been too signal, and the immediate cause of the state of things, which call for remedy. He could not presume his own party friends in favor of its readoption, and surely not the Whig party.

Well, sir, acts were passed relieving the deposite banks and the merchants, by giving them the time and indulgence which they themselves desired. Treasury notes were issued to keep the Government in motion, to pay the civil list, the pensioners, and our army and navy. All this was done; yet the party to which these banks and merchants chiefly belong, afterwards charged the Government would do nothing to relieve the distress in the country; and these banks and merchants were quite the loudest in complaint and abuse.

Most wofully, then, and I reproclaim it to the country, has the State bank deposite system failed; and what again is their condition at present? And worse than all, this continued United States Bank, though authoritatively pronounced stronger than before, was about the first, in May, 1837, and since, to suspend. Instead of regulating the currency and exchanges and State banks, and saving all, it sinks in their midst, when there appeared universal prosperity reigning throughout the land, into suspension, if not insolvency; and was, as strongly suspected, the cause of dragging the whole into the vortex! Yet, the Whig party is for another United States "regulator;" for to this complexion has it come, and must come, whatever reserve and silence be maintained. Nay, I take the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POPE] as the proposition of the party. His two colleagues [Mr.

WHITE and Mr. UNDERWOOD] have come out boldly in their speeches in favor of a National Bank, and the argument of every gentleman, who has spoken against this bill, was to the same effect. The great issue, then, is Sub-Treasury or United States Bank. This is the mighty question to be decided here, and to be again passed on by the country. For one, I have already said enough, and shall add but little more, upon the constitutional question. But, if I could believe we had the constitutional right, I am utterly opposed to the creation of such an institution. If it has power for good, so it will for evil. If it can regulate the currency, it is most unwise for a free people to delegate to a corporation of a few men that vast power, instead of retaining it in the people. If it can do that, it can control the business of the country, and the fortunes of all, and will favor the few, to the prejudice of the many. When you place under its control the regulation of the currency, which is what its advocates claim for it, as the great argument in its favor, you place the country itself in its power; and, by giving it our revenues, as proposed, to keep, you actually deliver it over bound, to its will. I have no confidence in any great moneyed power in the hands of a few. I would not trust one man, or a few men, with such vast controlling power. It will put law and Congress at defiance, and yet itself be controlled by a greater power abroad, which will rule the few that govern it. It will control, too, in the worst form. It will not openly overawe, but silently torture, when the whole country is distressed by its folly. When a revulsion comes, after expansion, then it must save itself, though the means it must resort to, occasion universal suffering. It must contract to save its own life, while distress rages all around it, and over the land. This is but a sketch of the actual history of the past. Such has been the careering course of that which has had its day of prosperity and adversity, and whose account of good and evil, and of profit and loss, is before the country. Sir, the course of the future one may be easily marked, as shadowed by that of the past. Contraction after expansion is, with such a bank, the law of fate, and it must obey; and we have seen, that, in the pursuit of its own interest, its issues have flowed with the flood of commerce and trade, which it cannot control, and have retreated with the ebb. At one season, we have seen a vast overflowing in all the channels of business, and the land filled with bubble waves of deceitful prosperity, and then we have witnessed as sudden a withdrawal of its circulation, when, after its expulsion of specie, it was as essential to the wants of the country as the blood that flows in the animal system is to health and life; and this we have seen invariably take place, just as the current of trade was retreating to foreign shores, and the State banks compelled to pursue the same course; and, as the consequence, prices, wages, and property of all kinds fell suddenly in proportion to the decrease in the currency, thus produced; and sudden distress overtake the land, as it were, in one short month, throwing thousands and thousands out of business and employmet, home and comfort, with helpless families cast like wrecks upon the strand. Instead of believing in the expediency of such an institution, I am entirely convinced of the contrary, and not less appalled at the magnitude of the dangers that may mark its course. I look at the undeniable fact, proved by the history of the times, that expansions, contractions, and suspensions here, have followed the like results in England. I assert that this is the fact; and I cannot shut my eyes to the truth, that this grows out of the intimate and dependent relations thus proved to exist between our paper system and that of England, which, in fact, are but parts of one and the same system, and ours the worst part—and that such an institution would be but as a branch of the Bank of England, which is united with the Government of England, mutually supporting and sustained by a mighty floating bulwark without, and a mightier money power within, and thus united in power and destiny.

The Manchester report, to which I before referred, drawn in view of all the facts, just after they had transpired, bears me out in these views. And the high source from which it emanates, and replete as it is, with facts, figures, and argument, entitles it to the fullest credit. It proves that, the Bank of England, about the beginning of the crisis of 1837, in England, and which forced on that in this country, as I have shown, in its efforts to regain something upwards of six millions of pounds sterling, in specie, which, after its last re-charter, some years ago, under which its paper was made a legal tender, in all cases, except between itself and its creditors, enabled and stimulated it to expand its issues beyond a wise discretion, and at the same time reduced its bullion in proportion; by its contractions and turnings of the screw produced thereby loss and ruin in some five great interests in the kingdom, to the amount of some twenty millions sterling, from which followed indescribable scenes of distress and suffering, and such a sudden increase of bankrupts and culprits as filled the almshouses and prisons in a short time to overflowing. And yet, with all, after producing so much ruin, she has had to become a beggar of the Bank of France for her life. Yet it is probable she did not occasion more loss and suffering, all things considered, at home directly, than by that very process she did indirectly here, by her action upon our great regulator, and through it upon our State banks, and the business of the country, in conjunction with their own imprudent expansions and conduct, during the same period. The losses and sufferings here in 1837, and since, have been perhaps as great as ever afflicted any country under the sun. Establish a National Bank here, in the centre of trade, and it must be under the influence of that monster in London, which, seated at the emporium of the commercial world, will control all banks connected with the paper and credit system of that emporium.

Sir, I will not, no never will I agree to plant in the bosom of my country, a subordinate coworker of ruin; I would not bind her direct to the British throne, nor will I chain her thus indirectly to that which upholds it, controls it, and wields it. Sir, I am rather for tearing loose the chain that now binds our prosperity to that nation's will, through the controlling power of her bank, instead of adding this last link that may unite indissolubly our destinies for wo.

Sir, the Bank of England is the money monarch, enthroned upon the throne, without which, that kingdom would dissolve and crumble; and you ask me to place my country beneath that money sway, by bank dependance. I tell you, your National Bank would be obliged to harmonize with its master power. The laws of trade would unite their wills. They must breathe in the same space, and a common interest inspire co-operation, and bind them to the same centre. War would be impolitic; would be death to the weaker. And do you hesitate which would be the master spirit, yours or that which commands England's wealth and power, and the Indies? Do you doubt that that would rule the action of yours, by a stronger cord than our fathers severed with the sword, to cut our country loose from that plundering, grinding, crushing power? Yours would have the regulation of your currency, trade, and commerce, and the custody of your treasures, and power over all your State banks and the Bank of England; the regulation and control of it. Would you thus link and risk your country's prosperity, and destiny, perhaps, with England and her bank? or will you hold your purse and your sword, which it commands, as you would your means, your business, and your liberties, free forever from such connection and control?

Sir, though all be now calm, and the mighty deep upon which nations drift to their final doom, seem smooth and tranquil, can you tell me what is the heaving even now beneath the surface? How far can you see in the distance, towards which we verge? Does not an impenetrable veil overhang the vista? Sir, you know not how soon we may reach that point where the hiatus yawns. Tell me that, sir! Sir, none shall tell—it is not given to any to know what time these mighty continents shall stand arrayed, and all earth tremble with the terrific shock. I only know, a secret, eternal war began, when free principles emerged from their tomb in the old world, and fled to this, over a fathomless ocean, that should be our eternal safety and protection, and will, unless by this vast artificial system of connection, our power and destiny shall become bound up in the web of an overshadowing, overpowering mammoth monopoly. Sir, that war between the despotism of the old world and the free principles of this, though apparently smothered, is now raging, and will some day burst from its volcanic bosom. That mighty deep shall yet be convulsed. Indeed, the restless waves already begin to roll in confusion, and murmur dissonance, in anticipation of that coming storm which, long impatient of its prison bounds, will howl betimes, and after gathering all its fury, sweep resistless across the flood—that storm, that breaks the cords of amity, wakes nations from repose, and plunges them into the strife of death. In this shock of continents, will your Government, your free institutions, your liberties, and all be safe, with your treasure in the keeping of a bank, which may have all afloat in trade—a bank in the hands of a few, and under the control of the Bank of England? Sir, if such convulsion come, and come it may, all, all may be driven from their moorings, by the first shock a steerless float, and the whole disappear like eddies, lost upon the flood, that was, that's gone to that oblivion of the past, whither all that's ending, valuable, or worthless, is lost, first or last, where ceaseless flows that tide that has no ebb. For myself, my mind is fixed—I will not rivit. I will attach to my speech extracts from the Manchester report, in support of these views.

Extracts from the "Report of the directors, to a special general meeting of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures at Manchester, on the effects of the administration of the Bank of England, upon the commercial and manufacturing interests of the county, published 12th December, 1839, under the sanction of the directors."

"The Board think it expedient, before proceeding to a consideration of the effects of the recent policy of the Bank of England upon the manufacturing and trading interests of the country, to take a brief review of the events which preceded, and have accompanied, the present commercial reverses.

"Down to the end of 1835, all branches of trade and manufactures were in a state of prosperity, which they had continued, almost without interruption, to enjoy for several years. In the course of that year, the Bank of England, by throwing a large amount of money, held for the East India Company, and advanced on account of the West India loan, into the market at a very low rate of interest, and by the facilities thereby afforded to the London bill brokers, and others, for discounting enormous sums, American acceptances and bills reissued by the joint stock banks, laid the foundation for that excessive stimulus to trade and speculation which prevailed in the succeeding year, (1836.)

"Early in 1836, the mania for speculation in shares, and the formation of innumerable joint stock associations, gave warning to all those who had a recollection of 1825, that the trading world was hastening towards scenes similar in character to those of that fatal year, &c.

"Towards the close of 1836, the stock of bullion in the Bank of England had fallen to little more than four millions, whilst, at the same time, it was indebted to the world upwards of thirty millions for its circulation and deposites. The directors now determined to check the drain upon their coffers, and to increase their stock of bullion. It has been stated, upon the authority of the bank directors, in a memorandum presented to the committee of the House of Commons in 1832, that a supply of gold can be procured from abroad only by reduced prices of commodities; in other words, at the expense of the manufacturing and commercial interests, &c.

"The trading community, upon whom the slightest restrictive movement on the part of the Bank of England operates with electrical effect, seized with alarm, were now eager to sell off their stocks to save themselves, as far as possible, from the effects of the impending fall of prices, &c.

"Similar consequences were immediately felt throughout the whole commercial world. Our merchants instantly transmitted orders to their agents abroad to dispose of their stocks, and, in lieu of the shipment of produce to a falling market, to remit the amount in specie, or bills of Exchange, &c. The losses thus incurred by the British merchants upon their outstanding capitals, were, in many cases, ruinous.

"Throughout the year 1837, the Bank of England continued, at the cost of these heavy sacrifices to our merchants, to augment the amount of its bullion, as the following official returns of the stock of the specie in its vaults will show:

June,	1837,	£4,750,000
Dec.	1837,	8,172,000
Jan.	1838,	8,685,000

"The Board have now to refer to certain circumstances growing naturally out of this state of things, which more particularly affect the cotton trade.

"The Bank of the United States, with other large American banking companies, taking advantage of the embarrassments of the great Anglo-American houses, had become the channels for shipping the cotton crop of 1837-'8. In this way, Mr. Biddle stated in his letter to Mr. Adams, he gave facilities for shipping from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars of cotton, and placed his own confidential agent in Liverpool!

"Having thus taken a review of the principal events illustrating the course pursued by the Bank of England from 1835 down to the present time, the board are desirous of directing the attention of the members to the losses which the forced contractions and expansions of the currency inflict upon the manufacturing and mercantile community; an evil, the magnitude of which has not been sufficiently appreciated by those who have investigated the questions of banking and currency, &c.

"It may be estimated that, in the production of the five great manufactures of cottons, woollens, silks, linens, and hardwares, capital, fixed and floating, is employed, amounting to a hundred millions sterling.

"The rates of depreciation, caused by the late panic, upon all these articles of production, may be gathered, without difficulty, from the prices of the spring and summer of 1837; they fell in price variously from 20 to 50 per cent.

"To estimate the amount of loss upon these manufactures, they must also be followed into the hands of the wholesale and retail dealers, whose losses upon stock consequent upon the operations of the Bank of England or the currency are incurred simultaneously with those of the first producers. Scarcely one of these escaped in 1837, without the sacrifice of the whole of the ordinary profits of the year's trade, and many lost by the fall in the value of their stock the whole of their capital, also.

"In proof of the latter fact, it may be stated that 1939 fiats in bankruptcy were issued in 1837, the average of the four previous years amounting to 1266 only, whilst a proportionate increase occurred in the number of private compositions.

"The amounts of British capital are as follows:

"Employed in the production of the five great interests of cotton, woollen, silk, linen, and hardware, estimated at £100,000,000

"In the wholesale and retail distribution	25,000,000
"In the whole of the foreign commerce	35,000,000
	£160,000,000
"Lowest estimate of loss, 25 per cent.	£40,000,000

"Without embracing the less prominent branches of our domestic manufactures, including the trade in a thousand articles of daily consumption, all of which are more or less affected by the revulsion of prices, reference has here been made to a capital of one hundred and sixty millions, upon which we may trace a loss varying from 20 to 50 by the forced depreciation of value in 1837. This sacrifice of forty millions at the least, and which constitutes a fraction only of the losses simultaneously sustained by the entire commercial world, was incurred in order that the Bank of England might regain possession of six or seven millions of specie, which it had previously forced out of the country by the undue expansion.

"It has been shown that the Bank no sooner found itself in a safe position, than it recommenced, in 1838, a system of expansion, and exported a part of its gold; prices of great staples before enumerated consequently advanced during the year 1838 and part of 1839, until, as we have seen, the restrictive policy was resumed, the motion of the screw was reversed, and, down to the present moment, have fallen again from 20 to 30 per cent."

SPEECH OF MR. PARRISH,

OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, June 10, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. PARRISH addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: With the gentleman from New York [MR. MARVIN] who has just taken his seat, I agree that the bill now under consideration is one of great importance, and embraces almost every question connected with the operations of this Government. It clearly presents not only the measure contained in the bill, of having the public money managed for public purposes alone by individuals selected from amongst the people, but also the antagonist system of corporations created by the States, or one institution created by the Federal Government, in either of which the public moneys become blended with, and made subservient to private interests. No other method has at any time been tried or proposed, and it is believed, none other can; and of these the Opposition advocate a United States Bank. Each gentleman who has addressed the committee in opposition to the bill, has more or less, and generally at large, entered into an examination and discussion of a National Bank as superior to the Sub Treasury. They have made this issue, and no alternative is left but to speak and decide upon these questions. With the matter thus presented, I propose, first, to examine the principles of the bill; secondly, some of the objections urged against it; and thirdly, the expediency of a National Bank.

In doing this, since it has been the policy of the Opposition to keep the principles and provisions of the bill out of view as much as possible, and to prejudice the public mind against a full and impartial investigation of its merits; and since it is now openly avowed on this floor, by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] that if they succeed in the present political contest, it will be repealed if passsed, I shall present a synopsis of this important measure in the order in which its principles are developed. A few considerations are sufficient to determine what those principles are.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, estimates the total receipts for 1840 at eighteen millions six hundred thousand dollars, of which fifteen millions will be received from customs. This sum is paid by the people, and the gentleman from Massachusetts admits it to be collected by indirect taxation. This is true, and the process by which it is done, I shall hereafter show. The population of the United States may be estimated at fifteen millions, or one for every dollar collected from duties this year. Now will these people agree to pay this amount of money for the mere purpose of determining where it shall be kept, and nothing else? They certainly will not. Are they willing to pay it for the purpose of determining simply in what kind of currency it shall be received? I think not. For what object, then, will they consent to pay it? For the purposes of Government, and these alone. Therefore it becomes a question of the first magnitude with the American people to know what use is made of the money collected from them. Whether it is to be used exclusively for public purposes, or whether what is thus collected from the whole people shall be used by a part only for their own advantage, whether that part consists of office holders, merchants, manufacturers, or bankers. In short, whether the many shall be taxed for the benefit of the few.

Next to this in importance is the kind of money which shall be paid and received for Government dues, so as to carry out the first object with least inconvenience to the people and greatest security to the Government.

Incident to these is a third consideration as to the location or places, and under whose immediate control the public money shall be kept from the time it is received till paid out.

These are the leading features of the measure, and the order in which I shall consider them.

The first principle is contained in the 17th section, which prohibits the use of public money for private purposes; and makes it felony for any officer or agent of the Government, or any other person advising or participating, to use public money, or invest it in property or merchandise, or to loan it, with or without interest, by fine equal to the amount embezzled, and imprisonment not less than six months, or more than five years; and requires the officers to keep accurate accounts of sums received, and the kind received; also sums paid or transferred, and the kind.

The second principle, defining the kind of money in which the public revenues shall be received and paid out, is found in the 19th section, which provides, that from and after the 30th of June, 1840, of the money payable to Government, one-fourth shall be paid in gold and silver, and three-fourths in paper of specie paying banks. After the 30th June, 1841, one-half in specie, and a like sum in paper; after the 30th of June, 1842, three-fourths in specie, and one-fourth in paper; and after the 30th of June, 1843, all to be paid in the legal currency of the country. And the 22d section provides that no regulation of the Secretary of the Treasury shall make any difference in the funds to be received from different sources of the revenue. These two sections define the kind of money to be received, and the two following the kind to be paid out.

The 20th section requires every officer, after the 30th of June, 1843, in disbursing the money of the Government, to pay gold and silver only, under penalty of being reported to the President immediately, and to Congress.

The 21st section prohibits any officer or agent, paying out Government money, from exchanging the funds furnished, for any thing but gold and silver; and when drafts are furnished, requires them to be converted into legal currency, and the same paid out, under penalty of immediate suspension; and being reported, subject to dismissal from office, or being reinstated, as the President may see fit.

The location or places for keeping the public money, is determined as follows:

The 1st section of the bill provides for fitting up and assigning exclusively, within the new Treasury building now erecting at Washington City, a sufficient number of rooms for keeping the public money which may be in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, until paid out.

The 2d section provides that the Mint at Philadelphia, and the Branch Mint at New Orleans, as at present provided for mint purposes, shall be depositories of the public money, under the charge of the treasurers of those mints respectively.

The 3d section provides for fitting up and furnishing within the custom houses now erecting at New York, and Boston, Massachusetts, rooms with vaults, etc. for keeping under the control of the receivers general, to be appointed at those places, the public money that may be deposited there.

The 4th section provides for erecting and fitting up suitable rooms, to receive and keep the public money, at Charleston, S.C. and at St. Louis Mo.

The persons having charge of the public moneys are designated, and their duties defined as follows:

The 6th section of the bill requires the United States Treasurer, and all other treasurers and officers acting as treasurers, collectors, surveyors, receivers, and postmasters, to safely keep all moneys coming into their custody, without loaning or using, and pay out and transfer faithfully according to law.

The 9th section requires collectors and receivers in the District of Columbia to pay to the United States Treasury. Those of New Orleans and Philadelphia to pay to the treasurers of the mints in those cities respectively; those of New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, to pay over to the receivers-general at those offices, as provided in the 3d, 4th, and 8th sections, as often as once each week, at least.

The 10th section provides for transferring the public money from one depository to another, as convenience, and the public service may require; and for keeping a separate account of the funds of the Post Office Department.

The 11th section provides that the money in any depository shall be considered as in the Treasury, and subject to the draft of the United States Treasurer, for transfer or disbursement; and for making returns to the Treasury and Post Office Departments, as often as required.

Necessary to carry out these principles, are certain details, contained in the other sections, such as the appointment of officers, as follows:

Section 5th provides for appointing four receivers-general, one at New York, another at Boston, a third at Charleston, and a fourth at St. Louis.

[THE SECURITY OF OFFICERS.]

Section 7th requires of officers satisfactory bonds, and their renewal from time to time.

Section 8th requires officers who have already given bond, immediately to give additional bonds, and renew from time to time.

[CHECKS UPON OFFICERS.]

Section 12th authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to cause examinations of books, accounts, and moneys in the depositories, by agents, and requires the examinations to be particular and full.

Section 13th, in addition to the checks provided in the 12th section, enjoins naval officers, surveyors, registers, directors, and superintendents, as checks upon collectors, receivers, and treasurers, respectively, to examine and report the condition of the books, accounts, returns, and money on hand, in each case, to the Secretary of the Treasury, quarterly, and as much oftener as he may direct.

[SALARIES OF OFFICERS.]

SEC. 24, fixes the salaries of receivers and treasurers of the mints at $2,500 each, except at New York, which is $4,000, and provides for their payment quarterly, prohibiting the receipt of perquisites on pain of fine or imprisonment.

SEC. 14, allows to officers keeping and disbursing the money, their expenses for obtaining vaults, safes, &c. transferring and disbursing public money, with clerks' hire, not exceeding ten clerks in all, whose salaries together shall not exceed $8,000.

[PREPARING OFFICES, PERMANENT AND TEMPORARY.]

SEC. 26, appropriates $10,000 for erecting offices at Charleston, if rooms cannot be fitted up in the custom-house now there, and for the office at St. Louis.

SEC. 18, provides for obtaining temporary rooms, &c. till the permanent, required by this act, are finished.

[PROHIBITING RECEIPTS AND CHECKS FROM BEING TRANSFERABLE.]

SEC. 23, requires the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt such means as will require Government drafts to be speedily presented for payment at the places designated, and prevent their being used as paper currency.

SEC. 25, authorizes the United States Treasurer to receive payment for lands and give receipts, which shall not be assignable.

[AUTHORIZING PAYMENTS IN CERTAIN CASES TO THE DEPOSITORIES.]

SEC. 16, authorizes marshals, district attorneys, and other persons having public money to pay to the United States, and patentees, to pay to the Treasurer or receivers-general, and take receipts or certificates of deposite.

[AUTHORIZING THE WITHDRAWAL OF DEPOSITES THAT ARE NOW IN BANK.]

SEC. 15 directs the Secretary of the Treasury, so soon as safety and convenience will permit, to draw the public money from the present depositories and place it in the new.

[APPROPRIATING MONEY AND REPEALING LAWS.]

SEC. 28 repeals conflicting laws.

SEC. 27 appropriates the money which is authorized by the bill.

This is the bill, and these are its principles, to my mind, so clear as to be comprehended by all who desire to understand. It has been called by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] the distinctive measure of the present Administration. I admit this; and the first principle in the measure—that the public money shall not be used for private purposes—is distinctly avowed by the President in his message of 1838, page 10, when, in speaking of the Sub-Treasury, he says:

"The Secretary of the Treasury will lay before you additional information, containing new details on this interesting subject. To these I ask your early attention. That it should have given rise to great diversity of opinion, cannot be a subject of surprise. After the collection and custody of the public moneys had been for so many years connected with, and made subsidiary to, the advancement of private interests, a return to the simple and self-denying ordinances of the Constitution could not but be difficult. But time and free discussion, eliciting the sentiments of the people, and aided by that conciliatory spirit which has ever characterized their course on great emergencies, were relied upon for a satisfactory settlement of the question. Already has this anticipation on one important point at least—the impropriety of diverting public money to private purposes—been fully realized."

These sentences are the very essence of the 17th section of the bill, and deny the use of the public money for private purposes, as well to banks and bankers, as to officers and other individuals. It is against this principle the Opposition have arrayed all their artillery.

It is true, they are afraid to come out and claim the right to tax the whole American people, and give the revenue thus raised to be used by the banks, for the private advantage of the stockholders, who constitute less than one-fifth of the whole population; yet this is the object for which they contend, and they seek to arrive at it by indirect means. Has it not been, and is it not now, a settled, organized effort on the part of the Opposition in this House, and the leaders of the party throughout the country, to find fault with General Jackson's administration—to reflect odium upon the present, and to take exception to every act of Mr. Van Buren, even in the discussion of this bill, and render him odious in the eyes of the American people—prostrate his administration—thrust themselves into power, and when in, to recharter another National Bank—give it the public money, and receive its paper, and that of other banks, into the Treasury? By this, the stockholders of these institutions throughout the country, as I shall hereafter show, would again be enabled to make their millions upon millions from the use of the money collected from the people. What are their arguments? Has it not been urged by the leaders of the Opposition, here and elsewhere, that the banks are the people, and that this measure is an attack upon them? What is this but saying that the country depends upon the banks, and if you refuse them the use of the public money, either on deposite, or by receiving their paper in payment of public dues, you are waging a war of extermination against them, and ruining the country? Did not the whole argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING] as well as of every other gentleman who has spoken in opposition to the bill, resolve itself into this? Again and again they have urged that every interest in this country depended on commerce and manufactures, and that these depended on bank credit; that bank credit rested upon the connection of the banks with the General Government; that this measure destroyed the banks and prostrated their credit, by which commerce and manufactures were ruined, agriculture injured, and the price of labor reduced. This whole theory is false, as I shall show when I come to examine the objections urged against the bill; but it tends strongly to prove the influence the banking institutions have already obtained in the country. As these are the claims set up for those institutions, it may be well to examine their extent and number, and how they have increased in the country. For this purpose, I have prepared with some care from public documents, in the possession of Congress, a table showing the population, commerce, and revenues of the country; also, the number of banks, their circulation and capital, with their specie basis, from the first census in 1790, each census or ten years, up to and including the present year, with the increase of each, during the same period; and also, the number of joint stock banks in England since 1826, and of Ireland since 1834. The dates and amounts are from authentic documents, except the population and commerce of this year, which are estimated merely, and are favorable in this comparison to the banks.

Number and date of each census	Population	Increase per cent.	Foreign commerce	Increase per cent.	Aggregate of population and commerce	Revenues of the General Government	Increase per cent. NOTE.—From Mr. Gallatin's report in 1830, there had been one failure for two and a half, or two-fifths of the number at that period. From Mr. Woodbury's report, 1840, there had been one failure for fifteen, or one-fifteenth of the whole number. From 1790 to 1840, total number of banks, 1,664; failed, 221, making one failure for 7¼ solvent banks, exclusive of suspensions.

An examination of this table will show that paper circulation has continually increased, faster than the specie of the banks, which is, and should be, its only true basis. Not only this, but it will be seen that this paper currency has increased, from the commencement of the Government, more rapidly than the population, the commerce, or the revenues of the country, and more than all these put together; also, that the number of banks, bank capital, and consequently bankers, has not only greatly exceeded the increase of their specie, but every thing else, and indeed all other interests put together. It will also show that this increase does not depend upon a National Bank, or great regulator; for in England and Ireland, (where there are Government banks,) the local banks, within the last ten years, have sprung up as rapidly as in this country. Here, at one view, you have the rapid increase of the banking interest in this country, which outstrips every thing else. Within fifty years, it has grown so strong as to claim, and the friends of the system in this House declare, that the day laborer, the mechanic, the artisan, the farmer, and in short all other pursuits, depend for prosperity and protection upon allowing these institutions, and this class, the use of the public money, which is collected from all, and should be applied by the Government only for the benefit of all. If a doubt could exist that this is the doctrine of the party opposed to the bill under consideration, reference to the journals of 1838 would remove it. I have them before me, and confidently appeal to them to sustain my position.

In this House, July 3, 1838, when the bill from enate to modify the deposite act of 1836 was under consideration—see Journal, page 1226—

"A motion was made by Mr. Campbell of South Carolina that the said bill be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend it, as to provide that the Government deposites shall not be used for banking purposes. A division of the question on this motion was called for by Mr. Stuart, (Whig,) the question to be first put on so much as proposes to commit, and then on the instructions. And on the question, shall the said bill be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means? It passed in the negative, yeas 97, nays 111."

After giving the names of the members who voted for and against the commitment, the Journal, page 1227, adds: "The question on the first member of the motion being decided in the negative, the second member fell of course." Here the very question of giving the use of the public money to the banks was directly made, but could only be voted upon in connection with the question of commitment. By a division of the question, which was demanded by a member of the Opposition, they evaded a direct vote on the main proposition. The journal shows that all the Democrats, except one, voted for the commitment, which was an expression equivalent to refusing the use of the public money to the banks; and the Opposition members, except two, voted against the commitment, which was equally as clear an expression in favor of letting the banks use the public money, and was decisive of the way each party would vote upon the main question, as appeared afterwards.

"And provided also, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the use of the Government deposites for banking purposes;"

The vote stood thus—yeas 101, nays 101.

Those who voted in the affirmative, were:

Messrs. Adams, H. J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Bierne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Bynum, Cambreleng, J. Campbell, Chaney, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, L. Those who voted in the negative, were:

The House being equally divided, the Speaker voted with the yeas, and the question was decided in the affirmative.

In this vote upon the naked proposition, every Democrat but one, was in favor of the amendment and against letting the banks use the public money, and every Opposition member except five was against the amendment, and in favor of permitting the banks to use the public money. These votes clearly show that the Democrats, who support the Sub-Treasury then as now, oppose the use of the public money, for private purposes, and they as clearly show, that the party then, as now, which opposes the Sub-Treasury, is in favor of using the public money for private advantage. I now refer to the same journal to show the extent to which the Opposition are willing the public money shall be used. Page 1225, the following proposition came up, and was voted upon:

"Provided further, That no bank shall be used as a depositary which shall not at all times keep on hand a quantity of specie at least equal to the proportion of one dollar of specie for every three of its liabilities."

And, on the question that the House do agree to this motion, it passed in the negative—yeas 86, nays 114.

Every Democrat except one voting in favor of the amendment, and against the bank issuing more than three dollars in paper for one in specie, and every Opposition member except one, voting against the amendment, and in favor of the banks issuing more than three dollars in paper for one in specie, which they possessed. Page 1228, another proposition of the same character came up, and was voted upon as follows:

"Provided, however, That no bank shall be a depository of the moneys of the Government, which shall not keep in its vaults one dollar in specie to every five of its liabilities."

It passed in the negative—yeas 91, nays 109.

Those who voted in the affirmative were:

"Messrs H. J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hubley, Thomas B. Those who voted in the negative were:

Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, R. S. White. J. White, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke.

On this last proposition, every Democrat, except two, voted in favor of the amendment, and against the banks issuing five dollars in paper for one of specie, in their vaults; and every Opposition member, except six, voted against the amendment, and in favor of allowing the banks, having the public money, to issue more than five dollars in paper for each dollar they held in specie. From these votes it is clear that the Democrats were opposed to bankers using the public money. They are now in favor of the Sub-Treasury bill, which prevents officers, as well as all others, from using it. The same votes show that the Opposition were in favor of bankers using the public money, with the greatest latitude, and are now opposing a law which would prohibit officers and all others from using it for private purposes.

The question involved in these votes is the very same contained in the 17th section of the bill, and in the language of President Van Buren, above quoted: all of which plainly shows that the Opposition here, and their leaders throughout the country, maintain that it is right to allow the money collected for public purposes to be used for private advantage, which is nothing short of taxing the many for the benefit of the few.

There is one other important fact developed in these votes which I will here notice. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARVIN] spent an hour and a half yesterday in examining General Jackson's policy in relation to the deposite banks, and the inducements held out by him and his officers to these institutions to extend their circulation. To these inducements he attributed the suspension of 1837, and claimed that the whole system had resulted as the prominent men of his party had predicted it would. After all this, and when these banks failed to meet the public expectation; and, to use the language of General Jackson, as the member quoted it, when they had turned traitors, and proved themselves as worthless as had been foretold of them, even after all this, these votes show that the Opposition, and the gentleman from New York amongst the number, were willing, in 1838, to give to these same banks the use of the public money. They were even willing, with all this knowledge before them, to go further than had been gone before, and authorize the banks to issue more than five dollars of their paper for every dollar in specie which they held; putting it into the power, and even authorizing the stockholders, out of the people's money, to make more than thirty per cent. per annum, whether they should redeem their own notes or not. This is the relation of the gentleman and his friends to this matter, which he managed with so much address; the result of which, like most of the arguments used against the bill, was not to meet the question directly, but to reflect odium, if any could be created, from Gen. Jackson's administration upon Mr. Van Buren's, and thus, if possible, prejudice the Sub-Treasury. This is a fair specimen of the course of the Opposition here and their leaders elsewhere. How do they stand when the whole matter is examined? And how should it be viewed by the country?

I proceed now to consider the second principle contained in the bill—the kind of money to be received and paid out. And, first the kind to be received: this is defined by the 19th and 22d sections. To avoid any inconvenience which might arise from a sudden change, these sections authorize the revenue, up to certain periods, to be received in certain proportions of gold and silver and the paper of specie paying banks; and after the 30th of June, 1843, require all the public money to be received in gold and silver only, prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury from making any difference in the kind to be received from different sources. In the first place this principle has high precedent for authority. The first Congress that met under the present Government in 1789, in the first law passed relating to the revenue of the Government, made this provision: "SEC. 30. And be it further enacted, that the duties and fees to be collected by virtue of this act, shall be received in gold and silver coin only," and proceeded to fix the value of foreign coins to be received. Here is the opinion and legislation of the framers of the Constitution, many of whom, and the most prominent, were in that Congress. This law was departed from by Mr. Hamilton, who afterwards became Secretary of the Treasury, in direct violation of his duty, which was acquiesced in by the subsequent Congress.

Secondly, gold and silver is the legal currency recognised in the Constitution, and therefore no constitutional objection can be raised to refusing bank paper for public dues. Besides this, it cuts off one powerful means of consolidation and legislative action in the General Government which has been so rapidly increasing. The very moment the General Government authorized the receipt of bank paper for public dues, it became necessary for Congress to be advised of the condition of these institutions; and with it Congress commenced legislating in relation to them. As their numbers and importance increased, legislation increased, until, for more than twenty years, a large portion of the action of the Government has been directed to these institutions. By this, the legislation of Congress is locked to with more interest and importance, than that of the States where the banks are located. This has tended to, and is, rapidly absorbing the States and the power of the people through their own Legislatures; and consolidating the whole into the General Government. By refusing the paper of the State banks you destroy this tendency, and take away the necessity and power of the General Government over them and their business, this leaves them exclusively with the people and the States which created them, as they ought to be. If the banks are the people, as they and their advocates upon this floor claim they are, let the people regulate them through the State Legislatures that chartered them, where they will be more immediately under the control of the people. Let them not now say, the people are unable to control, support, and regulate them. Let them not say that their support and existence depends upon the General Government receiving their paper for its dues. Let them not say that Congress alone can control and regulate them through a great National Bank. Let not the banks claim an advantage which cannot be extended to any other portion of the people of the States, by having the Government receive their paper for its dues; and let them not set at defiance the power of the Legislatures where they exist, and commit treason against their creators, in seeking a regulation from the Federal Government; but let them remain in their proper sphere, upon an equal footing with all other classes of citizens. By this, all improper dependence on the General Government, and influence on its action will be destroyed, and the General Government deprived of the power to injure or improperly influence them.

Thirdly, by receiving gold and silver only, it is that you can effectually prevent one class, the bankers in this country, from using for their own individual gain the public money collected from all other classes. Hence the admission of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] that it was not so material where the money was kept, as the kind in which it was received. All perceive and admit, that if the public money is deposited with banks, bankers can, and do, calculate how much paper they can issue, predicated on those deposites, being liable, however, so far as their responsibility is worth any thing, for the amount deposited. Banks never issue, or circulated, one dollar of their paper, whether they have suspended or not, without receiving interest for it, at not less than six per cent. per annum. Now if the Government receives their paper, the banks get their interest from some quarter, on the amount used by the Government, and have to this extent a greater circulation, and therefore the more gain; and they have the credit which the Government, in receiving their paper, gives to their institutions, to still further increase their circulation. In addition to these advantages, and perhaps greater than all, bankers can calculate, with the same certainty, the amount of their paper which will be used by the Government, in any given period, as the Government can, how much it will receive, and for the amount used by the Government, they know they will not be run upon; therefore the amount used by the Government becomes to the banks a predicate or basis on which they can increase their issues, precisely as they could upon the same amount actually deposited; with this additional advantage, that there is no liability for deposites. Here you have at once the reason why the whole banking interest of the country, is opposed to the Sub Treasury. All the banks, whether you have a great National Bank or not, are alike interested and affected, by having the revenue received in bank paper instead of gold and silver. And it is equally clear that you cannot effectually prevent banks from reaping private advantage from the public money, without receiving gold and silver only.

Fifthly, it leaves the Government in the same situation as the citizen, in not being compelled to receive any kind of money, which may be offered, or which those with whom it transacts business may choose to put upon it. Would any man agree, that the constitutional provision which makes nothing but gold and silver a legal tender, should be taken away and leave him at the mercy of those with whom he deals, to be compelled to receive just such money as might be offered, without any power or discretion to refuse or to demand a different or better kind? No one would; and the absence of this provision, and of the discretion with which it invests one man as well as another, would be the end of all credit and internal commerce in this country. This right can be regarded or not by the citizen in each particular case, in his dealings; he may or may or may not demand gold and silver, (and he may of may not receive such money as is offered him) but he cannot be compelled to receive bad money, such as counterfeit paper or coin, nor notes of broken or worthless banks. Not so with the Government; it must act by universal rule or law, and what it receives from one it must receive from all. It cannot determine in each particular case, to accept or refuse, at discretion, what is offered, as the citizen can. Therefore, when you compel the Government to receive paper for its dues, you leave it without that power which the citizen possesses. And whilst it is compelled to receive paper, which may and does become worthless to it, yet it is compelled by the Constitution, if demanded, (and every person drawing money from the Treasury may require it,) to pay out gold and silver only. Now, I ask, is there any man who has so little regard for his country, as to desire to see its Government in a worse condition, as to its contracts and financial concerns, than he would be himself? To obviate this difficulty, as far as possible, when Congress authorized the receipt of paper for public dues, it invested the President and officers of Government with power over the subject, as well whilst the United States Bank was in existence, as under the State bank deposite system, and to that extent removed the control of the Treasury from the Government. For the truth of this, see the resolution of 1816.

Sixthly, it takes away all discretion from the President and his officers in regard to the Treasury of the United States, and cuts off this source of Executive patronage. They can neither alter the kind of money to be received, the place where it is to be kept, nor the class of officers of Government who are to be charged with its custody. It leaves the whole matter exclusively under the control of Congress, which has not been the case since the Government became connected with the first United States Bank in its fiscal operations.

Seventhly, it leaves the Government in complete possession and control of its own means, in war and in peace, without being liable to have its funds influenced by the banks, or rendered unavailable by suspension, as it has heretofore been, and as it was more especially by the suspension of 1837.

Eighthly, it prevents losses to the Government by depreciated bank paper, which, heretofore, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, document No. 10, to this session, has amounted to $34,974,722, an ambunt greater than from any other source, as appears from the statements of Government losses hereafter exhibited.

Ninthly, it will, in connection with the compromise act, which, after 1842, takes away credit from importers, more effectually than any other means protect manufacturers and the country against excessive importations of foreign merchandise, by requiring the importers to provide for paying their duties before they dispose of their goods; and, also, prevent losses to the Government on duty bonds, which has, by the estimate of the President, in his last message, already been greater than from any other source except on bank paper. Next, as to the kind of money to be paid out by the Government; this is defined by the 20th and 21st sections of the bill. This is a new feature, not contained in any law or regulation for disbursing the public money, that has heretofore existed, and must prevent Government officers, agents, and others, from speculating on the Government funds, at the expense of the Government creditor. It enforces now, as a duty, on the Government and its officers, in all cases of paying out money, that which before has only been done when imperatively demanded. It returns to the people again for circulation the same kind of currency which has been collected from them; and as every contractor or officer of the Government receives his dues in gold and silver, every other citizen dealing with them will have a right to expect and receive the same kind of pay in return; and thus it sends back into circulation, amongst the people, the same kind of currency which has been collected from them. Why this should be an objection, it seems hard to perceive.

I proceed now to examine the third principle of the bill—the places or locations where the public money shall be deposited, and under whose immediate control.

First, the places of deposite. They are fixed by the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th sections of the bill at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, and New Orleans, the greatest commercial points in the Union, where the greatest amount of money is received into the Treasury from duties; and at St. Louis—the central and most convenient point to all the States, where money is received from public lands, together with Washington City, the seat of Government.

These places are most convenient for receiving and paying out for every section of the country. By this arrangement of location, it can never become necessary to transfer very large sums of the public money from one section of the Union to the other. To illustrate this, all the money received from public lands will be needed and paid out in the Western States; and hence St. Louis, for the convenience of all those States, is the most central and proper; and so of all the other points or places fixed by the bill.

Secondly, the persons under whose immediate control the public money shall be kept. These are pointed out by the 6th, 9th, 10th, and 11th, sections of the bill; and they make every officer receiving public money, whether one dollar or millions, the moment it comes in his possession, chargeable with it as public funds alone, distinct and separate from his own private means, and as such, whilst it remains in his custody, to be retained by him as public money only. It makes another set of officers, seven in number, (three of whom already exist, and four to be appointed,) the keepers of the money at the Treasury of the United States, (and each of the other points or locations fixed by the bill,) from the time it is received, until it is paid out. It would be difficult if we were disposed to look at these provisions, free from partisan feelings, to discover objections to them; and yet in nothing have the leaders of the Opposition labored so hard, and perhaps with better success, than in striving to abuse the public mind on this point, and thereby prejudice the whole measure. I am ready to admit that under all Governments, and also, under our own, from its commencement to the present time, losses have been sustained by public officers. But what kind of officers were those? They have been, and are the officers who receive, and the officers who pay out the public money, and not the officers who merely keep it? Can, or does any Government on earth manage its public money, without receiving and disbursing officers; and can ours? Certainly not! England and France, which have been held up by the Opposition as patterns in financial matters, have these officers, although they have their Government banks. And could, or did this Government, dispense with those officers [to receive, and pay out the public money,] when it had a National Bank? It could not, and it did not. Neither of the United States Banks in this country, ever received or paid out the public money. Nor do, or can the Government banks of other countries. This Government from its commencement has always employed its officers, and through them, losses have been sustained, whether a National Bank or a State bank, or neither, kept the public money. To show this, I have prepared the following table from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to this session of Congress, except during three years of the present term, which is made up from the President's message, and other reports of the Secretary of the Treasury.

A TABLE showing the amount of money received and paid out during each Presidential term, and including three years of Mr. Van Buren's administration, exclusive of public debt; the amount lost by receiving and disbursing officers during each term, including three years of Mr. Van Buren's administration; the average number each year of officers employed in receiving and paying out during each term; the average number each year of defaulting officers who received and paid out during each term, and the aggregate ratio of loss per $100 to the aggregate received and paid out during each term, and including three years of Mr Van Buren's term.

I have not been able to show the number of officers employed in receiving and paying out the public money, nor the number who have been defaulters since Mr. Van Buren's administration commenced. But by this table it appears that, although one of the largest defalcations has occurred, through a receiving officer, since 1836, that has probably occurred since the organization of the Government, yet the amount lost in this instance, compared to the whole amount received and paid out, is less than in any other period of the same time, from 1804 up to 1828. It shows that, in every Administration, these officers have been employed; that their numbers have increased, as the amount of money received and paid out increased, and that losses have been sustained through them: and it also shows that the number of receiving and disbursing officers employed, the number of defaulters, and the amounts lost to the Government by them, were as great, and even greater, whilst the Bank of the United States kept the public money, than at any other period, except during the last war with England, when the amount received and paid out required a greater number of disbursing officers before or since.

The same reason has existed during the present Administration (in the Florida war) to increase the number of this class of officers; yet it is said, and I believe truly, that no officer appointed by President Van Buren has defaulted. He who failed to the largest amount (Mr. Swartwout) was appointed collector during the existence of the United States Bank, and some two or three years before the deposites were removed.

It then being the fact that this Government, like all others, has been, and is compelled, whether in connection with banks or not, to have officers who receive, and officers who pay out the public money, is it not unfair to charge failures which have occurred through these officers, to the proposed system, which has not yet become a law? Is it not disingenuous thus to attempt to prejudice and defeat the present bill? All that is said upon the subject by the Opposition, is wide of the question and character of depositories, or officers who merely keep the public money from the time it is received until paid out.

There has been no practice in this Government that approaches so near to this point, and that so fairly illustrates the keeping of the public money by an officer of the Government, selected from amongst the people, as a mere depository, distinct from the character of one who receives, or one who pays out, as that of the Treasurer of the Mint of the United States and its branches. This practice or experiment is favorable to the system proposed by the bill.

The following table, prepared from authentic documents, exhibits the extent of the depository with these officers:

Coinage of the Mint of the United States at Philadelphia, from 1793 to 1840:

Gold - - -	$26,100,782 50
Silver - - -	53,119,571 90
Copper - - -	890,904 19
Total in 47 years,	$80,109,258 59
Being each year	$1,704,452 31.

By this, it appears that, during the period of forty-seven years, the sum of eighty millions one hundred and nine thousand two hundred and fifty-eight dollars and fifty-nine cents, equal to one-sixteenth part of all the money received and paid out by the Government for the same time, has been under the keeping of the treasurer of the mint; and averaging each year the sum of one million seven hundred and four thousand and four hundred and fifty-two dollars and thirty-one cents. This amount has passed through the hands of the treasurer without any defalcation. With this experience, will it be pretended that, from among the mass of American citizens, persons cannot be found, honest and capable to take charge of and safely keep the revenues of the Government from the time it is received until paid out? Or that these men, are not as honest and as capable, as bankers and bank officers, such as cashiers, clerks, and tellers? It seems to me a negative would amount to bold assertion. These, then, are the persons who, by this act, are to have the immediate charge and keeping of the public money, from the time it is received until paid out, instead of placing it in banks. The details necessary to carry out these principles, I will briefly consider, in answering objections to the system.

Having examined the principles of the bill, I now proceed to notice some of the prominent objections urged against it. And first, the one which has been most rung upon by the Opposition, from the very introduction of the measure, is the power it would place in the hands of the Executive, or the union of the sword and purse.

Every Opposition speaker brings in this as an objection. Now it has no existence except in the excited brain of an alarmist; and there is less probability, or even possibility, that it should grow up from this measure, than from the power heretofore vested in the President over the deposites, and in receiving the paper of the banks for public dues. But what has been the course of this party heretofore, when high responsible powers, intimately connected with the sword and purse of the country, were entrusted to the President? When difficulty was expected with England, from the Northeast boundary question, March 2, 1839, a law was passed which continued in force sixty days after the meeting of the present session of Congress. By this law, power was given to the President, virtually to declare war with England; and placed at his command, and under his exclusive control, the whole army, navy, and militia of the United States; and authorized him, in addition to these, to accept 50,000 volunteers, if he deemed them necessary. It also gave him the Treasury of the Government to raise [$10,000,000] ten millions of dollars by any means whatever, so that the interest should not exceed five per cent. and be redeemable after five years. This was uniting the power to declare war with the Treasury and the military force of the country, in the same person, and approached as near to union of sword and purse, as can well be conceived in this Government. Where were these objectors when that law was passed? The first, the greatest, and the most of them, were in this House and the Senate, where they are at present; and by reference to the House Journal, page 688, it will be found that but six of the whole number voted against that law; the others voting in its favor. And by reference to the Senate Journal, page 330, it will be found that not even one opposed it there. In the House, the vote was 197 for, and 6 against this power; in the Senate, 41 in favor, and none against it. Here these objectors who now are so much alarmed at what does not exist, were willing to place upon the records of Congress, to go down to posterity, the evidence of their confidence, that the President would abuse no power, however high, delicate or dangerous, that was entrusted to him. This declaration upon the journals was made at the very time this measure, now under discussion, was before Congress and the country, and when the same alarm had been sounded against it. Now, which should weigh most with the committee and the country—the opinion thus voted under the solemnity of an oath, or the declamation in speeches? The first I should take to be true, and the latter for effect; and both together as a fair specimen of the kind of opposition made to the bill.

Another objection is, that the bill establishes a National Bank. This is a strange one, coming from the quarter it does; for the idols of the Opposition are banks. None, I believe, however, except the gentleman from Massachusets, have attempted to point out in what part of the bill, this bank feature is to be found. He attempted to locate it in the 10th and 11th sections, relating to deposites, drafts, and receipts. The attempt was rather unfavorable for one of his abilities, and served to convince, as a careful examination of those and the other sections will, that no such thing exists. If it does, then every person who deposites his money in his own drawer, or gives a receipt for what is due him, is a banker.

Another objection is the power of transferring and paying by drafts. I have shown that the power over the kinds of funds to be received, and the place of keeping them, is taken from the President and officers of his appointing, and placed exclusively with Congress by the bill. But the use of drafts is indispensable, and has always existed and been exercised, whether one bank, or many, or none were used. And I was the more surprised to hear this objection made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING] who is so very intelligent on all subjects. When the Bank of the United States kept the public money, (as I have shown) you had disbursing officers, and a creditor of the Government could not go to the bank and obtain what he claimed as due, at discretion. Congress then, as now, appropriated the money, requisition was made on the Treasurer, the amount to be paid was audited, and the Secretary directed it to be paid. The Treasury draft was made for the amount, and the person obtained his money at the place directed in the draft or check. Heretofore, and whilst the United States Bank kept the money, these drafts or checks could be negotiated for any length of time, and in some instances were transferred from one to another; but the present law will prevent it. The receipt of District Attorneys and marshals, and certificates of patentees, authorized by the 16th section, are, without any prohibition, to no more negotiable than the certificate expressly prohibited by the 25th section, and a careful examination will dissipate all this attempt at bank-making for effect.

Another objection to the bill is, that it will make one currency for the Government, and another for the people. This objection assumes what Hamilton and his friends desired, and what the opponents of this measure are at least willing, if not anxious to admit, that the Government is one thing, and the people another; or, in other words, a strong Government, in which the power is far removed from the people. Now such is not the nature of the Government. It is of the people, for the people, and with the people; and has no existence or separation from them and their interest, and can have none. It receives its money from the people, and pays it to the people. It is every day receiving from, and every day paying back to them, and by this bill will be compelled to pay in the identical kind of money received. This objection is a perversion of fact, and seems to conceal one most important feature of the banking operation, which always made one kind of currency for commerce, and another for circulation among the people. When did the day laborer, mechanic, artisan, or farmer, receive any thing else, in his ordinary dealings, than paper of the State banks—$1, $2, $3, and $5, with occasionally a $10 or $20 bill? Never since the existence of the Bank of the United States in 1816; and when was this kind of bills used for commercial purposes? Never, and never can be. Even the merchants in the country, in the towns, or in the cities, who retail goods, and receive from the laborer and the farmer this kind of money, will not carry it with him any distance to buy goods, but exchange or transfer it in some way for drafts, checks, or better funds of some kind. This is effectually one kind of money for the great portion of the people, and another for that portion who are engaged in commerce. This has been, and is the greatest evil of the banking system in this country. By it credit has been attempted to be carried so far as to run it down to the smallest dealings; and to this end, it has inundated the country with small bills, from the circulation of which banks make their best profits, and have oppressed the least wealthy portion of the people, in every part of the Union.

Another objection is, that by exacting the revenue to be paid in specie, the revenues will be reduced. There is nothing more in this objection than in the others, except it tends to the adjustment of the revenues before 1842. Let it be remembered that at present more than one-half of the imported articles which come from other countries into this, pay no duties: of these, many are articles of luxury, of which the farmer and laborer do not partake so bountifully as others.

Some of those articles should pay duty for the purpose of protecting, so far as protection arises from equal taxation, similar articles, the growth or manufacture of this country, amongst which are silks. The taxing system, since 1816, has been unequal, and has fallen heaviest on the day laborer and farmer, for whom these objectors all at once affect so much sympathy. After the 30th June, 1842, by the compromise act, the taxation will be reduced and equalized—the whole system of the revenue law will be reorganized. In this revision of the laws, duties can be so laid as to operate equally on all, and raise enough for the purposes of Government, and no more, and thereby return to the system adopted from 1789 to 1816.

Another objection is, that the bill enables office-holders to receive gold and silver; and this furnishes one kind of money for them and another for the people. This is like all other objections, without foundation. There never has been, and there cannot be a time, without altering the Constitution, when officers could not demand and have, gold and silver from the Government; and so with all other creditors; but the bill makes it imperative to pay to all, the same kind of money which is received. Who are these office holders? Are they above the people? This objection assumes they are, but the fact is not so. Officers of this Government are selected by, or appointed from amongst the people, and they and their families need support as others do; for money they must pay, and thus they send back into circulation what was received from the Government. If officers could live without eating or wearing, and hoard up their salaries, there might be some grounds for the objection;, but in this country it happens otherwise, and few who are either office holders or office seekers, lay up money by it. They too frequently spend all they receive and need more.

Another objection is, that the system will lock up, and keep from circulation, a large amount of specie, and thus reduce the circulation in the country.

This is like all other objections when exposed. The whole amount which passes through the Government is estimated this year at less than [$28,000,000,] twenty-eight millions. This is received and disbursed quarterly, and only one-fourth of the sum is required every ninety days, which is seven millions of dollars; and if nothing was going out, until the end of the quarter it would be ninety days in gathering, and at the end of that time be thrown out into circulation again. But the fact is, that the money is as constantly going out, as it is coming in, and cannot be kept from circulation even for ninety days, and certainly no longer; if any amount, certainly not more than [$5,000,000] five millions, can at any one time accumulate. And is this to outweigh the much greater objection there should be to giving the public money to be used by individuals for their own advantage? or is it as dangerous to liberty as the principle of taxing three-fourths for the benefit of one-fourth? Again, how does this objection comport with the practice of the banks, that now have and keep locked up from circulation more than one-third of all the specie in the country? The tendency of the objection, like every other, is evident, as well as its futility.

Another objection is, that the public money will not be secured by this system. This is an assertion without proof, for it has been admitted by Opposition gentlemen on this floor, upon other occasions, and is what all know, that the insecurity does not arise whilst the money is in the Treasury, but when it is coming in and going out—in being received and disbursed. That you cannot dispense with officers in these operations, I have shown; and have we greater insecurity from them than if the money was kept in banks? It will not be pretended that officers selected from among the American people may not, and will not, be found as honest and as capable to keep the public money in the same kind of vaults and safes, as banks, and their officers, such as cashiers, clerks, and tellers. Aside from the experience which the country has had from suspensions, by reference to the table, giving the number of banks, &c. it will appear that, from the commencement of the Government, of the whole number of banks, there have been failures, beside suspensions, of one for every seven and a half of their number—amongst these, the Bank of the United States, in 1819 and 1820 and in 1839, being as miserable as any other.

Now, I inquire, whether the same proportion in numbers of any other class of institutes or persons, whether merchants, mechanics, farmers, or professional men, have failed? An examination, I believe, will show that the entire failures amongst the banks, have been greater in proportion to their numbers, than of any other interest, pursuit, or class of persons, and shows that the public money, especially with the experience of the suspension of 1837, is not more safe with banks than with other persons, and meets the objection almost to demonstration, that the public money is at least as safe under the proposed system as it has been, or would be, with one or with many banks.

Another objection is, that it will force the specie out of the country, through commercial operations. This is incorrect. But in connection with the compromise act, after 1842, it will produce precisely the reverse. The credit heretofore allowed to importers, which ends in 1842, and allowing them, when they did pay, to do it in paper, tended greatly to increase the excess of imports. The importer need not make provision for paying his duties, but ordinarily could sell and raise his pay, before the credit on his bonds expired, pay his duties in such paper as he received and balance his account with specie, or other funds for a foreign market.

Thus the importer could raise his means in this country from his goods, whether he was a citizen or a foreigner, and the facility of doing this depended entirely on the amount of paper circulation. After paying his duties in such paper as he received, the balance could be converted into specie to carry with him, if a foreigner, or into something equally good; and if a citizen, to remit to the port from which he shipped. Every dollar thus sent away, took away so much basis of the paper circulation, and if the banks had in circulation three dollars of paper, for one dollar in specie, in their vaults, every dollar taken away in specie, reduced the paper circulation three dollars, because when the specie basis was removed, the paper had nothing on which to rest, and must necessarily be called in; when this operation was going on, it effected the country, as in the last three months of 1839, when there was drawn from this to foreign countries upwards of four millions of dollars, which was so much specie basis, and in the condition of the paper circulation in this country, compelled the banks to contract at least twelve millions, or many of them fail. Under the operation of this system after 1843, the importer will have to provide his duties in specie, before he lands his goods. If a foreigner, he will do this in the country from which he comes; if a citizen, he will do it here; but in either event, the amount of imports will be regulated by the specie basis of the country of each resident, and not by the paper circulation of this; thus, more than any and all other causes together, preventing excessive imports or fluctuations in this country, from commercial operations.

The last objection which I shall notice, is, that this measure is a war upon the banks, destructive to credit, and prostrates commerce, manufactures, agriculture, and labor. This has been much relied upon by the Opposition, and especially by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The objection is got up and urged, by assuming before the committee and the country, that the day laborer, the farmer, and the agriculturist, each depend upon manufactures and commerce—that these last are intimately connected with, and rely upon banks and bank credit—that these institutions, and their means to afford this credit, rest in allowing them a connection and influence with the Government, through the use of its money, in depositing with them or receiving their bills. It presents the relation in which the Opposition in this House, and their leaders throughout the country, place the different classes of interests and people in the United States, and the principles of that party. When analyzed, it amounts to what was asserted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the great paramount interests in this country, are commerce and manufactures, and makes the banks the grand lever which, by the power derived from the use of the public money, moves every thing else: withhold this use, and all is prostrate and lifeless. The error of the objection is in the assumption on which it rests. It is not true that either commerce or manufactures are the paramount interest of this country, or that their true prosperity depends upon the modern system of bank circulation. Where are our day laborers, mechanics, and artisans? Are they not found in the great importing cities, the towns and villages, upon the public works, on every hill, and in every valley of this fertile and variegated land?

And are not these in every country, but more especially in this, they whose productive labor is the nation's wealth? Where are the hardy fishermen upon your rivers and along your coasts, who draw subsistence for themselves and thousands of the human family from the watery element? Where are your woodsmen of the Northern and Eastern States, that furnish materials for your navy, and for export, from the forests. Where is the provision growing interest in the great Valley of the Mississippi, which supplies the deficiency in all other sections of the Union, besides other portions of the world, with the staff of life? Where is the agricultural interest proper, which in Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, and Kentucky, produce tobacco; and, in the more Southern States, vast quantities of cotton, which go abroad to equalize and pay the balance of your imports? Without the culture of cotton and tobacco, you would have nothing, comparatively, to pay or exchange abroad, and your ships remain useless, and your sailors unemployed. Without the provision growers in all sections of the Union, the people would go unfed: and the gold and silver which comes from South America and the West Indies, in return for exports of flour, beef, and pork, from Western Pennsylvania, Western Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, would cease to find its way to the importing cities of Bost, on, New York Philadelphia, and Baltimore, there to constitute, as it now does, the basis of bank issues and of true commercial credit. And without the laboring classes spread over the Union, the importer and manufacturer would have no consumer of their goods, and no source from which to receive their profits.

The above table prepared from the annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, shows the relative interests in this country, so far as exports and bank profits arising from loans and discounts, are concerned.

On examination I think it will be clearly shown, that although the bankers, who are made the pivot in this theory, are growing rich by the millions upon millions annually drawn from the people, yet neither they, nor commerce, nor manufactures, are, or should be, the first interest, either in point of numbers or importance in this country. But, of all others, the laboring and producing classes are, and will be, the greatest. What has been the legislation which this theory has given rise to? More than three-fourths of the action of Congress has been incident to, and a large portion for, it exclusively. On the other hand, where is the legislation for the day laborer? Whilst volume upon volume has been called for, to show the number, condition, and profits of bankers, no single line has yet ever been officially exhibited to this body, to show the number, condition, or wages of laborers. If the same pains had been taken to inform their behalf, as has been for bankers, so that by placing the two side by side, and showing how labor has been raised or depressed, as bank circulation expanded or contracted, the documentary facts would seal the lips of those who now profess so loudly in favor of labor. How has it been with the cotton interests? It is true, within a few years, the other growing interest forced itself upon your regard, when you were pressing your protective system to its utmost tension; but when has the tobacco and provision interests received any legislative protection at your hands? Even the silk-culture, that demands so loudly, has not yet been heard successfully. The laborers, the provision growers, and the agriculturists, have nature's aid in the formation of the country, and may be able to stand without special protection from Congress; but they cannot stand if you continue to legislate against them; and they have a right to expect and to demand that you will not continue to burden and grind them with heavy taxes in the form of duties. This has been the effect of this theory. The same month in which the Bank of the United was chartered in 1816, the taxes, under the name of protection were raised, and went on increasing every few years, until it could be no longer borne by the cotton growing States of the Union; and their resistance led to the compromise act of 1833, which, after 1835, began to operate by slight reduction.

For the purpose of showing the increased taxation and its progress with the Bank of the United States on this assumed theory of protection, I have prepared the following table, with the rate of duty imposed by each tariff since the organization of the Government, on a few articles, of most universal use, and especially by those classes that are said to be dependent on commerce, bankers and manufacturers. [See Table, next column.]

This table shows how the duties have been increased upon the articles given, since the first few years of the Government. It also shows how they have increased with the banking system, and especially since 1816, and great inequality since the departure from that system adopted at the commencement of the Government. It also shows that the heaviest duties are upon the lowest priced articles, and such as are mostly used by the day laborer, mechanic, artisan, farmer, and agriculturist. To bring home to each individual this indirect process of taxation, and to show how it operates, I submit the following examination:

Suppose one yard of cotton shirting or sheeting costs at the factory - -	6 cents
The duty under the act of 1816	6¼ "
Add carriage, &c. at 4 per cent on cost - - -	¼	13 cents
Add the profit of the importer or manufacturer which is always put upon the duty, as well as the original cost, and may be safely estimated at ten per cent. - - -	1¼	14¼
Wholesale dealers' per centage or profit may be safely estimated at five per cent. -	¾	15
Add retailers carriage, profit, &c. which may be safely estimated at fifteen per cent -	2¼	17¼

The average cost to the consumer being, as you have seen, 17¼ cents.

These profits are low and lower than a majority do business at, and yet all perceive that none of these persons lose any thing by the duty, but the last who buys for use. On the contrary each has the same profit on the duty, as on the original value of the article. The importer has more. If he manufactures or buys the artice abroad, and no duty be charged, he would have his profit of ten per cent. on the cost, (6 cents,) and carriage (¼ cent) only; but by charging the duty (6¼ cent) on which he has credit, from 4 to 12 months, without interest, he gets his profit of ten per cent. on it, just as he does on the original cost and carriage, and this without risk or investment.

It is still more advantageous to the home manufacturer, for he pays neither tax nor duty, and yet he sells at the same price, or higher than the importer. Remember the argument, in favor of the duty, is to prevent our manufacturer from being undersold.

What difference do these duties make in the price of articles purchased and used by the consumer? The answer is found in the following examination:

Take the same yard of sheeting or any other kind of cotton goods at its value of - - -	6 cents.
Cost of transportation, 4¼ per cent,	¼ "

as it has been carried on since 1816, is as effectually so, as if such a law was enacted and enforced. I therefore appeal to the candor of all, whether it is not a taxation of more than three fourths of the American people, for the benefit of less than one fourth; and if it is not rank injustice, which, if persevered in, must lead to oppression, or to resistance?

But this system has failed to protect the manufacturing interest of the country. The American people have acquiesced in the different tariffs, and purchased their goods, on which they have paid their taxes to the General Government in the manner I have shown, with a patriotic spirit and belief, that those tariffs were preventing the country from being inundated with British goods, and would enable the American manufacturer to sell at such rates as to prevent his being undersold and broken down by the importer of English fabrics. Such however has not been the fact, as will appear from the following table:

A TABLE Showing the aggregate Imports and Exports of the country under each Tariff. Also, the aggregate excess of Imports consumed over the aggregate Exports of domestic products for each period, from 1816 to 1838 inclusive, and of Gold and Silver from 1828 to 1838, also.

This table is from facts reported to Congress, and tells more truths than any theory can. It is the experience of the past, by which is shown, that under each protective tariff, there was a much larger amount of goods imported from abroad, and consumed in the country, than all its products which were exported or sent out. It also shows that the higher the tariff was raised, the greater was the excess of imports over exports, and the more the country was getting in debt.

The balance in twenty-one years amounts to upwards of $288,000,000; and more than one-half of this accrued under the last protective tariff, and within five years. Add to this the excess of specie imported over what was exported from 1825 to 1838, and deduct from the whole excess the reasonable profit for carrying in American vessels, and the balance against the country, now unpaid, will be found about equal to all the debts of the States. Now, who pays this balance? It must come from the earnings of the laboring classes.

The following brief considerations show why the system has so operated. First, the facility of paying for foreign goods, and effecting exchanges abroad, through the State stocks, in connection with the Bank of the United States, as hereafter shown. Secondly, the credit which has been given to importers for their duties. This credit part of the system has superseded all other restraints laid upon importations, and has been equally disastrous to the Treasury. Through it heavy losses have been sustained by Government, as is shown by the following statement:

Losses of the Government since its organization.

BY OFFICERS.

In receiving and paying out the public money, from 1789 to 1840 - - -		$8,814,318 89
BY CONNECTION WITH BANKS.
In receiving banks notes for Government dues, that depreciated, from 1789 to 1836,	$34,080,000
In depositing with banks, from 1789 to 1836,	974,722
In interest paid by the Government on account of the banks withholding deposites, since October, 1837, - -	542,707
		35,597,429 00
BY IMPORTERS.
On bonds taken for duties, from 1791 to 1840 - - -		28,442,956 67
Aggregate - -		$72 4,704 56

From this it appears that the losses to the Government, on bonds taken for duties, have been three times as great as by defaulting officers, and four-fifths as great as those sustained through banks. A third reason why the system has so signally failed, arises from the profit which the importer made on the duty charged, in connection with the credit allowed him, and the facility of paying in paper currency, as before shown. And a fourth reason, arose from the inflation of the paper circulation of the country. These considerations, I think, show this objection, like most others, better calculated to mislead than to enlighten. And I think I have also shown which is, and must continue to be, the important interest in this country, and that the system of high tariffs which has so signally failed to protect the country against excessive importations, has tended to such heavy and unequal taxation, that it should not be renewed; and that the paper circulation, as used in this country, has not, and cannot, even by giving to the banks the use of the public money, benefit the true commercial and manufacturing interests of the country. In doing so, I desire to be understood distinctly as not opposing the interests of any section of this country; but, on the contrary, as desiring the prosperity of all. But I oppose a system which leads to unequal legislation and oppressive taxation. In the bill now under consideration I see a preventative to such consequences by a system of fiscal operations provided for the Government. I see in it no war upon banks or bankers, but a simple resistance to their encroachments upon the rights of the laboring and producing classes, and a separation of those modern money making institutions, from the Government, and leaving them without any unjust advantages, to the use of their capital for true commercial and manufacturing purposes.

Having examined the principles of the bill under consideration, and the most prominent objections urged against it, I propose now briefly to examine the antagonist system—a Bank of the United States. There now remains no doubt that the Opposition party of this House, and their leaders throughout the country, are in favor of, and will, if they can defeat the present Administration, recharter another Bank, similar to those heretofore tried. Each member has for himself so avowed, and has entered into an examination of the merits of such an institution, in opposition to the present bill.

I shall not, however, now trouble the committee with any examination as to the constitutionality of such an institution, but confine myself to its expediency only.

When the names of great and venerated men, such as Washington and Madison, are introduced as authority in favor of such an institution, I desire the committee, and through them, the American people, to consider the circumstances under which these great and good men acted.

In 1791, under the present Constitution, this Government had a national debt of $75,463,476, which had been incurred in that arduous and protracted struggle of the Revolution, which resulted so gloriously in our independence. This debt had to be provided for; embarrassment and distress met the infant Government at its very inception, and taxed the ingenuity and patriotism of those who had persevered in the mighty conflict, and were still determined to struggle into greater political existence. Of these, no man had felt or suffered more than General Washington, and none more fervently desired to see the new born Constitution rise and live above the difficulties that had brought it into existence. The resources of the country were restricted, and the process of raising money for relief, by sales of the public lands, with the majority was deemed too slow, and a National Bank, in principles similar to the Bank of England, was the resort.

On the 25th of February, 1791, General Washington, after great deliberation, in which, no doubt, the embarrassed condition of his beloved country passed in anxious review, signed the charter for the first Bank of the United States. Its capital was $10,000,000, one-fourth of which was required (but was not done) to be paid in specie, and three-fourths in the national debt. The paper issued by the bank was received for public dues, and the money of the Government was deposited with it. Thus, the debt which the country owed, constituted three-fourths of the capital of the bank; on which the interest continued to run, but which became a basis for the issue of paper money. By this the Government had a means of borrowing paper money, which was increased through the bank, and was relieved from the immediate payment of that amount of the public debt which became bank capital. The creditor or holder of the Government debt continued to draw interest as before, and had the power to issue paper upon it, with the additional use of the public money. This was a most advantageous system to the stockholders, but afforded to the Government that temporary relief which it so much needed.

The charter of this bank expired March the 4th, 1811. At this time the resources of the country were greatly developed—the national debt much reduced—the Government relieved from its consequent embarrassment, and Congress, by the voice of the country, refused to recharter the institution. In 1812, the second war with Great Britain was declared, whilst Mr. Madison, another one of those great and good men whose memories Americans venerate, was President. This second struggle for independence increased the national debt, $68,574,764; and in 1816, the Government found itself again pressed down with the sum of $123,639,692. Mr. Madison found his country then, in precisely the same situation, that General Washington did in 1791, and from similar causes. The public lands had begun to fetch in some revenue, but still insufficient to meet the wants of the Government.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Madison signed the charter for the second bank, April 10, 1816. The capital of this bank, was $35,000,000; of which one-fifth was required in specie, and four-fifths authorized to be paid in the national debt, upon the same principles of the first bank; and like it operated to give the temporary relief so much needed. From these facts as they are recorded in the history of this country, and found in Congressional documents, I ask the committee, and through it the American people, to remember, first, that neither of these banks was chartered until the Government was loaded with debt. I ask that it may also be remembered that neither England nor France, that have been held up to us as patterns, nor any other Government on earth, ever created a National Bank, without first having a heavy national debt. Secondly, that the debt of this Government in both instances constituted much the largest part of the capital of those institutions; such has been the case in England, France, and all other countries having National Banks. Thirdly, that this Government now has no such debt. It has virtually none. Its nominal debt cannot amount to $5,000,000, and probably not exceed two millions; and this arising from the suspension of the banks in 1837, and depositing the surplus revenue with the Sates. Now is it doing justice to the memories of Washington and Madison, the tenor of whose opinions throughout were in opposition to the banking system, to say, or suppose, if they were now present under such different and more favorble circumstances than those of 1791, and 1816, that either would be in favor of creating another National Bank; or that either would be willing to plunge this Government into a much larger debt than it has ever owed, for the purpose of making a greater bank capital than any that has heretofore existed? I think such assumptions an abuse of the memories of those great men. I have shown the system of taxation under different tariffs from the time the Bank was created, and the manner by which it and the other banks profited by the use of the public money, and will now examine what effect was produced upon commerce, manufactures, produce, labor, and the currency during its existence. For this purpose I have prepared the following table from the report of a committee appointed by this House to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank, made in 1832.

This table shows the regular system with which the Bank extracted specie, and concentrated it in its own vaults, or sent it abroad—that this extraction was from the producing, and more especially, the provision growing sections of the Union. The amount drawn from New Orleans evinces this. During the same time, in addition to the amount drawn from that place, the Bank exported from thence, direct to England and France, an additional sum of $947,325, making the whole amount drawn from that port nearly equal to two-thirds of the whole amount which it gathered in eleven years.

I have before shown what proportion of the specie which comes into this country, arrived at the port of New Orleans. By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1839, it amounted to $2,178,348, nearly one-third of all that came into the United States, in other years, but which will be much more this and the succeeding year. Of this, the largest portion was from South America and the West Indies, in exchange for provisions. This was the case during the existence of the Bank, and must continue to be. This specie would naturally, if uninterrupted by paper issues, find its way, as much of it does now, to the sources where flour, bacon, and beef are raised, in Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Ohio, Western Virginia, and the western part of Pennsylvania. There it would constitute the circulation, pay for the public lands, and be a basis for true commercial credit, and find its way into other sections of the Union, in return for the merchandise consumed in the Great Valley of the Mississippi, where it would again perform the same offices. But, by the Bank of the United States and the State banks, inflating the paper circulation, the specie was kept out of view, by which the Bank was enabled to draw from New Orleans, Kentucky, Ohio, and Pittsburg, such large amounts. It shows, also, the rapid increase, until it had amounted to more in each of the two last years, than is estimated to be received from the sale of public lands this year.

Whilst this process was regularly carried on by the Bank, the taxing power was also going on; and how did the paper of the State banks stand with this institution? It will be seen by the following table, prepared from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to Congress in 1838.

Price paid by the United States Bank at Philadelphia, for gold and silver - - -	1	1	1	1	1	2	2	2	2	5	5

This table shows how the Bank of the United States influenced the paper circulation of the States. The depreciation of the paper of the best State banks, and in the same sections of the Union from which it drew such large amounts of specie, is conclusive as to the way in which it regulated the currency. It proves that the paper of the Bank was the standard by which all the paper was tried, and that when the Bank had somewhat recovered from its difficulties in 1820, &c. after 1824, it kept receiving gold and silver as it increased the quantity drawn from the States. These two facts, prove conclusively the demand it had for specie, and that its paper was gradually sinking below the value of gold and silver, until, in 1831, it was five per cent. Add this difference between gold and silver and the paper of the Bank, to the difference between the paper of the Bank of the United States and the State banks, and you have, as in the last column, the true discount of the paper of the State banks from gold and silver, in 1831, at the counter of the great regulator. This was the condition of things, in the most prosperous existence of the Bank, and before the public deposites were removed.

What was the price of produce during these Bank operations? I refer to the following statement for an answer:

This statement is furnished from two of the oldest milling establishments in Ohio, and taken in connection with the taxing system above shown, exhibits the situation of the farming interest, whilst the Bank of the United States was carrying on its operations, even to the time the deposites were removed. Wheat being the great staple, the above table, with the following, show pretty fairly the relative value of all other kinds of produce and provisions in different parts of the Union. From these the wages of labor may be fairly inferred, as they invariably go together.

These exhibits not only show the prices of produce from 1820 to 1840, but they fix the basis on which to ascertain the price of labor, which was during the first ten years of the period, equally low.

If proof, beyond the recollection of those now living, were necessary, the following extract from a speech of the Hon. Henry Clay, in 1824, is sufficient, at least with the Opposition, who now have so much care on this subject.

Niles's Register, vol. 26, pages 378 and 387:

"In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention, and challenges our deepest regret, is the general distress which pervades the whole country.

"The truth is, that no class of society suffers more in the present staguation of business, than the laboring class. That is a necessary effect of the depression of agriculture, the principal business of the community. The wages of able bodied men vary from five to eight dollars per month; and such has been the the want of employment, in some parts of the Union, that instances have not been unfrequent of men working merely for the means of present subsistence. If the wages for labor here and in England are compared, they will be found not to be essentially different."

The following additional extracts from the same authority, add to the testimony on this subject, and show also the depressed and miserable condition of commerce and manufactures:

Extract from Niles' Register, June 19th, 1819. Bound vol. 16, page 273.

"OUR MANUFATORIES.—We hear of the shutting up of several large manufacturing establishments. It is probable that during the present summer not less than 15,000 persons, and it may be many more, who subsisted by employment in those establishments, in addition to the great numbers already discharged, will be thrown from the productive into the consuming classes of the people. The political economist will rstimate the effect of this on the national wealth."

Same volume, pages 356 and 357, July 24th, 1819.

"WANT OF EMPLOYMENT.—The greatest evil to be deprecated in the present deranged state of things, will be the dead loss incurred by casting many thousands of productive persons into the consuming classes of the people. Most of our manufactories have stopped or are about to stop, and every branch of mechanical industry is reduced from one-third to one-half of its recent amount: the first, by the great sacrifice that is made of imported goods, by bankrupt owners in England or bankrupt importers here to raise money to riot upon until their accounts with their creditors are settled 'according to law'—the effect on the others is produced by the sudden stoppage of the circulation of money, in consequence of the frauds committed in banks, and the jealousy and fear which these institutions have of one another; powerfully assisted, too, by the apparent determination of the United States Bank to eat up all the State banks, immediately."

Same volume, page 274, June 19th, 1819.

"BANKING.—We have prepared a pretty long article on the 'equalization of exchange,' as now practically felt by the operations of the Bank of the United States, in refusing to issue its own notes; of which, a little while ago, enough could not be signed to fill up the currency, and about which Congress was petitioned, &c. But such things must be expected! 'We have fallen on evil times.' We think we shall be able to show that by a procedure like this, the bank is really invested with a more dangerous and destructive power than many of its most inveterate enemies expected. May it not be a new speculation United States Bank stock at Philadelphia, June 15th, in the market at 91 1-2; 90 1-2 offered—no sales."

Same volume, page 417, August 21st, 1819.

"Never did an institution exist that more completely blasted the public expectation, than this bank has done. Its policy, though founded upon onposite extremes, has been equally mischievous or malevolent. The original purpose of its framers was to get money—the object of its present managers is to acquire power. The former was a desperate set of speculators—the other is a conclave of tyrants. Gold was the god that the first worshipped—the second gives up all to ambition. Cæsar or nothing, is the device inscribed on the entrance of their council chamber."

"Certain facts have just reached me from a source in which I have as much confidence as if the confession were made by the Secretary of the Treasury to me in person, that the Treasury of the United States is already in a subservient condition to the bank. In April last the bank resolved that it would not receive of Government its own bills, and credit them as cash, except when tendered at the places at which they were payable; that it would not pay the Treasury drafts at any place 'required,' except the public moneys had accumulated there to a sufficient amount, unless upon a notice given to allow the bank time to do so, on commercial principles, &c. To which the Secretary submitted.

"Every body knows and feels the grand deception of this institution, as to its pretension to furnish a circulating medium of an equal and certain value in all parts of the United States; but things like the preceding, in regard to the Government, were hardly expected by any one so soon."

Report of the Bank Committee 1832, pages 16 and 18.

"The committee feel it their duty now to give their views as to the cause of the present distress in the trading community, and which they fear may greatly increase. It is an acknowledged principle that like causes in all cases, produced like effects; and as in 1818, contraction followed the expansion of 1817 and 1818, so by the same rule, must contraction follow the immense expansion of 1830 and 1831, and like effects and consequences succeed.

* * * * * * * *

"The committee believe that the cause of operations by the bank, during the years 1830 and 1831 have been nearly of a similar character to those of the years 1817 and 1818."

Almost at the same time, with the Bank of the United States, commenced the internal improvement spirit, which, during Mr. Adams's administration, received a new impetus, that was only checked on the part of the Federal Government by General Jackson's veto on the Maysville road bill.

This did not effect the States; and most of them continued to carry on the system, by raising money on the credit of their stocks. To this I oppose no objection whilst kept within the means of the State. But the system was persevered in until, for this and banking, most of the States now find themselves largely in debt, as appears from the following table:

The stocks on which these debts were predicated, during the period of the above fluctuations, mostly passed under the control of the Bank of the United States, and to that extent enabled it, as a vacuum was created by the payment of the national debt, to fill it up by sending those stocks abroad, principally to England; until, with what have since been contracted, nearly the whole of the State debts are held by English bankers and brokers, and are supposed to amount to nearly $200,000,000. This operation has had a threefold effect First, in stimulating to excessive importation, through the facility it afforded for payments and exchanges abroad, as is evident from examining the periods and amounts in the table of exports, and the table of loans. Secondly, by increasing the paper circulation in the country, predicated on the money and credit obtained abroad, through the State stocks. And thirdly, in keeping up the credit of the United States Bank, and uniting it and the State banks, (in the language of Mr. Biddle) "by a bond of sympathy" in one common interest; and now, in all their operations, conspiring to the present state of things, precisely as the Bank of the United States did from 1817 to 1820. This conclusion is sustained by the following data: [See Table *]

Now, if it be true, as proved, that the operations of the United States Bank, by increasing its circulation in 1817 and 1818, and calling it back in 1819 and 1820, produced the embarrassment and distress that followed; and if it be true that like causes produce like effects, is it not demonstrated by the above table that the operations of all the banks, in issuing and loaning so much greater amounts, from 1835 to 1837, and from 1837 to 1840, calling in still more of their circulation and loans than it did, have produced the present embarrassment and distress in the country? The relative time of contraction to the time of expansion, in each case, and the proportions which the aggregate increase and decrease of loans and circulation bear to each other, at the respective periods, leave no room for doubt. But there is additional evidence,

A STATEMENT of the excess of imports consumed in the country above the exports of domestic products, taken from it in consequence of the bank expansions of 1817 and 1818, and of 1835 and 1836.

These tables show that, commencing with the expansions of the Bank in 1817, in three years, there had been brought into this country and consumed, goods from other parts of the world, above all that was produced and sent abroad, upwards of fifty-seven millions of dollars—an amount which had accrued in three years against this country equal to more than three-fourths of the whole sum spent in the last war with Great Britain. This balance against us had to be paid, and you perceive from the table, that immediately after, and in the midst of the distress of our people, all the gold and silver which came into the country was carried out, and of what was in the country before, more than nine millions, in addition, being three times as great as all the specie held by the Bank at any one time during that period. Precisely so it has been, commencing with the expansion of all the banks in 1835. In three years the imports into the country exceeded the exports from it upwards of one hundred and thirteen millions of dollars; and as the expansion of all the banks was greater than that of the Bank of the United States, so the excess against us in the last three years is much larger than the excess of the first three. Thus the country, at the commencement of 1838, had a balance against it in amount nearly equal to the whole national debt in 1816; and as in the first instance, so in the last—the gold and silver began to go abroad; and in 1839 all that came in went out, with an additional sum of nearly eight millions—equal to one-eighth of the estimated amount of all the specie in the country. This drain is still going on, and must continue through this year and perhaps next, unless our exports shall exceed our imports, as was the case in 1821.

High tariffs could not prevent this excess, as I have shown, but increased issues of bank paper induced them; and when the country is in debt, it must pay. This produces distress. The operation to the whole country is precisely as it would be to an individual. Pursuing this subject still further, the following table shows that the banks have caused the present low prices for produce, and low wages for labor, by calling in their loans and paper.

The price of flour is taken from an Opposition paper in Cincinnati, Ohio, and the contractions, from the monthly returns of the banks, made pursuant to law. The statement shows that as the banks called in their paper, and reduced the circulation, the price of flour, which is always a fair average of other kinds of produce, and of labor, continued to fall; until, at the end of eleven months, the paper circulation in the State was reduced nearly one-half, and the price of flour in the same proportion, even to a fraction. From this, and other examinations I have made, I have no doubt, if the inquiry was carried out, the same results would be found in all the other States. This is fairly indicated by the last columns of the table, showing the prices of produce in 1821 and 1840. Under these circumstances, it is now proposed by the Opposition to renew the system, by creating another bank, with larger capital than the last; to do which it is necessary, and is proposed, to have a national debt, equal in magnitude to the proposed Bank. This debt is to be created by the Federal Government assuming the State debts, and becoming paymaster to the British bankers, who hold them.

Cut off the only source from which the Government receives money into its Treasury, without taxing the people, by giving away the public lands, and this will necessarily require more money to be collected from the people, either by direct taxation or equally odious discriminating duties. The first open avowal of this whole scheme of the party opposing the Sub-Treasury in this House, is found in the journals of the present session, page 222, January the 18th, 1840:

"Mr. GENTRY gave notice that he should to-morrow, or on the earliest opportunity which presented itself, ask leave to bring in a bill providing for the assumption of certain debts of the States, and for the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands for the payment thereof."

This proposition comes from a gentleman of acknowledge ability, from the State of Tennessee, and one who deservedly stands high with his party.

Again, on the journals, pages 541 and 542, the following motion will be found, which was made by a member who has been some years in Congress, and may be considered a leader of the Opposition in this House:

"The States were now called for resolutions, commencing with Kentucky.

"Mr. POPE moved the following:

"Resolved, That it is necessary and proper to establish a National Bank, with a capital of seventy millions of dollars, to aid the fiscal operations of the Government, revive the foreign and domestic trade and business of the country, restore public and private confidence and credit, put into active and brisk circulation the moneyed capital of the nation, and thereby invigorate all branches of business and industry, give employment to the laboring classes at fair wages in good money, relieve the people from the heavy burden of taxes now imposed on them by the present deranged condition of the exchanges and bank paper, reform the existing disorders in the currency, and secure to the nation a stable and uniform standard of value by excluding a spurious and ruinous paper currency from circulation, and to prepare in part the pecuniary means of war; ten millions of the capital to be reserved for the United States; at least one-half of the residue of the capital to be allotted to the States, and divided among them according to their representation in Congress, and the residue of the stock to be subscribed by American citizens and corporations, under proper rules and restrictions, who shall pay into the Treasury of the United States a premium of —— dollars on every hundred shares of stock subscribed; one or more braches to be established in each State now existing, or which may hereafter be admitted into the Union; the interest on loans by the Bank not to exceed six per cent. for the first five years, and after the expiration of five years the said Bank is not to take more than five per cent.; no note to be issued by the Bank of a less denomination than five dollars; after five years the bank shall not issue any note of a less denomination than ten dollars, and after the expiration of ten years the bank not to issue any note of a less denomination than twenty dollars. No foreigner shall be a director or vote for a director in said bank. Each State in which a branch shall be located, shall have the appointment of one director in such branch, besides its due participation in the general election of directors. The deposites of the public money to be made in the said bank, to be disbursed as may be required and provided for. The bank, on reasonable notice, to lend to the Government any sum not exceeding ten millions without the consent of both parties. The bank never to suspend specie payments without the consent of Congress, and never to have notes in circulation exceeding twice the amount of specie in its vaults.

Resolved, That to aid the public credit and finances of the several States, and the better to enable them to take the proportion of bank stock allotted them in the first resolution, the proceeds of the public lands, to be received after the first day of January next, ought to be distributed among them according to the representation of each in Congress after the next apportionment of representation—one half of the land fund paid to each State to be vested and pledged for the support of common schools, and the other half for internal improvements and such other purposes as the States respectively may direct.

Mr. STANLY moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. EVERETT made the question of consideration, and under that motion the resolution, according to a rule of the House, lies over."

The whole system is here developed; and the objects which are to be effected by it, are those which I have shown neither tariff nor bank has ever yet been able to do. It assumes to relieve the people from embarrassment and taxation; but instead of these, will increase both. A few brief reflections will prove this.

The State debts which are proposed to be assumed, as shown by the above table, to be more in amount than any former debt owed by this Government, and the interest on it at five per cent. which is rather below the average, would amount to - - - - - $10,000,000

This sum would be required in gold and silver, to pay the interest, which has to be done every six months, and added to the appropriations made this year - - -	22,750,000

Which, if not annually hereafter increased, would make the sum of	$33,750,000
Thus you see the necessary appropriations run up nearly one-half every year without paying any part of the debt. You have given away your public lands, from which nearly one-fourth of the money is estimated to be received at present, and the whole amount that could be calculated upon to meet this heavy appropriation would be - - -	15,100,000
Leaving an amount to be raised of	$18,650,000

This sum, equal to what is already received, must be raised, and as the public lands are gone, it can only be raised from the people; this can only be done by levying a direct tax; or indirectly, by laying high duties, under the tariff system. This is the only alternative, and the tariff will be the resort. To meet the demands of the Government it will of necessity be one hundred per cent. higher than at present. Here will be, then, a renewal of all that I have been describing. Instead of little or no national debt, as at present, the country would be loaded with upwards of two hundred millions; instead of reduced taxes through duties, higher taxes from tariffs than have ever been collected; instead of the Sub-Treasury, a National Bank with a capital composed of national debt; and instead of having the public money used for public purposes alone, it will be deposited with and used by bankers; and the whole system ends in completing what its principles tend to, taxing the many for the benefit of the few. Against this I oppose my vote in favor of the Sub-Treasury.

SPEECH OF MR. COOPER,

OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, June , 1840—

On the bill to establish an Independent Treasury.

Mr. COOPER said: I rejoice, Mr. Speaker, that an opportunity is at length afforded me to assign the reasons why I support this measure. Convinced of its propriety and rectitude before it was recommended by the present Administration, I have watched its progress before the country, in the hands of the present rulers, with immense solicitude. I look on it as involving directly an issue between the people and the bank corporations of the country; whether the former shall keep their money, so as at all times to use it without danger of detriment to themselves, or whether the banks, by keeping and possessing it, shall dictate to the country the time, as well as the mode and manner, of using the public money?

This is an inquiry of vast moment. On its decision depends the future characteristics of our Government. By the adoption of this bill, it may retain the form and substance of a Republic; by the adverse policy, it may for a time preserve the outward appearances, but in reality it will soon become an unlimited consolidation of powers.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just taken his seat,[Mr. BIDDLE,] always eloquent, promised us in the outset he would offer something for us, not for his constituents, and would address our understandings, not our prejudices. This promise from one so competent to fulfil it, was a pledge that we should receive light and instruction. It therefore gave me pleasure. In the discharge of this obligation, however, he has been unmindful of his duty under it, or else has placed an estimate on the good sense of members, by no means flattering to them. A very large proportion of his speech was devoted to eloquent declamation, on points secondary to the questions at issue. The apology for this may be that his distinguished colleague from Philadelphia, [Mr. SERGEANT,] who preceded him in an able and very elaborate manner, covered the whole ground of argument.

Two questions, however, were asked by the first named gentleman [Mr. BIDDLE] very pertinent, pointing to the merits of this bill.

1st. "When you have gotten the specie into the Treasury, how (he asked) is it ever to come out," since the paper circulation will be less valuable?

2d. "When, by this operation, the paper medium shall be discredited, how are you to restore its credit?" These I will, in the sequel, endeavor to answer.

Besides these questions the main topics of this gentlemaa's remarks were the State banks, and a defence of the administration of the late United States Bank. These points, too, shall receive attention from me.

Before I proceed, sir, I must ask permission of the committee to digress for a moment or two, to touch a matter connected with this measure, but somewhat personal to myself and colleagues. I have postponed an expression of my opinions on this measure longer than I should have done, for the following reason:

When the present delegation from Georgia took their seats in Congress, they were affiliated members of one political family. We then differed, as we still do, on this measure. By consent, our friends at home agreed it should not be cause of quarrel or mutual crimination; but that either should carry out his views in the most consistent and conscientious way.

In the progress of a faithful discgarge of these obligations to the country, and to those who sent us here, we have found it indispensable to differ in the choice of the men who shall be used to carry out our respective views.

On us who advocate the Sub-Treasury, the necessity of choosing a Democrat, became as imperious as that which commanded my colleagues, who opposed that measure, to elect a Whig and a bank man. This I foresaw before I came here. It was known that every Whig was opposed to the Indedendent Treasury, and the party as a body were advocates of the bank system; that system which the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. SERGEANT] has so truly and successfully traced to Alexander Hamilton, and which the same gentleman so triumphantly and so boldly announced as Hamilton's favorite scheme.

Would you expect me to fee the bank note engraver to shoe my horse? To ask a blind man to distinguish between the fixed stars and the planets; to invite the moon to shine without the sun, or to apply at midnight for the light of noon day? If I should act thus, would you not justly say, that man is either a fool or a knave?

Sir, so long as my colleagues desire to oppose this measure and take a United State Bank in preference, equally foolish would they act to take a Democrat to do the work.

Foreseeing all this, I told my constituents before they elected me, what rule would govern me, and that this rule would make it my duty and their interest to elect "Van Buren in preference to Clay or Webster; and that as for Harrison he could not be thought of under any circumstances."

I appeal to my colleagues whether I have not stated truly. Having truly stated, I appeal, sir, to this committee in proof that in what I have done and said here, I have said and done neither more nor less than I proposed to do before my election.

My colleagues and myself, at this very moment, have the same difference in reality which we brought with us here. If there be any difference now, which did not then exist, it is as to men, not as to measures. From this remark, I ought to except two of the six, who are opposed to this measure. Those two have now a difference from me in regard to it, which did not then appear. But I have not changed.

In regard to our opinions of parties also, the same two agreed with me once in that wherein we now disagree. We then thought it would not do to amalgamate with the Whigs. On this point we now differ. I have not changed. In regard to men, I thought and said it would be better to choose Van Buren rather than Harrison. All my colleagues thought, and so said the party, that they would vote neither for Harrison nor Van Buren. Six of my colleagues now think they will vote for Harrison. They have changed, not I.

So that, whether in reference to measures or men, I have not changed, whilst six of my colleagues have changed, either as to men or measures.

Here, then, is my apology for this digression. At a recent convention of those who claimed to represent the party whose nominees we all were, it was thought advisable to proscribe that portion of their delegation who are now advocating this measure. I have searched in vain for the political grounds on which, consistently with their former action, it has been done. I grant their right to make this measure now a test, though not so made heretofore. But in doing it, they cannot escape from the conclusion, that it will be because they oppose it, and desire a bank. I know there are some who do not desire a bank, and prefer even this measure to a bank; and yet, by force of party prejudice, join in the proscription. Against such, and such alone, with justice, I complain.

Against those who desire a bank, we have only this complaint, that they have subverted the ancient policy of the party, and are sending it adrift into the broad channel of Federalism, swiftly pursuing the great idol of Alexander Hamilton; and whilst they worship at this idol's shrine, they are bringing up to the altar, as a sacrifice and peace offering, every vestige of State rights: but, before doing it, they will have rung the death knell of the party, and to the grave have consigned its remains.

A difference, then, on this measure and its necessary incidents, has separated the present delegation from Geeorgia. Feeling it to be a mournful occasion, I have waited to the last hour, in hopes that those who differ from us would give me the benefit of their views, that I might make available that last hour, as a day of repentence.

But notwithstanding two of us have given them our reasons for supporting this bill, and I have privately requested them to answer our arguments and give us their own, they decline to do so, and seem content to see us go forth in our way without an effort to convince us. Sir, my own opinions are my guide, but I hold no opinion too sacred to be yielded up to the force of truth and reason.

[Mr. ALFORD here interrupted Mr. COOPER, and asked him to yield the floor for a short time, and he would briefly state for his benefit his reasons for opposing the bill. Mr. COOPER, through courtesy to his colleague, consented. Mr. ALFORD then occupied the floor for two hours. After he closed, Mr. COOPER resumed as follows:]

Mr. Chairman, I would be greatly obliged to my colleage, who just spoke, for the use of his lungs.

When I made the digression, sir, I had referred to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] and to the very able argument of the distinguised member from Philadelphia. To both I shall try to refer a few times more. I will now proceed, without further liberty to depart, and discuss the merits of the bill before the committee.

An honorable member has said he was at a loss to know whether he understood the subject and nature of this measure, because of the differing views of members as to its effect and operation.

The objects I have in view, which commend the bill to my support, may be reduced to two.

First. A limitation of the revenue to the economical wants of this Government.

Second. To keep the Executive and Legislative Departments within their limits, as defined and prescribed by the Constitution, both in regard to the nature and purpose of its policy and powers.

I am not so sanguine as to expect this single measure will guaranty these results, in defiance of a wilful propensity to pervert, common to all parties. This would be, by the potent energies of a single proposition, to make this Government all that our forefathers desired and its enemies deprecated. No, I should be a perfect enthusiast, and overlook all the frailties of our nature. No measure you can adopt, however potent or conservative, possesses such sanative properties. The yearly perversions of our invaluable Constitution, so plainly written and fully expounded, warns me against the disappointment that might follow such anticipations of bliss.

My brightest hopes are, that this measure, honestly and faithfully administered, and untrammelled by obstacles unnecessarily and wilfully interposed by those opposed to it, will, by its legitimate operation, tend at all times to secure these two great objects; whilst every antagonist policy will render their attainment less and less hopeful, and will be productive of evil, and that continually.

This policy is not only the most effectual to limit the revenue and avoid a surplus; but—

It will operate to diminish the indirect patronage of the Executive, without increasing the direct. The former is more to be dreaded than the latter, because it is more hidden and less understood.

The bill supersedes the agency of all banks, and keeps the Government funds at command of the people's Representatives, to be used when they order it, without danger of a spasmodic effect on the currency.

It will tend to make the paper money sounder, by removing from the banks the pretext or most fruitful cause of irredeemable issues; consequently to that extent it will prevent convulsions in money matters, changes in the relations of property and its owners, and will produce more uniformity in prices, and soundness of pay to labor and its products.

It cannot injure any of the State banks, because it can only take and withhold from them what is not theirs, and deny them the power of abusing what they ought never to use—the public money. For the same reason it can never injure the prudent and honest merchant or trader of any description.

The benefits of this measure are not addressed peculiarly to any leading interest whatever. They are to be diffused more especially amongst the planters, the farmers, the day laborers, and mechanics; because the permanent circulation rests habitually in their pockets. Every loss on it is their loss, and the saving of a loss is their gain. Whatever, therefore, diminishes the use of the article on which they must lose, and substitutes that by which they cannot lose, is interesting to them. This measure does that.

It does not address itself to the interest of the shaver and broker, as some, for effect, have declared. They fatten on a multiplication of credits, and the derangement of currency. Hence, in such times, every bank has its broker. Reduce the former, or make uniform the latter, you cut off their speculations, and make their business and profits as regular and unform as those of the merchant, the banker, or the planter.

If I be asked, sir, how I arrive at these and other conclusion, which I shall presently state, I answer, by inquiring into the nature and objects of modern banking.

First, I find the object to be to make money without the use of money. How is this done?

1. It is done by using the corporation credits to the most unlimited degree, consistent with the safety of the stockholders.

2. By getting possession of as much of another's money as possible, keeping it as long as possible, making the best use of it for the time, and finally paying for it in any thing but money.

Hence, he who can get hold of the most money, keep it the longest, make the most of it, and invent the most ways to return it, without giving up the thing itself—maintaining all the while a reputation for fairness, prudence, and safety—is esteemed the best modern banker.

The keeping, receiving, and paying out the public money (independent of banks) is the subject of this bill. The keeping and using of the public funds by the banks, or through their agency, is the policy of the Opposition, to wit, the Whigs.

The public deposites constitute the bone of contention. I beg the committee to fix their eyes on this single idea, and follow it in all its applications; for startling results will be exhibited to some at least, when I shall have fully answered the following inquiry:

Why is it that the friends of the banks are so hot in pursuit of the deposites, raising a great hue and cry when they are removed, charging Government with all the evils resting on the land, induced by superabundance of irredeemable currency?

Do not the people believe that bank notes are based on, and their circulation governed by, the capital or money of the banks, a reasonable portion of which is supposed to be specie? They do. Hence the universal idea with the mass that a bank is a strong, a safe thing. Hence the planter or farmer who has no borrowing to do, puts his money on deposite for safekeeping.

What will be the surprise of this confiding portion of community, when I assert, and prove, that the entire circulation of the Union is based on, or governed, not by the specie in the vaults, not by the amount of capital paid in, but by the average deposites held by the banks?

That this is not only true of the United States Bank, but that its aggregate annual circulation, during the twenty years of its existence, was governed by the aggregate amount of public money held by it.

This, sir, is literally true. And the average deposites during the period of that Bank's existence, was as true an index to the circulation as the dial is to the sun's course, when no cloud obstructs its shining—as just, sir, as the thermometer to indicate the heat—swelling as they increased, and contracting as they diminished. I will prove this by witnesses not to be distrusted, the Bank's own confessions, which are to be taken always most strongly against itself.

This will furnish a true development of the real cause of all our distress and suffering, and may serve to suggest the appropriate remedy.

Now for the proof. It is taken from the Bank returns exhibited in the public documents. In Senate doc. 2d sess. 25th Cong. No. 128, p. 208.

The proposition is, that the circulation of the United States Bank, from 1817 to 1836, was governed, not by its capital, not by its specie, but by the average amount of public money on deposite.

Here is a semi-annual statement of that Bank for January and July of the several years, taken from that document, under the respective heads of capital, specie, deposites, circulation, loans, and discounts:

By this statement it appears that from 1817 to 1833,

The annual average circulation was -			$9,341,246
Do.	do.	deposites -	8,194,925
Do.	do.	specie - -	5,746.839
Do.	do.	loans - -	38,023,303

You will remember, sir, in 1833, the deposites were removed. That was a crisis with the Bank and the country. Hence our estimates are made to that date, and from that date to the expiration of the charter.

From 1833 to July, 1836, the time it expired,

The annual average circulation was -			$20.294,903
Do.	do.	deposites -	2,639,580
Do.	do.	specie - -	10,872,116
Do.	do.	loans - -	56,865,184

Now, Mr. Chairman, the universal complaint is the derangement of the currency, pressure, and hard times. Whence arise these wailings, and how shall their true causes be shown? 'Tis a vexed question, out of which politicians expect much profit to arise. The paper money has been aptly styled the circulating medium, from analogy to the blood in the human system. The expansions and contractions of the former correspond in effect with the diminution and stagnation of the latter. As you would place the fingers on the pulse to test the superabundant action in the arterial system or approaching state of collapse, so you may now place your finger on the column headed circulation, and tracing its action from year to year, mark the coincidences.

The experiment will prove what I have said—"That the average annual circulation of the United States Bank for the time it held the deposites, was governed by, and based upon, the public deposites;" not by its capital, not by its specie.

How stands the case? The circulation was nine millions, the deposites eight millions, and the specie was five millions, in round numbers. The amounts, therefore, of the two first most nearly correspond. But, it may be asked, cannot five millions of specie sustain nine millions of circulation? It may be. But who knows but the five millions of specie is part and parcel of the eight millions of deposites, and so far is identical? I do not say it is, but have very little doubt, because, in addition to the eight millions of Government deposites, the bank had an average annual private deposite of five millions during the same time. But this is wholly immaterial. I do not deal in surmise, for I will now show by the tabular statement, that the circulation expanded as the deposites increased, and contracted as they diminished; whilst, in reference to the specie, the circulation expanded when the specie was low, and contracted when it was high. This will prove, beyond the power of contradiction, that the public deposites governed the circulation of this Bank.

The Bank started cautiously. In 1817 the range from ten to twenty-four millions was so wide, as to furnish no criterion. During this and the next year, the circulation ran up to 9,045,448, on a specie basis of 2,500.000. The practice of the Government during these two years authorized a belief that it would have an average deposite of at least ten millions—hence, in July, 1819, the circulation was over nine millions. But it turned out that the deposites fell below eight millions—hence, you see, in the next six months, there was a contraction of near three millions; and, for the next six months, a a further contraction 1,500,000; and by July, 1820, it was reduced to 3,500,000. During this time, only eighteen months, there was a total contraction of near near 6,000,000. The deposites decreased 4,400,000; but the specie increased 1,000,000.

Here, you perceive, the deposites governed the circulation.

After this collapse, the effects of which are in the recollection of many, specie rose, in eighteen months, to 7,600,000, without any corresponding increase of circulation. Here you see 4,300,000 added to specie, and but 500,000 to circulation. The reason was, deposites stood firm. You see, also, the increase of specie did not govern the circulation.

In the next two years specie came down again by precisely the $4,300,000; but this did not reduce the circulation—on the contrary, it increased by one million. The reason was, the deposites were rising.

You here perceive, from Jan. 1820 to July 1822, $4,300,000 came in and went out at a great expense, and did not vary the circulation $300,000—hence, specie did not govern the circulation.

From July 1822 to Jan. 1824, deposites ranged from 3 to $10,000,000. Circulation and specie stood firm; almost identical. During this year and a half, specie did govern the circulation. The reason was, it was on the eve of a Presidential election—the contest was warm, the issue uncertain; and it could not be foreseen what would be the policy of the successor.

But Mr. Adams was elected. Now mark the succeeding four years, and observe how well a Federal administration co-operated with its favorite Hamiltonian system. From January to July, circulation rose two millions—specie stood firm.

From July, 1824, to July, 1825, circulation rose near three millions, making near five millions in eighteen months. In this time specie fell $1,800,000.

By July, 1826, circulation rose to $10 000 000, deposites $9,700,000, and specie only $6,000,000.

From July, 1826, circulation rose to $13,600,000. The reason was, deposites increased to $11,600,000—specie stood firm at $6,000,000.

Here you see that for five years, from July, 1824 to July, 1829, the circulation rose $9,000,000; the deposites from 4 to $6,000,000; whilst specie did not rise or fall $500,000 on an average. For these five years, then, the deposites governed the circulation.

From July, 1829, there came into power an administration of this Government opposed to the Bank—Gen. Jackson. He assailed this Hamiltonian system with all the force of his energetic character and unrivalled popularity.

The Bank defended, by the power of its expansion and contractions. The policy of the Bank advocates was to increase the revenue and expenditures, to give the Bank the deposites. The more revenue and expenditure, the more deposites and the more power.

From July, 1829, to January, '30, deposites fell to $9,000,000. The circulation decreased also; but specie increased $1,000,000. The deposites still governed.

The Bank now discovers it must fortify itself for a bold effort to retain the deposites—or a surrender, without loss of credit. It prepares for both events. And from January, 1830, to January, 1832, the circulation ran up to almost double what it ever had been; deposites fell to little more than half what they had sometimes been; whilst specie swelled $5,000,000 above any previous example. During these two years, circulation rose to	- - -	$21,000,000

deposites fell to	-	7,000,000
specie rose to	-	12,000,000

This was a preparation for the contest for a recharter, and against the removal of the deposites. It also prepared the country for the disasters that followed.

To sustain this unusual circulation, the deposites are made to rise, from July 1831 till January 1833, to $12,700,000; whilst specie fell near $4,000,000. So that, in January, 1833, the circulation was - - - $17,500,000
do do deposites 12,700,000
do do specie 8,900,000

And this state of affairs is brought about by the Bank with a full and fair intimation that the deposites would be soon demanded. With what view the committee may judge.

After being deprived of the deposites in 1833, the Bank was driven to supply the defect of basis consequent upon their removal. This it did by an increase of specie up to July, 1835—six months before the expiration of its charter. This was effected by drawing on the State banks, or by putting into market some of its stocks—that being the next most available means to supply a power to redeem its notes. Drawing on the State banks produced a contraction of the local banks, and a panic around them, whilst the negotiation of its stocks resulted in an importation of specie.

From July, 1833, to July '35, the circulation rose higher than it ever was, to $25,000,000 do the deposites fell to 1,600,000 do the specie rose to 13,400,000

Was there ever such a state of things known in the administration of this Bank from the beginning, in 1837, to this time? Nothing like it. Here are 15,000,000 specie and deposites to redeem 25,000,000 of bills, and this brought about at the very close of the charter—whilst at no former period was the circulation permitted in any material degree to exceed the amount of the two, but most uniformly made to correspond with one of the two.

This conduct of the United States Bank can only be equalled in wilfulness by the conduct of a party of wild Indians of the West, who, to secure a single buffalo, will rush a whole herd down a precipice. This, too, after using the public treasure for twenty years as the sole governor and regulator of its circulation. I have shown by its own returns that the Bank supplied a currency not in proportion to its capital, or it specie, but only in proportion to the amount of money which you, as the people's representatives, would put up and suffer it to keep. It fed and fattened on the food you gave it; and when you asked it for food, its reply was, work for it, order the people to pay it to me, and I will distribute it. If, at any time, your supplies grew short, and you drew on what you had in its vaults, you were squeezed and pressed until, to relieve yourself, you were compelled to replenish the stomach of this gormandizer, whose increasing cry was, "Give! give!"

You will remember that this bank's capital was $35,000,000. It is therefore evident that this did not govern its circulation. Hence my proposition is established, that the circulation of the United States Bank, from 1817 to 1833, whilst it had the Government funds, was based on and governed by that fund, and not by its capital or its specie.

I ask you, sir, do the people understand this? The intelligent merchant, banker, or broker may; but the unsophisticated and honest planters, farmers, and mechanics, where I live, do not. I hope they will put their fingers on this, and feel assured they touch the key that unlocks the grand secret of modern banking.

From it we shall illustrate several propositions, interesting to all who are concerned in what you call currency—pressure, hard times, hard money, &c.

The proposition I have thus proven in regard to the circulation of the United States Bank and the public money, is true of the aggregate local banks of the Union and their deposites, public and private. This will appear by an examination of the facts set forth in a table of the condition of the banks, which I hold in my hand, taken from your documents, and published in the 1st volume of Hazard's Statistics, page 167. I now give you those facts, to wit:

Anterior to 1820, the deposites are not given. At that date they were thirty-five millions, the circulation was forty-four millions, and the specie nineteen millions.

In 1830, the circulation had increased near a third, and the deposites over a third, whilst the specie did not increase more than one-ninth.

In 1835, the circulation rose to 103,000 000, and the deposites 83 000,000; specie to 43,000 000

The next year, and the year after, circulation rose to 140,000,000 and 149,000 000, deposites to 127,000,000. Whilst the specie was reduced from 43 to 37 millions. This brought about the supension and all our distress, pressure, hard times, &c. The reasons why, I shall soon explain, if they are not already made manifest.

Here you perceive that the circulation rose to a ruinous height, being carried up by the deposites at the same time that the specie was diminished. We expect to show hereafter, that of the 149,000,000 of circulation then out, from 30 to 40,000,000 was issued on a false basis, or in other words, on the fund of the depositors.

From 1837 to '39, 43 000,000 of the deposites were used. This produced the contraction and pressure now felt. For it reduced the circulation in one year 58 000,000. This was not produced by a reduction of the specie basis, since it was diminished that year, only $2,500,000.

In 1839, the banks made a powerful effort to reinstate the circulation to what it was in 1837. To effect this, they added 10,000 000 to their specie in one year, and carried it 45,000,000, far beyond what it ever had been. They were unable, however, to expand beyond 107,000,000. For the deposites did not rise above 90,000,000 and a small fraction.

This effort resulted in a further contraction in the circulation of 21,000,000 from '39 to 1840. Hence the deposites fell from 90 to 75,000,000.

Hence you perceive, sir, that what was true of the United States Bank as a manager of your funds, proved to be true of all the banks, particularly after the removal of your money from the former to the latter.

One fact let me call your attention to here. It is this: From 1834, the time the transfer of public money commenced from the United States Bank to the pet banks, to 1837, the time when the transfer was fully made, the aggregate expansion was 55,000,000. The amount of deposites transferred in this time was 52,000,000.

Again, from 1837 to 1840, the whole of the deposites were taken away, distributed, and used up; so that this year we have an empty Treasury. The aggregate amount so used, and taken away, is 52,000,000 in this period, (precisely the same that was put there from 1834 to '37,) and the contraction was 63,000,000, a little more than the expansion, as might have been expected.

Here, sir, is a vibration in the circulation, in six years, from 94 to $149,000,000, a corresponding one in the deposites, whilst specie did not go to greater extremes that from 37 and 45,000,000 in five of those years.

Do not all these facts conclusively establish the proposition I have laid down? They do. What, then, has been the effect of this policy of the banks?

1st. An expansion and contraction of $55,000,000 from 1834 to 1840. The expansion put forth $55,000,000 of Bank credits, bearing no interest, issued on the faith of the deposites, to be substituted for the like amount of individual credits, bearing interest, and made payable to the banks, but resting, in seven cases out of ten, on the uncertain results of a speculation on any subject that might promise a speculation.

2dly. The contraction sent the bank notes home for redemption, which, being deprived of the public funds on which they were issued, were thrown for support on the notes of individuals received in exchange. These individuals having failed to realize the speculations, for the sake of which they bartered bank notes substituted for their own, failed to pay. A suspension was the consequence. The 85,000,000 of bank paper thus issued was disparaged; the order of things was reversed; the banks first interposed to advance and prop individual credit. Now individual credit is the sole support of bank credit. Why is this? I answer, it is because the banks have issued and put in circulation, as money, that which, not being money, is based upon, and governed by, something that does not belong to them, and which they were bound to surrender at a moment's warning.

3d. The individuals upon whom rested the redeemable power of the 55,000,000 of bank issue, rose up as one community and petitioned the banks to suspend. Why? Because it was their own case. An extension to the banks was an extension to themselves. It was their case in a tenfold degree. It was virtually a case between these bank debtors and the community, who hold bank bills as money—a case in which the bank debtor had this advantage: If the banks should suspend, he might gain, but could not lose. The community were certain to lose, and could never gain. He might buy at discount, bank notes, with which, at par, he could pay his own. Community lost the discount, but never shared the premium. It is more than equivalent to a voluntary act of bankruptcy, for it enabled a man to stop payment, keep his property, and pay his debts at 25 cents in the dollar. It was a copartnership, in which one of the firm was bound to share the loss, having no portion of the profits.

4th. Another effect was, that in the excitement of this expansion, you created an artificial demand for money, which tempted out of its proper channels that capital which, being needed, was habitually used in the regular course of trade, and consequently kept on deposite with the banks. The abstraction of this and its diversion, to unwise, uncertain, hopeless, helpless, and useless speculations, tended, like the "removal of the deposites," primarily to embarrass the banks, to test the soundness of their issues, and to make manifest (what existed before, but was unknown) the derangement of the currency.

5th. One more effect I will speak of. In a crisis like this, in which the bank debtor had the decided advantage of community, and community had sustained loss without a gain, the banks had the advantage of both. If their bills depreciated, they would send into the market and buy them up—if they were forced to redeem, they too could force their debtors by a contest with them. By the power they possessed over the money and the credit of the country, they had the whole property interests at their mercy.

Other and more remote effects of this unlawful and destructive use of public money, I will point out hereafter, because my constituents are more interested, if possible, in them, and being more hidden, they are not so easily detected. For the present, I will here set down to this account, all the evils, moral, physical, commercial, and political, of a vitiated and debased paper currency.

I say, sir, this system of issuing upon, and being governed by the public funds, is unlawful. You gave the stockholders a charter for a capital of commanding amount, $35,000,000. For what purpose? Was it not that it might be able, by the extent of that capital, to furnish a circulation large enough to spread over your Union?

For seventeen years they overlooked the consideration that their capital was large, and governed their circulation by the amount of money you let them keep; and your experience proves that, if by this bank you would furnish a circulation, you must not only give a charter with controlling capital, but you must habitually keep, on deposite, your money to the amount of bank circulation to be supplied. Did you not expect that, in its bills you would at all times find a uniform and safe medium of exchange, North, South, East, and West. What do you see? Its capital loaned out or invested; its amount of specie inadequate; its circulation unsound, being based on and governed by your own money; irredeemable and debased; its affairs in a condition that, (to use the words of its president, spoken in regard to the country at large,) "All the banks in the Union cannot save it from bankruptcy."

With a charter the most liberal; a capital the most commanding; stockholders foreign, as well as domestic, lords and ladies, dukes and earls, plebeians and patricians, widows and orphans, and capitalists, great and small, operating twenty years; with an average annual Government deposite of nine or ten millions, free of interest; you have seen pressure after pressure, expansion and contraction repeated; till at the wind up it ends in discredit and bankruptcy, to the confusion of its friends, and mortification of its administrators. Sir, we have seen its evils. Where are its benefits?

But, sir, gentlemen say our accumulated evils, that elicit such loud complaints, are the effects of the measure on your table. How can it be? It has not get begun to operate. If it does go into operation, it can only take from the banks that which does not belong to them. If they have not used them as a basis of issue, their removal cannot prejudice the circulation. If they have, the responsibility is on them, and the country will call them to answer for all the mischief.

What, sir! has it already come to this, that at this early period of our history, the people dare not attempt to use their own money, deposited in bank for safekeeping, without receiving through their agents insult and indignity at the hands of these corporate powers? Is it not enough that they have had the use of $10,000,000 for twenty years free of interest? Or must the people, in demanding their money, be told they shall suffer and be pressed until they not only withdraw the demand, but grant this corporation all it asks? Sir, I trust there is patriotism and fortitude in the people to endure a while until they shall be rid of this system of Hamilton and all its evils and abuses.

This system, Mr. Chairman, is thus shown to be unlawful and injurious, both in theory and practice. Its unconstitutionality is so well established by my colleagues, who spoke in support of this bill, that any argument of mine is superseded.

Who, then, is at a loss to assign the true causes of the hard times and the derangement in the currency? If there be one so wilfully blind, so persevering in his purpose not to see, as to affect unbelief with these bank statements before him, let me call that one's attention to one more fact, drawn from the two bank statements now before me, and already referred to. In 1833, when the deposites were removed from the United States Bank, they amounted to $12,752,543, which left of that Bank's circulation $12,000,000, in round numbers, resting on the deposites for support.

The funds were transferred to the pet banks in 1834, 1835, and 1836, during which time their circulation was increased to 55,000,000, without a corresponding increase of capital. This, added to that of the United States Bank, makes the sum of 67,000,000 of circulation in 1837, most of which rested on the 12,000,000 of Government funds. But the Government, in the next two years, used this fund, and left (as appears this year by the undenied statement of the gentlemen from Maine and Pennsylvania, both on the Ways and Means Committee) an empty Treasury—a condition enviable to freemen.

Where is the power to redeem this fifty or sixty millions of irredeemable paper. It lies in the sweat of the brow, or under the sheriff's hammer. What will be the cost of redemption? Much toil, large amount of interest, or a great sacrifice of property. Who must endure the toil? The laboring man. Who pays the interest? The community pays it. Whether debtor to the banks or not, they pay the tribute. Who will say what shall be sacrificed on property? I answer the banks, and they alone.

It is not in the power of this bill to affect either. What if the banks had not used the Government funds to loan its credits on—how could the taking or using of it affect the bank debtors or community, otherwise than beneficial? So long as you pay in gold and silver, you cannot affect the measure of value between me and my customer; nor can you, by that, increase or lessen my power to accumulate by the sweat of my brow, or by the exertion of my talents.

It is the maladministration of the banks, then, that has induced hard times, a maladministration, too, in that particular, wherein this bill alone, by effecting a total divorce, can effect even the inducement to a remedy. Then let us have it—by all that is good, and wise, and charitable and patriotic, and merciful, let us have it.

You now see, Mr. Chairman, that under the operation of this great Federal measure of Alexander Hamilton, your public money has been habitually used by the Bank for its own purposes; and when you would demand it or offer to change your policy, to one more safe and certain, all your public agents are denounced by the Bank and its adherents, as disorganizers.

I now propose to show what has been the cost of this bank system to the people, in a pecuniary point of view.

The average deposite on which the people received no interest for twenty years, was - - -	$10,000,000
Interest on this at 6 per cent. per annum, is - - - - -	600,000

This is annually sunk by the lying idle of that amount on deposite. But as a substitute for it, and to render it active, they say, the Bank issued its notes and loaned them to the people; for which it made the people pay 6 per cent. more, which is $600,000. In these two items of expense, the loss in one year is $1,200,000. Add to this the wear and tear, and loss by fire and water on bank notes, and the like, by forgery, and you have some idea of the actual and unavoidable annual expense of keeping up this system. It will not fall short of $1,500,000 per annum, or $30,000,000 in the twenty years. This is what the free people of this country have paid to the banks. For what have they paid it? For no other purpose than to receive it and pay it out to them. What benefit has the bank derived? First, $600,000 yearly in interest. Secondly, the profit by destruction of its bills, &c.; and, lastly, the profits on exchange, in which it was enabled, by the deposites, to deal to the best advantage, the sum of which I am unable to state here. But on any estimate they must be great.

Other expenses incident and contingent to this system, corresponding to such as have been charged to the Sub-Treasury bill, might be mentioned.

In this estimate, made by me before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] spoke, I have the high gratification to say, on his authority, that every item named is properly included in the account. For he, on similar data, has endeavored to exhibit the expense of the Sub-Treasury scheme, and I congratulate myself when I find that, after being so fortunate as to adopt his mode of investigating and his plan of argument, the balance, on the score of economy alone, after including all his incidental and contingent items, and excluding mine, is at least $500,000 annually in favor of the plan I advocate. Now add to this the contingent and unavoidable items incident to the bank system, to wit: the depreciation or loss on paper money from time to time, by which arises the fluctuations in value and prices, and you will have at least a loss of 10 per cent. on the amount of deposites, or $1,000,000.

To what end, sir, is all this to be suffered and submitted to, but to perpetuate the Federal plan of Hamilton; to establish a bank with its arrogant and domineering power over you, to rule your Government, dictate its revenue, direct its expenditure, appoint your President, use your money, change your Constitution, mould your policy, and control your trade and commerce; finally, to declare war and make peace?

Mr. Chairman: if it was right to remove the deposites, it is more abundantly proper to keep them out of the banks.

Here, sir, I plant myself triumphantly on the ground once occupied by a distinguished representative of Georgia, (George R. Gilmer,) at a time when, being about to measure arms with the bank, your late President, Andrew Jackson, the only man who could "take the responsibility," seized the only measure to succeed, and dared to remove the deposites.

Governor Gilmer then made an argument which, in many features, is extremely pertinent now. Some of those arguments, if applied here, enforced by the energy and sincerity of Gilmer, would be to my colleagues, who oppose me here, as burining firebrands, the scorching effect of which could only be avoided, as they now seek to avoid this, the true issue, by getting out of its way.

On that occasion Mr. Gilmer made the following remarks, among others.

Speaking of the safety of the public funds, which is one of the leading objects of this bill, Mr. Gilmer said:

"If safety had been the sole reason for placing the public money in the Bank, it might have been permitted to remain in the hands of the collectors or receivers, or placed in the Treasury, where money had never yet been placed."

Speaking of the Secretary's reasons for removing the deposites, he said:

"He differed with him as to the sufficiency of all the reasons which he had assigned, except that which charged the Bank with producing commercial embarrassment, by withholding the accommodations from the people, which the possession of the public deposites enabled it to give."

He here charges that the Bank held and used the public money as a means of power to effect its object. He said:

"He was resolved not to be drawn aside from the course of his remarks by the extraordinary arts which had been used by the advocates of the Bank, and those who were zealously engaged in the struggle for party, to persuade the people that the restoration of the deposites had no connection with the recharter of the Bank. He should not degrade the cause of truth, and of his country, by entering into such a controversy. To be convinced that the recharter of the Bank was connected with the restoration of the public deposites, it is only necessary to trace out the conduct of the Bank, and what must obviously be its future course. The end of a bank was to make profit. The charter of the Bank was near expiring. To obtain a recharter was greatly more important to the Bank than any profit which could be derived from its ordinary business. All its operations of late had been, and would continue to be, directed to the accomplishment of that purpose."

Sir, it has become my duty to "trace out the conduct of the Bank," and I have now shown that his every charge is true. He, in 1834, preferred the indictment. In 1840, I, bearing the same relation to the grand inquest, have adduced the proof.

In 1834, "the advocates of the Bank, zealously engaged in the struggle for party, used extraordinary arts to persuade the people that the restoration of the deposites had no connection with the recharter of the Bank."

"Mr. Gilmer, in sovereign contempt for those 'acts,' said 'he would not disgrace the cause of truth and of his country, by entering into such a controversy. To be convinced of it, it was only necessary 'to trace but the conduct of the bank,' and see that 'all its operations of late had been directed to the accomplishment of that end."

Sir, at this very day, the same party represented by some of the same men, are "advocates of the Bank," zealously engaged in the struggle for party! They use the most "extraordinary arts" to persuade the people that this bill has nothing do with "a recharter of the United States Bank."

I will not "degrade the cause of truth and of my country," by entering into such a controversy; but to convince all concerned, I have "traced the conduct" of that Bank, and have proved that it used the public money, and directed all its late operations to the accomplishment of its purpose.

In 1840, I find myself at the same point where Mr. Gilmer made battle in 1834. I have the same party on this floor to fight against, and the same men of that party; I fight with the same weapons, under the same banner, with the same purpose; and furthermore, I have the same allies, (saving and excepting always a certain very distinguished Senator,) and what do I perceive? Why, sir, within sixty days past, I perceive those who, in 1834, scorned the "arts" used by the advocates of the Bank "to persuade the people to believe a lie," who refused to "degrade the cause of truth and of his country," by discussing these attempts to deceive the people, now that I have "traced the conduct of the Bank," and proved all Mr. Gilmer then said to be true, marching in allignment with that party, which he then fought.

Yes, I behold amongst them my colleagues, interposing in behalf of that party, to arrest my arm, to foil my attack, weaken my defence, or turn the edge of my weapons. Sir, they invite me to enlist with them, and fight with other weapons, under another banner. "Being zealously engaged in the struggle for party," they use very "extraordinary arts to persuade the people" that the Sub-Treasury has no connection with the restoration of the deposites or charter of a bank. They now strive to convince me that it will not "degrade the cause of truth and of their country," to enter iuto such a controversy. Sir, unwilling as I am to deal a single blow at them, still I strike for the cause of truth and of my country."

Mr. Gilmer further said:

"After the President had put his veto to the bill for a recharter, did the Bank commence the gradual reduction of business, with the view of closing its concerns? Assuredly not. By enlarging its accommodations from forty-five to seventy millions, it proved its determination to buy up popular favor for its candidate for the Presidency; that its life might, at the end of four years, be renewed for twenty more. This attempt to bribe the people had proved as great a failure as the effort to deter the President from vetoing the bill for a recharter."

Are not the party, which then and now advocate a bank, that thus attempted to "bribe" the people, and "deter" the President, the same which I oppose now? Is not the candidate which was then in the field, the candidate who has now my opposition? And do not my colleagues support him?

"If, said Mr. Gilmer, the positions which I had assumed were true, (and they seemed to him to be self evident,) the distress could only have been brought about by the Bank of the United States. It might not be possible to trace out, with exactness, all the means which had been used by the Bank for that purpose—the curtailment of its issues from seventy to fifty-two millions, with the great and increasing effort, which the friends of the Bank had made, to produce alarm and general distrust of credit, (unparalleled in the history banking,) was, he believed, Mr G. said, the true cause of most of the commercial embarrassment, which had been felt in the country."

Here Mr. Gilmer, in 1834, assigning the true causes of the embarrassment of the country, charges it to the United States Bank, and never intimates a charge against the Government, or the President, who removed the deposites. The causes that produced it then, continued to operate till 1840, and are now the causes. Speaking of the consequences of rechartering the Banks Mr. Gilmer said:

"Such an institution would, he said, necessarily have the power of rendering the Government, in some degree, subsidiary to it in time of war, and of changing, at its will, the price of all property by its command of the currency. There were other objections to which he desired to call the special attention of the friends of constitutional liberty and the rights of the States. He urged the friends of the rights of the States to resist every attempt to confirm to the United States its usurped power over the money of the people by the recharter of the Bank. The effort must be made now or never. Unite the Bank and the Government for twenty years longer, and the advocation of the rights of the States would become folly. Upon this question, Mr. Gilmer said, was formed the first marked distinction between the Federal and anti-Federal parties—between the advocates of the individual freedom of the citizen and the advocates for controlling power in the Government."

Here, sir, are plain truths, strongly told, in Mr. Gilmer's proper style. Is it not strange that State Rights men are unwilling to resist the attempt now making at a United States Bank, and are willing to abandon the "advocation of the rights of the States," or lie down under this charge of "folly," by resisting the only policy than can supersede a Bank, and opposing the only party that will vote against it?

"It was with regret that he found many of those who professed the same general political opinions with himself separated from him, upon the subject of the proper disposition of the public deposites and the recharter of the United States Bank."

If permitted, I will join in this expression of regret. The proper disposition of the public deposites is still the question, and so is the Bank. In 1834, there were three plans: 1st. The United States Bank; 2d. The pet banks; 3d. The Sub-Treasury.

The Federalists took the first, and still adhere to it. The Conservatives, with Gen. Jackson's party, tried the second, and have given it up as the worst of all. And the State Rights men of the South took the 3d, or Sub-Treasury, but, strange to tell, very many of them give it up just as we are able to try it, mainly to preserve their consistency of position in reference to men, and unite with that party who adopted the first plan; who, being placed in power, will unite the Bank with the Government, and then, as Mr. Gilmer said, "all advocation of the rights of the States will become folly."

Mr Gilmer said:

"He but discharged the obligation he owed to those he represented, when he urged them not to be carried off from the maintenance of the rights of the States and the people by the contest for power among the ambitious aspirants for the first office of the country."

So we all "urged," so I still urge. Nevertheless, it is true that very many of our State Rights men have changed their policy in this regard, and are willing to enter into "the contest" for the first office in the country, and elect that man and put in power that party who were, in 1834, and still are, the "advocates of the Bank," and who, being in power, will "charter a Bank," and thereby render the "advocation of the rights of the States folly."

Is not this being "carried off from the maintenance of the rights of the States, by the contest of aspirants for the first office in the country?"

Once more, sir:

"The Bank, he said, was now curtailing its business, either with the view of its approaching end, or for the purpose of distressing the people. If for the purpose of closing its concerns, the deposites could be of no advantage to it; if with the design of distressing the people, in order to procure a recharter, could Congress aid such a purpose by placing the public money in its hands?" (He said) "he should not only oppose the restoration of the deposites to the Bank of the United States, but every other measure which had for its object the recharter of the Bank."

I know, sir, that the grand measure of those who oppose the bill on your table, is that which "has for its object" the charter of a United States Bank, and that without this bill a Bank will be adopted. No gentleman of intelligence and candor now doubts or will deny it. This bill merely proposes to put the money "in the Treasury where it never yet has been," as Mr. Gilmer said, and where, as he also said, it will be more safe.

After concluding this speech, the ablest he ever delivered, Mr. Gilmer offered a series of resolutions, strong and emphatic—amongst others, this:

"Resolved, That the creation of a National Bank, or the recharter of the present Bank of the United States, is not only an exercise of power not authorized by the Constitution, but dangerous to the individual independence of the people, to the power of the States to resist the usurpation of their rights and to the continuance of our present free institutions."

Sir, Mr. Gilmer is well known as a fearless defender of truth, and I hope these sentiments will be appreciated.

On the same occasion, another son of Georgia, [Col. Seaborn Jones,] then a Senator, distinguished himself by one of his ablest efforts; to which, owing to the shortness of my time, I am only permitted to make a general reference. He and Mr. Gilmer sustained Gen. Jackson in refusing to restore the deposites. These two representatives of Georgia were of the State Rights party. In doing what they then did, they did and said as much to conflict their party prejudices and party principles as we do now in supporting this bill; and yet that party, with all their opposition to what was esteemed a highhanded move in the President, sustained them; whilst now we are denounced. How does it happen?

Sir, I beg pardon for the question; it is for the people of Georgia to answer, not for you. That people will furnish the answer when they reflect and know that the issue is now what it then was, what it has continued to be, Bank or no Bank. That then the party, without controversy, was anti-Bank; but that now, in action, a bold, talented and intolerant influence for the Bank shows its front, which then was forced to lie behind a screen. That is the solution. And no man of common candor and ordinary perception, who has spent one season in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, with privilege of a seat here, and an insight into the principles and action of the State Rights party in Georgia, can for one moment deny the assertion that the great issue now is, what Governor Troup declares it to be, "Bank or no Bank."

Mr. Chairman, having, as I think, demonstrated the truth of my first proposition, in regard to practical banking in this country, pointing at some of its actual and comparative evils when contrasted with the measure on your table, I now proceed to a second. It is this:

When the money deposites are abstracted, thereby removing the basis of issue, resort is had to public stocks, or corporation stocks, or produce going to market, to furnish a basis.

This, too, may be proved by the Bank reports or statements already referred to, and that of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, which I now exhibit. I consider it as little more than the sequel of the late United States Bank. It is found in Senate document No. 128, second session Twenty-fifth Congress, page 214.

The Bank returns for 1838 and 1840 show these several items to be what I here exhibit them to be.—See reports to the Treasurer, and Hazard's Statistics, 2d vol. page 170.

In the estimates I make, I use, in some instances, round numbers, as the object is merely to arrive at a principle of action.

I said sir, that, after the deposites were removed, the Bank resorted to stocks or produce, as a basis. You will observe by the column of "loans and discounts" in the tabular statement first referred to, that, in 1831, the sum was $44,000,000, and by July, 1832, rose to $67,000,000. The expansion was $23,000,000. Mark this sum. On what kind of securities was it—personal securities or on stocks? We shall see presently. From this time till 1836, (the expiration of the charter,) this item fluctuated from $45,000,000 to $60,000,000.

I now call your attention to the table just before us—that of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States. 1st. Observe that it starts off with a circulation at once nearly equal to that of the United States Bank, $18,000,000 Deposites nearly corresponding to those of the United States Bank. The specie, if any, divided I presume. But as the deposites and specie together could not support a circulation of 18,000,000, it had to look out for the ways and means. Hence, first, it makes the United States Bank owe it $29,000,000, and, in turn, admits itself debtor to the United States Bank $29 000,000.

Now, sir, are you not ready to ask how it could so suddenly put $18,000,000 in circulation? I understand both these concerns were kept in one building. How else could it be done except by paying that amount of its notes to the United States Bank for such an amount of its notes? How else could the United States Bank become so suddenly indebted to this new concern just going into operation?

What was this for? It was done, sir, to put the notes in circulation, instead of the United States Bank, whose charter had expired.

And why this large mutual indebtedness of 29,000,000? Merely that each might have the notes of the other to pay with. Accordingly, we saw the new bank selling the notes of the old in Georgia at 5 and 6 per cent. premium. This, sir, was but an egg shell concern.

Now notice the column of "discounts on stocks and other securities," for that peculiar item does not figure in the previous statements of the United States Bank, whilst the deposites flourished. In July, 1837, it is first set down, and at the outset it is 26,000,000; in November, 1838, it is 24,000; February 1st, 1840, it is 21,000,000. This is for three years. What is the average? 23,000,000. Now, what did I show the expansion in 1831 and '32, by the United States, in loans and discounts? It was 23,000,000. Here is a coincidence, at least, from which I draw the just inference, that, stocks were resorted to as a basis of issue.

How was it done? Why, just as our Southern banks issue on cotton, which my colleague from Glynn says is the proper basis. The stocks are shipped to Europe, put in market, for sale or an advance, and the proceeds become the basis of exchange, which the bank sells for a profit. With the proceeds of its exchange, the bank redeems its notes, or more frequently makes a second issue.

The result of this operation tempted corporations and States to go in debt more than they could pay—their stocks have consequently sunk below pay—the advance price, and the bank not only suspends, having no redeeming funds, but fails to pay, both here and in Europe, as Mr. Biddle's bank did.

After "stocks" failed, the next, and really a more reliable pretext for a basis of circulation, was that which my colleague thinks the true one, "produce." If this were of uniform value, as gold and silver, it might, in a degree, answer; but it is not. Hence the result was the same as that on the operation on stocks. The bank, like all speculators, was liable to break.

As regards the produce and the owner of it, they are, by the operation, placed in the predicament of the people and the public deposites. The banks use it and them to make interest and discount account rise, and to realize exchange on. But the planter and merchant dare not withdraw it, or control it, lest he should bring about a suspension and a pressure. In the South, the planter begins to understand this, and I doubt not the Western wheat grower or stock drover has had a taste of it. The United States Bank fairly tried cotton as a basis. The fate of that experiment was no doubt an addition to the "other liabilities" of the Bank, and a loss to the planter.

Either of these expedients to support bank issues, results in this: That these corporations issue notes not on their money or capital, but on the public money, that of others, or the products of labor, and on these issues make profit out of the very men who furnish the capital—and what do these men receive for it? Paper, sir, at 20 cents in the dollar—exchange at 10 per cent. premium, after a suspension and pressure. They entail on posterity the inheritance, not of freemen, but of slaves.

Mr. Biddle, too, tried this basis of produce, and went into the cotton region, and that and his stock operations burst the bubble; not, however, without a third attempt at a blow, which is always the last, to wit: His drafts on the future unknown—I mean post notes.

In 1837, '38, '39, and '40, they are enumerated by proper names—"post notes."

In 1840, also, you find another item, called "other liabilities," after naming every sort you could conceive. The sum of these is that unfortunate amount of $26,000,000, put forth originally in 1832, no doubt for the twofold object of supplying the deposites, and stimulating the people to oppose Jackson, who removed them, and Mr. Gilmer, who would not restore them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you talk about "experiments upon the currency." This Bank has experimented in all ways. The last is the worst, but the first led to it. The banks have the currency in their own hands. Jackson, with all his strength, was powerless in any attempt to injure the currency. The only necessary effect of all he did, was to prove its unsoundness, develope the causes, and suggest a remedy, so far as the affairs of the people were concerned. That remedy is on your table. That, too, is powerless, except to prevent mischief that might result from an improper use of the public money by those who habitually control the currency, and, through the power of it, are striving now, as in 1834, to control the people.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] has told us emphatically that this power over the currency is "that of a despot."

Thus much for the circulation of the country, and the true causes of its derangements.

I now proceed to establish a third proposition by the testimony of these Bank tables. It is this:

The average annual loan by the banks, the United States Bank or the local banks, does not exceed, in any very considerable degree, the sum of the capital of the banks, the deposites, and the specie basis; and yet at times it rises above, and again sinks below.

Take the United States Bank first. The total average during its existence of loans and discounts, was $41,000,000. The average from 1817 to 1833, the period of the removal of the deposites, was $38,000,000; and the average from 1833 to 1836, the last three years, was $56,000,000. The average of the last three years of its life, raised the average of its first seventeen years $3,000,000 annually, and exceeded the average of the seventeen by $18,000,000.

The average of specie was $6,000,000. That of deposites, public and private, was about $12,000,000; the capital, $35,000,000. All together, the capital, specie, and deposites, made $53,000,000. Up to 1833, then, the average fell short; and the total average of its whole existence, $41,000,000, fell short by over $10,000,000.

It is, therefore, not true that the country has received an accession to its active capital by this Bank, unless you admit that what purports to be capital in it, is not so in fact. If you do that, you convict it of a fraud upon the people. Away, then, with this argument against this bill, and for the Bank.

What good, then, did you derive by this power to loan? None; but much evil. For the loans and discounts vibrated continually, from 30,000,000 to 65,000,000, producing distressing effects wherever they occurred.

The fourth proposition I shall attempt to illustrate is this: The abstraction of the deposites, by use or otherwise, is marked by a revulsion, because they were permitted to govern the circulation; and when stocks or produce are used as a basis, the fall in the price of either works the same effect, according to the extent of the reduction.

How was it in 1818, '19, and '20? Many will no doubt remember. Look at the tables. Deposites fell from 24,000,000 to 2,000,000. They were used up.

How was it in 1824, '25, and '26? The cotton planters will remember. Look at the state of the deposites. They fell from 10,000,000 to 5,000,000.

How was it in 1833, when the grand removal took place? The loans were running up to sixtyone millions, and ought to have made you easy; and so you appeared to be then: for the deposites were greater than at any other time. But in 1836, the deposites had been transferred. This bank, and all the banks, expanded, and it appeared there was no end to prosperity. Specie was coming in by millions. And it ought to have been permanent; but no—it was as transient as the deposites; and, with our laps full, we were in one year compelled to suspend. This was, however, very much because the banks would have it so, and the United States Bank could not help itself.

A fifth proposition is, that the number of banks, and amount of banking capitol, do not contribute to the relief of the country.

If so, from 1837 to 1840 ought to have been a time of great relief; during those years 240 were added to a number of banks, and 60,000,000 to the aggregate banking capital. But we know we have experienced no relief.

A sixth proposition is that a substitution of stocks, as a basis, in lieu of deposites, and their negotiation abroad, produced an importation of specie beyond the actual products of labor, which was a loan to be paid back after a season, with interest.

Look at the United States Bank table, and you find on the commencement of the stock operations after the removal of deposites—specie came in for three years till it went up to over $18,000,000.

Look, too, at the State banks. From 1830 to 1837 the specie was increased from $22,000,000 to $37,000,000; and still they suspended. What is stranger still, during a suspension, the specie is increased from 37 to 47,000,000 dollars, and no resumption, notwithstanding the circulation is reduced to what it was in 1834.

Now, sir, with from a third to double the specie they had in 1834, and a circulation reduced to below what it then was, by near $10,000,000, why cannot they resume?

Sir, I will tell you. If it was not for those nameless matters, called by the bank "other liabilities," there would be a resumption in ten days.

Those "other liabilities" have resulted from the improper and illegitimate use of banking privileges.

The gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. SERGEANT,] asks you in triumph, "wherefore this vast importation of useless specie?" Let him put the inquiry to the banks—they can tell him.

In return, I ask him wherefore is that specie not paid out and our public credit redeemed? I answer it for him. The banks are but the agents between the foreign creditors and the domestic debtors. They profit both by the non-payment and the pressure. Therefore they press that payment may not be made. For in that event they lose their occupation. Some of the banks, I admit, do not act on this rule.

By what has been said, a seventh proposition becomes manifest. It is this:

Nothing but the multiplication of the products of labor, and a retrenchment in expenditures, can relieve the pressure we feel.

I remember some weeks ago, when an attempt was made to get up this bill, an honorable gentleman [Mr. WISE] from Virginia, in great emphasis demanded to know "what had been done to relieve the country of its pressing difficulties." I then felt, and still feel, surprise, that one so distinguished should seriously think it is in your power, with or without money in your Treasury, to relieve those who are in debt. I was then struck and greatly delighted with the superior candor of the honorable gentleman [General CRABB] of Alabama, of the same party with the other gentleman. He, in his lofty tone, on the same occasion, succeeded the other, and said "he longed to quit this place and return to his plantation, for he was assured that the only relief was to be found by close application to the interests there."

Sir, he was right, and I shall long remember him for the independence with which he spoke truth.

The question then arises, Can this Government relieve the pressure of the country?

If it can, there is but one way—and that is the last way to relief which the gentleman from Virginia or I would elect; and still it is the only way, and is the way in which the advocates of the Bank, if in power, could and will effect it. That will be by an increase of revenue beyond the wants of the Government, to be used by a United States Bank as a basis of issue, that may be loaned and discounted when they choose.

Without this result a United States Bank is a useless thing, and would not be sought. This, too, would be but a cry of "peace, peace," where there was no peace.

This mode of relief, I say, is not in the power of this Government, for the reasons assigned by my colleague, and by Mr. Gilmer.

It would be unjust, because it would rob the many to pay the debts of the few. The debtors would be the relieved party. The relief would be paid for by those who would not receive the benefit. It would, in fact, be a general contribution for special distribution—a general distribution of burdens, to purchase partial and limited benefits.

To limit revenue, is the interest of the people who pay the taxes. It limits taxation. To enlarge the receipts and expenditures, is the interest of the Bank and its advocates; for by as much as you add to them, by so much you add to the average deposites.

Whatever system therefore will produce the reverse effect, is the one for a free people. The one on your table is that measure, if you retain the specie clause; since the average sum remaining in the Treasury, be it large or small, must be in specie; which, in the absence of Government money, must become the basis of issue by the banks. It then will become the interest of all banks to unite with the friends of a simple economical Government, to reduce and keep down the revenue to its actual wants.

I here offer another proposition, to wit:

If you do not adopt this bill, you must use the banks. The more avenues to expenditure, the greater the expense. In this proportion will be the appropriations and the revenue, whether needful to the people or not. The banks being used, the more expense the better, and if you must borrow money to pay, it is still better for them and worse for the people.

This proposition, in all its bearings and applications, has so repeatedly been illustrated, and so fully established, by others who have discussed this subject, and may be so easily elaborated by any one who has attended to or examined the facts I have referred to, that I will not detain the committee.

From its truth is adduced this additional proposition, which is nearly equivalent in nature and magnitude: That under the bank system, you cannot long escape from the funding system, or hesitate to assume those State debts, which have been induced by the illegitimate use of the public deposites. This arises, in my mind, from a conviction of the truth, that another bank, limited and restricted as it may be, with power to issue paper as money, will at once become identified with the Government, control its operations, and ultimately dictate to the people their laws and constitutions, and decide the amount and ratio of taxation; for, in the language of the gentleman from New York, "the control of the currency is the control of the country."

This measure, with its legitimate operation, retaining it specie clause, (which would be better to operate all at once,) will avert these moral and political evils, and do more to perpetuate our Union, than any one since the enactment of the Constitution.

It is desirable to Republicans and State Rights men, because it tends to preserve their rule of strict construction and limited delegated powers. The opposite system pulls it down in a day.

It limits the direct and indirect patronage of the President. With it the measure of the patronage is "strict construction;" limited revenue; certain and ascertained officers; without the use of the money.

Without it, the measure of patronage is "latitude of construing powers;" unlimited and surplus revenue; multiplicity of officials, known and unknown, with their ten thousand connections and ramifications and relationships, natural and artificial, political and commercial, with liberty to use not only the deposites, but three and four times their sum, by and through the moral and political irresponsibility of a lawless, uncontrollable and controlling corporation.

To illustrate, you have but to turn your attention to another table I have prepared, exhibiting the action of the Government on a certain class of appropriations, from the chartering of the late Bank to the present time. I refer to that class entitled internal improvements. It has been prepared at the expense of much labor; and although its perfect accuracy is not vouched for, I can assert its accuracy to every material purpose. The subjects of these are the Cumberland road, roads and canals, fortifications, surveys, harbors, light-houses, breakwaters, and navy yards. It will be sufficient to give you the annual aggregate in round numbers. For the year

1816,	$1,700,000	1829,	$1,900,000
1817,	1,700,000	1830,	2,279,000
1818,	1,700,000	1831,	2,696,000
1819,	1,700,000	1832,	2,596,000
1820,	1,700,000	1833,	3,155,000
1821,	1,700,000	1834,	3,518,000
1822,	1,700,000	1835,	3,000,000
1823,	1,700,000	1836,	3,400,000
1824,	1,700,000	1837,	3,800,000
1825,	1,700,000	1838,	2,300,000
1826,	1,700,000	1839,	1,856,000
1827,	1,700,000
1828,	1,900,000	Aggregate,	$52,200,000

From 1816 to 1827, I have given you an annual average: from 1827 to 1839, the annual sum is given. Now, if you will witness the truth of what I said, and test the influence of the Hamiltonian system on this class of expenditures, and the subjection of the latter to the will or power of the former, look at the years from 1827 to 1839, and see how, with the increase of the deposites, these appropriations increased—how, as the Bank expanded, these swelled—how, as the deposites were removed or consumed, and the Bank rendered powerless, these were brought down by the will of the people. Sir, in spite of himself, the Bank interest and policy controlled Jackson and his party until the deposites were removed. Then, and not till then, do you find any success in the principles of the Democratic party on these subjects. This occurred in the second and third year of the present Administration.

The people of the South, and Georgia in particular, will do well to consider what interest they have in restraining this tendency in the Government. Here are $52,000,000 expended on these objects in little more than twenty years. What portion of it do they pay? At least half. What portion is spent with them? Not one-fifth. What portion is spent amongst those I represent? Not one-tenth.

Mr. Chairman, I do not regret that which is spent rightfully and properly for the good of the Union, though it be in the North. No, sir. It is the adoption of an unauthorized rule, that lets in all kinds of expense—through channels innumerable, that grieves me—channels made broad and deep by the bank policy, which my associates are contributing to promote by opposing this bill. Take another class of expenses of particular individual and local interest, to wit—pensions. Here is a statement, showing the whole number of pensioners under the several laws, and the number in the Southern and Northern States:

	Invalid.	Under March 18, 1818.	Under May 15, 1828.	Under June 7, 1832.	Under July 4, 1836.	Under July 7, 1838.	Total.
No. of pensioners,	4,236	8,215	624	24,086	2,512	4,301	44,694
In Southern States,	1,206	1,528	154	7,237	264	386	10,775
Difference,	3,030	6,687	470	16,846	2,248	3,915	33,919

Out of twenty-nine States, Territories, and Districts, the fourteen Southern States have but 10,775 pensioners, while the other fifteen have 33,919.

The amount paid to pensioners is about in the like proportion. By Senate Doc. No. 307, 3d session, 25th Congress, you have an exhibit of the sums annually paid to pensioners and annuities and grants for Revolutionary services. From the commencement of the Government to the charter of the late Bank, the annual average did not exceed $100,000 From that time to 1838, the annual average was $1,500,000. And it appears, the farther we remove from the Revolution the greater the number of heroes demanding pensions.

In two years after the charter, the sum advanced from 300,000 to 2,200,000. About the time of the contest with the Government and Bank, when the latter wanted large power, to wit, in 1832 and '33, the sum rose from 1,200,000 to 4,400,000. After the effect of the removal was felt, to wit, in 1836 and '38, at the expiration of the Bank charter, it was reduced from 2,500,000 to 800,000—coming back to what it was before the charter. Does not this prove what I said?

What portion of the 52,000,000 has gone South, and what North, and what has each paid?

I make the same remark here that I did before: My object is not to excite sectional jealousy; but to advise my constituents of their interests, and awaken the sense of justice of the North.

Georgia has only received about 320,000 of the 32,000,000. And this burden, just or unjust, has been increased by the Hamiltonian system, to give a greater average deposite. I am here reminded that the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. SERGEANT,] when discussing the pension bill, said "these deposites were never worth one cent to the Bank." And yet he endeavored to show that they were of vast importance to the pet banks. I know not how to think him sincere. They were more important and useful to the United States Bank than to the pet banks. If not useful, why use "extraordinary arts to persuade the people to restore them." Why such vast effort to defeat this bill? It only "puts the money where it never was before—in the Treasury."

It gives the President no power over the money that he did not have over it in the banks. The way to get at it is the same. The persons to call for it are the same. Indeed the power must be less, since the sum will be diminished. Sir, you remember when the banks were put on the distinct terms of not using the deposites, the best banks in the country refused to take them; the Bank of South Carolina, Bank of Louisville, &c.; and many of those who did take them, got sick of it, or broke, and could not return it. This appears by by document 304 of the Senate, third session Twenty-fifth Congress, which I hold in my hand.

But to return to the effect of this Hamiltonian system on the revenue. What I have shown in regard to particular classes of expenditure, lawful or unlawful, is true in regard to the expenditures in the general. This I illustrate by document No. 212 of the Senate, third session Twenty-fifth Congress, now before me, showing the annual receipts and expenditures of the Government from 1817 to 1838. Compare this with the state of the deposites, and you will find that whenever there happened any considerable reduction in the deposites or basis of issue, there was an immediate call for increase of revenue, and of course new pretexts of expenditure, whether the times were good or bad.

How was it in 1819? "Hard times." What was the deposites? Reduced by the payment of public debt, from 7 to 2,000,000.

What was the expenditure? Increased from 10 and 12,000,000 to 17,000,000, just the sum taken out.

How was it in 1824? "Hard times." Deposites reduced from 10 to 8,000,000; expenditures increased from 10 to 13,000,000.

How in '32 and '33? "Flourishing times." But Jackson and the bank were at war. It was important to increase the power. The local bank influence began to co-operate, and expenses and deposites both increased.

In 1836, the actual expenses still increased from similar causes. From that period, however, they have diminished, making due allowances for extraordinary items; more especially do we find them reduced in the peculiarly obnoxious item of internal improvements, as well as the pensions. Hence, sir, the history of your finances and those of the banks prove that the United States Bank has had important influence on the policy of the Government. And when the secret is told, it is true that its interests, direct and indirect, have had more to do in running the Government into extravagance than any man's party. Its party is always that which goes for increase of revenue by loans or otherwise. They never object. Hence you find it strongly supported by those who, not being dependent for office on a particular president, have a permanent interest in high salaries.

Alexander Hamilton said, concerning the Bank, whilst he was recommending a plan, amongst other things, that it is not a "mere matter of private property, but a political machine of the greatest importance to the State." So it is esteemed by all who entertain the views of the powers, ends, and nature of our Government, which he did. Again Mr. Hamilton said on the same occasion: "These deposites are of immense consequence to the banks." In this, he greatly differed from the gentleman from Philadelphia.

Having spoken of the political and pecuniary evils under which we labor, and traced them, in a most important degree, to the fallacy, errors, and mischiefs of your banking system, permit me simply to refer you to the vastness of the moral evil arising from it.

First, it has made the obligations of "my promise" hang loosely around me. It has destroyed the sacredness of "my word," and made me lightly esteem my "honor."

Hence has arisen a want of self-confidence and self-respect, which has opened a door to all kinds of vice and immorality, idleness, profligacy, and abandonment of honest, sober, patient industry, accompanied by a contempt for its temperate and virtuous rewards. A false standard of worth has led to errors of judgment in conduct and men, by which labor has become disreputable, and indolent ease applauded and cherished. These in turn had their effects on the results of political economy, disparaging in the aggregate the products of labor, thereby aggravating the causes of distress as well as their effects. Physically, the same corresponding results have been witnessed. Your old men are worn out and enfeebled, by ceaseless watching. Your middle aged are becoming miserly or indifferent to their love of country—whilst your young men find themselves more at home in the drawingroom than in the field. In the field they look out for a shade or a place of repose. Your soldiers love their barracks, and your officers are pleased with their dress parades, and delight in the haunts of the capitol, and the man of God seeks comfort and enjoyment in the vain excitement of political life. Thus, it seems, this great Federal system, that has been in operation, as has been said, from the days of Hamilton, works badly, politically, financially, morally, physically, and religiously. "Let us have a change. We cannot be worsted."

Even a safe and prudent merchant, or an honest banker, need not dread a change; neither can be injured by it The reckless speculator or the bankrupt has no motive to resist a change. The latter will no longer be credited by the banks, and will do well to set up for the individual credit system, so used up by the banks. The former, too, can no more expect facilities, for the banks have speculated till they understand how far they should go, or permit others to go; hence the speculator may learn self-respect, and rebel against this sort of guardianship.

This measure is the only alternative or escape from the United States Bank, and this, with me, is a good reason for fairly testing its virtue.

Again: this bill not only enables us to escape from the evils of a bad and unauthorized system, but it goes on the assumption that we are to return to that currency in the Government transactions, which alone is constitutional. It brings back the Government to what the framers intended it to be, and the administration of it to the Republican standard.

The law provided at an early period that gold and silver alone should be received and paid out. Mr. Hamilton first, by a mere Treasury order, interfered with this law, and encroached on its provisions. That law, I believe, remains unrepealed. And on what ground can any one, except the genuine Federalist, object to its execution?

Having given satisfactory reasons for a change of the present system, and a correction of its abuses, as well as for the adoption of the measure before the committee, I will now answer some of the prominent objections to the bill.

The gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. SERGEANT] says: "A certain amount is to be supplied for the use of the revenue—to lie idle."

This amount, under the operation of the bill, he assumes will be, on an average, $5,000,000, and is to be then for the use "of the revenue." Thus far there is no objection. But it is to "lie idle." Very well; admit the argument, for sake of argument, and contrast the bill with the Bank, or Hamiltonian plan, and I have shown by the Bank statement, that in twenty years' experiment they have kept from nine to ten millions of dollars for the use of the Bank, which the Treasurer could not obtain for the "use of the revenue" when he wanted it; and if the people took it away, they were pressed until they put it back.

He says: "In the midst of our difficulties, we have been annually importing specie. How did we get it? By going in debt."

I have shown that the reason why specie was brought in the midst of our difficulties, was, that the Bank issued on the deposites, and was governed by them; their disturbance drove the Bank to substitute stocks, which, being negotiated abroad, brought specie here, and that it was a loan induced by the policy of the banks. I am happy to have my views thus corroborated. The gentleman has stated facts. I have explained their causes.

Again, in his estimate of the expense of this plan, he says, in the aggregate it will be $1,000,000, and asks "if any one will contend we ought to pay it?" I say not, if we can avoid it. But I have shown, that by the Bank system, the expense in one single item is $1,200,000; and if I estimate all the items as he has done, it will be nearer $3,000,000 annually; so the Bank system is not the plan to save the $1,000,000.

He gives an extraordinary statement of the expense of "transferring funds in Wiskonsin," a remote and wild country. The sum was small. Did he set down against this the vast sums annually lost on account of the fluctuations of exchanges, between South and North, on transactions of millions and hundreds of millions, induced by suspensions, the effect of maladministration of his favorite Bank—suspensions in which his Bank, with others, took advantage of the people, to put exchange to five, ten, and twenty-five per cent. premium, and keep it there, after "importing and keeping, in the midst of our difficulties," more specie than the country ever had before?

In this sum of five millions of dollars, "to lie idle" under the bill, he says you "start with a minimum." I think just the reverse, and have given the reasons. By his system, however, it is clearly proved we "started with a minimum," and ended with a maximum. Here is history against prophecy. He says by the Bank the transfer of public funds costs you nothing. I grant, by the account stated on the Bank books, there may be no charge. That does not prove it costs nothing; if so, this bill would not be expensive. His plan only costs the people a charter—a barter of their Constituion, and a bonus of one million of dollars over and above all the expense he charges against the Sub-Treasury.

"The banks," he says, "are suffering with the community." A glorious state of suffering indeed! one in which they gain every thing, and need lose nothing; in which, having all power, they command every thing, and are, therefore, interested to prolong the suffering. I save and except here, sir, such banks as have held the deposites sacred, and have done a legitimate business.

"I will turn you to facts curious to behold." "Our expenditures, it is amazing to see how they have increased within a few years."

This is one curious fact, to which I have been curious enough to call your attention already, with a view to show wherein lies the curiosity. I should have been amazed if one so conversant with the bank policy as that gentleman, should have failed to point to this "curious fact." It is the legitimate offspring of the system which he, with exultation, ascribes to Alexander Hamilton, in these words:

"Hamilton arranged the plan that has never been altered, except once in 1829."

He is right, sir; and what was that plan? It was to use the banks as depositaries. There the money was kept to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. Yet he says:

"The Treasurer has never any money in his keeping."

By warrants, drafts, and checks, it was drawn, transferred, or paid out, in bank paper, good or bad.

By that plan the Treasurer's office and these banks or vaults were called the Treasury of the United States; for Mr. Gallatin said expressly:

"These depositaries are the Treasury of the United States." See State Papers, vol. 2d, title Finance, page 461 and 463.

Now in what does this bill differ? "The offices in the Treasury building, in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, Orleans, and St. Louis, are called the "Treasury of the United States;" here is no difference. But these places are not corporations to issue paper money; there is one difference.

The money is placed to the credit of the Treasurer: here is no difference. To be paid on his own warrant, draft or check, as heretofore: here is no difference. In gold and silver—here is the sound and material difference. This is not all, sir: "Hamilton arranged the first—Federalists adopted it, have always advocated it, and still do. The State Rights men proposed the second, have always advocated it, and still ought.

But, after stating this "curious fact" about the expenditures, which caused him to be "amazed," his amazement ceases, and he says:

"Expenses have increased, do increase, and ought to increase." Thus he comes at last to the creed of a true believer.

He says: "The placing the money there to the credit of the Treasurer, subject to his draft as though in the Treasury, is an unconstitutional feature."

If this be true, then he and Mr. Gallatin have furnished additional authority for saying the plan of Hamilton was unconstitutional. For the money was placed in the "depositories to the credit of the Treasurer," and "these depositories were called the Treasury of the United States."

"Take care how you extract from the people, and give it to a cold heartless Treasury."

That operation has proved a cooling business to the Bank, and has left them "heartless," too, however much of soul they may have had. But of what use is this caution? Take his own plan, and Mr. Gallatin says "those depositories are the Treasury;" and in the words of the gentleman I reiterate his warning: "You give no aid to the banks; you jostle trade." Sir, you have helped them to the means by which they have deranged the currency and jostled trade; you have given them millions annually, to be used under the privileges of a charter; you have helped them to the power of producing excitement, expansion, and contraction; of speculating on your people; of raising or lowering prices; of corrupting the purity of your public tribunals; and of almost perpetuating their own existence, and yet their friends cry, "Give, give." The time has come when we should say no to any proposition that looks to the increase of their power.

'This is a war on banks."

Not so. It is a child's bargain. The people instruct us to say to the banks, "Let us alone and we will let you alone." Congress has no power to do or say more by any operation on the currency.

But he says, "Will you give no help to exchanges?" Sir, the only effect you can produce, the only aid you can give, is that of a very large dealer in exchange, whose purpose and habit it is to give it to you at par, every where. That much aid, and no more, we propose to give by this bill—and that only to the extent of our transactions in raising and disbursing a revenue limited to the actual wants of the Government.

But why call on us? Your favorite system operated for 20 years, and what did it effect? What it failed to make on domestic, it made up in foreign exchanges; and it found it more profit in commanding all the exchange, at a given rate, than to speculate for a season. In this, too, it founded its only hope of reputation, its only claim to regeneration.

But when you refused its demands, how did it requite you for years of kind treatment? As if to manifest its want of gratitude, it threw your currency overboard, and destroyed more at its death than it created during its life.

The operations on foreign exchange afforded a wider field; and whilst it prided itself in the uniformity of domestic exchanges, the foreign were left to take their course. This may be illustrated by the exchange table here before me, in Senate doc. 2d sess. 25th Cong. p. 457, 137, and 133. It shows that from 1788 to 1814, exchange on England was at an average discount of three per cent. For the time, great uniformity in the rate prevailed. The widest range was to 4½ premium.

From 1815 to 1838, exchange on England was at an average premium of 8¾. No uniformity prevailed whilst it ranged from 1 to 18, and from 7 to 21 premium.

In the coincidence between the fluctuations of this commodity at different times and the rise or fall in the deposites and circulation of the United States Bank, some "curious facts" appear, which it will be amazing to behold. The document first referred to, and the document 142, Senate, 3d sess. 25th Cong. will exhibit them.

Sir, too much has been claimed for this institution as a regulator. It assumed that office at times, but always looked to you to give it the means. There is no regulator but specie.

Now, sir, let me answer the two questions of the other gentleman [Mr. BIDDLE] from Pennsylvania.

1st. "When specie gets to the point of attraction, how is it to get back?"

I answer, by the power this bill gives to individuals to demand that article in payment.

2d. "Bank paper being refused by the Government, is disparaged. How will you restore its value?"

It is not in our power. Nevertheless, it will speedily be done, because every sound bank which has pride of character, or interest in its good credit, will of itself very soon put its notes on the footing of specie, which will naturally produce an influx of specie in their vaults, to be supplied by their notes. Those which cannot hope to reach this point, will forfeit all claims to confidence, and die by their own act.

The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] and also the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] assert that "this bill will discredit the States."

I can perceive but one way in which it can have that effect; and for that we are not accountable. It is this: The States are now discredited by their own imprudence. Their stocks are under par. This has brought about some of those "other liabilities" of the Bank. If another bank charter could be obtained, the stocks, on the plan of Hamilton, will be a fund to pay for that stock. Hence a new demand for them would be created. This is the forlorn hope. Pass this bill, and the Bank is suspended, and stocks are regulated by the existing demand, and therefore will continue to fall. But is this your fault? Or must you violate your duty, to consult the interest of those who hold State stocks? Let the speculators in stocks take care of themselves—the people will take care of the public money.

If, sir, you are bound to divest your policy, with a view to prop or reinstate those stocks, it is only on the principle that you can endorse for them or substitute your credit for theirs. This is a favorite idea with the friends of the Hamiltonian system, but receives no favor with me. When it shall be yielded to by the country, the Government will have become a machine for the promotion of a privileged order. I will resist it as long as it can be resisted, and be one of the last to yield; but being forced to give up, I shall then, with what means I can command, try to place myself on a footing with the favored few. But I confess I should only do it on the principle that when I must be a slave or a master, I prefer the latter.

The gentleman from Tennessee "calls on gentlemen from the South to avail themselves of this opportunity to cut off this continual increase of expenditure." Sir, I echo the call, send it back to that gentleman, and send it in the ears of my colleagues, and assure them that I mistake greatly if the passage of this bill is not the plan.

He calls this an "ultra Federal policy." Where did he get that idea, and how does it appear? He obtained it not from history, not from men who have died, not from Washington, nor Jefferson, nor Madison, nor Alexander Hamilton. It must be the creature of a lively imagination.

He asks, "Where is your $5,000,000 of specie to come from—it is not in the country, and what little is in the country is in the vaults of the banks"

Is this true? and are the banks to furnish an argument of necessity against this bill, by locking up the specie, that their friends may raise this objection? Certain it is, that there is now, by the account of the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. SERGEANT] a superabundance of specie. And in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, I answer: take a part of that "enormous amount of useless specie," spoken of by the former gentleman, and put it to the uses of the people, in the redemption of bank paper, and your Sub-Treasury will have no difficulty.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] said, "Hamilton tried this scheme and it failed." I have been unable to find the authority for this declaration. I doubt whether it exists—the more so, since on this point this gentleman and the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] are at issue. But if he tried it and let it go, it was because it failed to strengthen and consolidate the Federal Government as he desired; and this cuts down the grandest of all pretended objections to the bill.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says, "we are to have one currency for the Government and another for the people." This has become too stale and shallow a pretext for an argument, to deserve consideration. Still I will illustrate it. Put a case. You reside in the interior of the "empire State"—you have an agent or agents in New York who manage all your moneyed affairs. Where you live, the ordinary medium is paper money. It has become of little value, because it is irredeemable. It issued from banks in and about New York. You draw on your agent; he fails to pay, assigning as a reason that your money was deposited for safekeeping in banks who refuse to pay it. After an examination of their affairs, you find they have governed their circulation by the sum of your deposites, which being withdrawn in part, cannot be redeemed. The bank therefore stops. You order your agents to deal in gold and silver, and remove your deposites, that the money which circulates in your immediate vicinity may be better; that your agent at New York, where your great interests are, may, meet this engagements unembarrassed. Now, when he receives and pays out for you, is it your affair or his; is it one money for him and another for you, or is it not yours in either case? This is the affair of the people; the Government is their agent.

I would gladly, Mr. Chairman, call my colleagues' attention to the important influence a United States Bank has had, and must always have, on our Southern staple, and our facilities to elect between alternative markets. Also the vastness of the political results that might enure to the South, by throwing such preponderating machinery at the North. These are topics grand and overwhelming. But my time is spent, and I desist.

I have endeavored to present fairly the merits of this bill. That I have succeeded, it would be vanity in me to suppose; but I desire it to be remembered, that the great good to be effected by it, in my estimation, is to limit the revenue to the wants of the Government—making it as simple and economical as a Republic ought to be; to close up the innumerable avenues to indirect Executive patronage, and thereby limit his power to that which is given and lawful to be exercised; thirdly, to check the alarming tendency of Federal legislation to adopt a rule of construing the supreme law, by which its decisions, concerning its powers, ride over the supremacy of that law. If I have contributed to this, I have sustained the interest of my constituents, my own, and the interests of the country—I shall have cause to be satisfied with what I have done, and will rest on a "conscience void of offence."

SPEECH OF MR. SHEPARD, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, June —, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Mr. SHEPARD addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The few remarks which I intend to make will be strictly applicable to the bill under consideration. Honorable gentlemen have wandered to other topics, which have but little connection with this subject; they have travelled over the old ground, so well known to the members of this House; they have rehearsed the story of the war upon the banks, and indulged in the usual tirades against the persons engaged in that famous controversy. A member from Kentucky has affirmed that this question was to be decided by authority, and, charging certain eminent gentlemen with having changed their opinions on the subject of the currency, he supposed this fact to be a powerful argument against the bill. Sir, I differ entirely from that honorable gentleman. Politicians may change with the moon, but their conduct should not arrest the progress of great and valuable principles. The human mind is so much influenced by prejudice, so often governed by circumstances, and is so circumscribed in its vision, that the best and wisest are liable to error. Must we, therefore, ever continue in the wrong, and must we never yield to the lessons of experience? Mr. Van Buren was in favor of the "safety fund" system of New York, and Mr. Calhoun once advocated the establishment of a National Bank; but do these things justify the assertion that they are dishonest in recommending this measure; or are they sufficient to draw you, or me, or any honorable member, from its zealous support? Sir, I think and act independently on all occasions; the people whom I represent are too proud and too generous to expect a base subserviency to any man or any party; all that they wish is an honest devotion to their welfare, and a conscientious discharge of the solemn duties required by the Constitution.

Sir, if this bill contain in its womb but a small portion of the evils which its enemies have foretold, it is the worst measure ever introduced into a deliberative assembly. We have heard that the public treasure will be surrendered to thieves and robbers; that the President will have the power of an Eastern potentate, and that the "credit system," the source of all our prosperity, will be overthrown, and this flourishing country revert to its pristine barbarism. These are the exaggerations of heated zeal and distempered fancy. Hatred of the party in power has blinded honorable gentlemen; hope, which has so often tantalized them with the prospect of success, and has been so often disappointed, has filled them with intemperate ardor, and made them forget that the minds of others are not subject to the same obscuration. The hackneyed politician, whose sole object is to attain success, and the paid advocate of special interests, will use every means to excite the public feeling, and delude the public judgment, but it is matter of astonishment that high-minded statesmen should fall into such extravagances. I doubt not the sincerity of other honorable members, but after an earnest investigation of the merits of this bill, and after tearing from my heart every prejudice which might lead me from the path of truth, I feel assured that the success of this measure will be of lasting benefit to the Government, the country, and all its interests.

The bill proposes that the public revenue shall be kept by the public officers, by men appointed for that purpose according to the laws of the land, and it forbids the receipt at the Treasury of any thing but gold and silver, the legal currency of the country. These simple principles are the essence of the measure, and on them will depend its usefulness and efficiency, either as a fiscal agent of the Government, or in its incidental bearing on the industry of the Union. Gentlemen have said that they are contrary to the genius of our institutions, that they are more congenial to the despotisms of the old World, and more in unison with the habits and feelings of an enslaved people. To test the truth of these assertions, let us go to the fountain of our legislation, whose pure and living waters are yet refreshing to the patriot and statesman—to the Constitution itself. That instrument authorizes the President and the Senate to appoint subordinate officers, to assist in managing the affairs of this Governmeni. It says nothing of corporations, and the inference, that its authors intended to impose all the duties, arising under the Constitution, on persons selected according to law, and liable to its penalties, is not unreasonable. Congress has power to "coin money," and the States are forbidden to "emit bills of credit," or to "make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts," but no mention is made of bank paper, no authority is given to make use of the promissory notes of private associations, and it is not illogical to suppose that our fathers endeavored to establish a hard money Government. There were banks in this country and in Europe, when the Federal convention was in session; the convenience of these institutions was known and understood by its members, and their silence is unaccountable, if corporations be so necessary for the keeping of the public money, and if the demand of gold and silver be so hostile to liberty and social improvement. I am not saying that we are forbidden to receive paper, and to deposite it in banks, but I wish to show that this bill is not incompatible with the Constitution; indeed, I consider it in strict accordance with its spirit, a faithful performance of the wishes of its framers, who never dreamed of the interpretation of modern commentators. Here, then, I might stop, and ask our opponents for their authority. The burden of proving the measure inefficient or dangerous lies on their shoulders, and something more than loud denunciation is necessary to satisfy the public mind.

An honorable member from New York [Mr. BARNARD] said that the real object of the bill was to "govern" or to "regulate" the State banks, though its title was "A bill for the collection, safekeeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue." He thought it analogous to the tariff laws, which were passed for the benefit of domestic manufactures, whilst they were called acts for the collection of revenue; and he seemed to think it difficult for some of us to "digest" a measure of such a character. The gentleman is entirely mistaken, at least to one of those who support this bill. If its effect on the currency and business of the country would be wholesome, its passage is still more desirable; but I view it principally as an engine of the Treasury to manage the national revenues, and I am the more anxious for its success, because it obviates the necessity of a measure odious to the people, and destructive to the harmony of the country. Sir, I do not belong to that school of politicians, who, under the cloak of doing one thing, are aiming at another, not sanctioned by the Constitution. An honest man will not cheat his neighbor, neither will he commit a fraud in the Legislature of the Union, for the triumph of party, or the still more despicable purpose of taxing one portion of the people for the advantage of another.

But gentlemen are distrustful of individuals; they think that corporations alone are safe depositaries of the public funds. A single person is fit for the Presidency, though the destiny of fifteen millions of people is placed in his hands; a judge on the bench must decide questions involving the lives and fortunes of his fellow-citizens, and each one of us is trusted with the performance of great and solemn duties to the people and the Constitution. Can it be that the President and the Senate would be unable to find men sufficiently honest to take charge of a few dollars and cents? If there be so little integrity in the country, why do these moneyed institutions themselves put confidence in their officers and directors? How was the public money kept during the war of the Revolution, when there were no banks in existence? Other nations use individual depositaries, yet there is no complaint of loss, no absolute necessity of changing their system. Greece and Rome carried on their mighty conquests, and filled their exchequers with the spoils of the world, and their treasure was confided to the care of individuals.

Gentlemen are willing that the revenue should be collected by the officers of Government, though the keeping of it must be committed to private associations. It is not easy to see the distinction; if men are too worthless to be trusted with the latter duty, it is unwise to allow their interference for any purpose, and banks should measure boxes, gauge molasses, sell land, and saunter about the country as regular tax gatherers. The case of Swartwout illustrates this view of the subject; his defalcation occurred during the connection of the Government with the banks, and whilst the public officers were ordered to collect and deposite in these institutions. Yet this did not prevent the embezzlement; for if a man be disposed to cheat, he has ample opportunity during the process of collection. The truth is, that whether banks or individuals be the depositaries, the Government is equally exposed to loss; the only safe rule is to select trustworthy men, to keep a vigilant eye over their conduct, and to inflict the heaviest penalties on negligence and dishonesty. This bill goes far to place guards around the public treasure; should, however, fine, imprisonment, and future disqualification for office be unavailing, let the whipping post and the gibbet drive men into the paths of rectitude.

But, sir, I will proceed to a topic of still greater importance. It is pretended that the power of the President will be increased by the provisions of this bill, and the patriotic sensibilities of gentlemen are aroused by the idea that the commander of the army and navy, and the leader of forty thousand office holders, should also have control of the Federal purse. The zeal of these animated orators would encourage the belief that public liberty was in danger, and that the President was grasping at all the powers of the Constitution, in order to change the nature of our Republic.

A plain statement will dissipate these clouds, and relieve the anxieties of honorable gentlemen, if they are sincerely in search of truth, and not playing the game of petty politicians for selfish purposes. If the Government and the banks be connected, the public money will be deposited in these institutions, subject to the drafts of certain officers, in pursuance of old and established laws. Whether it be a bank chartered by Congress or a State Legislature, the keeper of the money is compelled to obey the command of these officers; it cannot be said that the fund is to be used for an improper or illegal object, the depositary cannot inquire into the motives and designs of the public agents, though it be suspected that they are wasting the treasure of the nation, but drafts in the legal form and from the proper authority must be promptly paid. It thus appears that the revenue of the country must be under the control of some one, and existing statutes have placed it under the care of officers in the Department of the Treasury; they have it deposited in banks, they draw it out according to the exigences of the public service, and on their intelligence and integrity we rely for a faithful discharge of these important duties. Now, sir, the President appoints these officers, and, from the construction put on the Constitution since the days of Washington, he can remove them at pleasure; if they thwart the plans of ambition, if they refuse to be the tools of corruption, or if they decline to use the public money for any purpose which the President may dictate, he can eject them from office, and substitute in their stead men of more pliant and less scrupulous character. This might happen under a Chief Magistrate who could have the folly to attempt a stretch of authority, if we resolve to keep this Government and the banks united. Would our situation be different, if this bill becomes a law? The officer in charge of the public property might be cajoled by his superior, or driven to a violation of his oath and his duty to the country; through him the President could bribe dishonest politicians, or raise a secret army to war on the rights of his fellow-citizens, or use the nation's money to gratify still lower propensities. Thus in either case, whether banks or individuals be the depositaries, the President will have an indirect control of the public money, so long as the power of removal from office is admitted, so long as subordinates must depend on the smiles and favor of the Chief Magistrate. The most prominent measure of the late Administration proves the truth of this argument; the Secretary of the Treasury refused to obey the President, and remove the deposites from the Bank of the United States; he was displaced, and his successor readily executed the mandate of his superior. Shame, then, on this hypocritical clamor against the great measure of reform! Where is the proposition to increase the power of the Executive? Where is the clause by which he can exercise more influence than at present? This attempt to deceive the people is worthy of scribbling partisans and travelling orators; it ought not to appear in this House, where we should assemble and deliberate like dignified statesmen. If gentlemen are fearful that the President may exercise an improper influence on the Department of the Treasury, the only way to remedy this evil is to effect an amendment of the Constitution; and to make that Department directly responsible to the representatives of the people. A proposal of this nature would involve grave considerations; it might be feared that the Chief Magistrate would be rendered weak and inefficient, or the Secretary of the Treasury himself become too powerful, or the Legislature would engross too much authority, and trample under foot the co-ordinate branches of the Government. But the passage of this bill cannot be an obstacle to any change which may be desired by the wisdom and patriotism of the country; the question now at issue concerns the keeping of the public money, and whether it be placed in banks or in the hands of our own officers for safety and disbursement, the ultimate control of it may be given at any time to whomsoever the voice of the nation shall direct.

The management of the "independent treasures" will require the appointment of a few more officers and clerks, and to this extent the patronage of the President must be increased, but it will be shown, in the progress of my remarks, that this is trifling in comparison with that which will be lopped off by separating the banks from the Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, the strongest feature of this bill is that denominated the "specie clause," which orders the revenue to be collected in gold and silver. This provision will go into operation gradually, to avoid the injurious consequences of a change too sudden, and to enable all classes to accommodate their affairs to the future condition of the currency. The enemies of this measure have denounced it as a scheme to prostrate the banks and the credit system; the demand of coin is considered a discrediting of paper issues, and the complete overthrow of the present order of things, and thence they have launched into a swollen eulogium of the glorious advantages of credit. The error of honorable gentlemen consists in not discriminating between a standard of value, and currency and credit; every Government is bound to furnish its people with the former, and every Government has performed that duty; but, as to credit and currency, these have, generally been left to those engaged in business; and it is now proposed that we shall not interfere with the relations of private individuals. If one man has earned more than he needs, the surplus is loaned to another, on whose industry and integrity he can depend. Money is lent and borrowed from a sense of mutual interest: this has been the case from the time of Adam, and will continue to the end of the world. Is there any thing in this bill to discourage men from using their own property, or making such contracts as their interests may dictate? Is there a clause prohibiting individuals or corporations from loaning and borrowing money, or receiving the promissory notes of whomsoever they may be willing to trust? The Federal Government is forbidden to treat paper as money, not for the purpose of dishonoring that which circulates, but because it should not discriminate between its citizens, by using the promissory note of one and refusing that of another, and because the interests of the whole society will be promoted by adopting a new policy. Sound credit is a powerful agent in the production of wealth, and the advancement of individual happiness; but gentlemen are greatly mistaken in supposing that the extravagances and corruptions of the banking system, have pushed this country so rapidly in the career of national prosperity. The fertility of a virgin soil, hitherto untouched by the ploughshare—the enterprising spirit of our people, which no difficulties can subdue—and the unfettered liberty enjoyed under our free institutions—have caused the wonderful development of the resources of this highly favored land. But, sir, let us take a view of the practical operation of this measure. One member declaims loudly on the benign effects of paper; another theorizes on the benefits to be derived from gold and silver. I shall endeavor to discover the real influence of this bill on the business of the country and the character of our institutions.

If the coin paid to the Government be hoarded up, great distress would certainly be produced through all classes of the community; but it is levied for the purpose of being used, it comes from the pockets of the people into the Treasury, and it will go to the public creditor to defray the expenses of Government. The head of a family may spend thousands of dollars, and yet rarely have, at the same time, more than a few hundreds; his affairs are so managed that his expenditure keeps pace with his income, care being taken to provide for any contingency that may reasonably happen. Thus it is with the Federal Government; its revenue is constantly accruing, and passing away in a similar manner, unless an Administration should have the madness to collect more than is wanted for necessary purposes. It is impossible, however, to expect an exact correspondence between receipts and expenditures; one or two millions are required for the mint, and allowance must be made for casualties, so that the Treasury will always have a considerable sum above its immediate liabilities. Persons well acquainted with the details of finance (and the calculation is easily made) have supposed that five millions of dollars would be the amount usually in the hands of public officers: whatever may be the annual income, this will be the extent of the demand for Government, and the remainder will go into circulation, or return to the coffers from which it came. When the system becomes established, its operations would be regular, and banks, merchants, and men of business, will conduct their affairs accordingly; the dealer in money will soon learn to foresee the amount of specie that may be called for, as also that which will assuredly come back to his vault by the course of trade, and thence may be known his ability to accommodate customers and borrowers. It is probable that the sum above-mentioned must be supplied by the banks, and they should be prepared for this additional demand for the precious metals. By the last report these institutions had thirty-three millions of dollars in coin, and upwards of four hundred millions in debts, whilst they owed much more than one hundred millions to the community. Can it be possible that corporations so rich, and having such entire control of the business of the country, are unable to redeem five millions of their own notes? Or is it reasonable to suppose that their usefulness would be destroyed by the refusal of the Government to use their paper? Sir, these professed friends of the banks are their worst enemies; they have done more injury to paper currency by prating about its weakness, and dragging the subject into politics, than the most frantic bullionist could effect by argument. I think better of these institutions than their political allies. I believe that they are perfectly able to answer the call made by this bill, and if they are not, they would soon fall without the help of external violence. But it is said that if the Government refuses paper, the people will follow its example, and in the general distrust, nothing but coin will be received with satisfaction. This result is not probable; so long as paper is convenient for commerce, and so long as it is redeemed promptly by those who issue it, the thunder of Washington will be felt no more than a popish bull. The greater governs the less, and the hundreds of millions used in the business of this vast and enterprising country cannot yield to the small dealings of the Government; the thousands who throng the avenues of commerce, and congregate in the busy marts, will consult their own interests and convenience, and not the wishes of politicians. General Jackson and his party were charged with endeavoring to destroy the late National Bank; and yet it became stronger among the merchants and traders, because they believed it to be sound; usefulness and safety, being the tests which govern the opinions of prudent and practical men. A few years ago the State of North Carolina forbade its officers to receive notes under five dollars, and made their circulation penal, and yet they came from the adjoining States, temporary convenience triumphing over principle. Gentlemen need not fear that confidence will be destroyed; the danger to be apprehended is too little suspicion, too much dependence on the honesty and intelligence of the mony dealers. The office of currency is to present a uniform standard of value, and furnish the means by which commodities may be exchanged and contracts regulated; in this country it is mixed, composed of coin and paper, the last greatly predonderating. The relations of business demand, and will have, a sufficiency of this circulating medium; the refusal of paper by Government will alter the proportions heretofore existing; there will be more specie and less paper; more of the substantial, and not quite so much of the convenient; more strength, and a little less activity.

When the public funds consisted of promissory notes, and were deposited in banks, they formed the basis of new loans, and in some cases were used as capital, though in reality they were the simple obligations of these institutions themselves. If, instead of having this deposite, they be called on to redeem five millions of previous promises, it is not astonishing that all interested in large issues should be violently opposed to this bill. According to safe practice, a banker can lend in paper three times more than he has in coin; and if he lose the advantage of the Federal revenue, his circulation will be curtailed probably to the amount of twenty millions of dollars. This result may be unpalatable to the receivers of dividends, and to those whose prospect of wealth is dependent on heavy loans and endless credit; but in placing a moderate and wholesome check on the manufacture of paper, this bill confers a great benefit on the people, who are deeply concerned in the maintenance of a sound and steady currency.

The history of banking shows a constant proneness to overaction; the anxiety of the stockholder to make large profits, and the greediness of the borrower, who too often is a mere speculator, seduce all parties beyond the limits of prudence. The former thinks that the demand for his notes is caused by the business of the country, and the latter imagines the supply to proceed from real, active capital. This may be true to a certain extent; but as paper increases, the price of property rises, and, reacting on the banks, induces greater expansion. These alternate influences continue to operate, until the condition of things is entirely artificial, the trading men being deeply indebted to the banks, and these utterly unable to redeem their obligations. While the flood is going on, it is easy and agreeable to glide in the current. High wages, high prices, and plenty of money, make us rejoice in the prosperity of the country; but when there is a reflux of the tide, and debtors are called on to pay, unrewarded labor, the sacrifice of property, and "hard times," mark the period of contraction. Self-interest is the guide and counsellor of these trading companies. The object of the capitalist is not to furnish a good currency to the people, but to make a profitable investment of his money. If it be advantageous to extend the business, it is done without caring for the soundness of the circulating medium; and if it be necessary to "stop accommodations," the decree goes forth amidst the groans and sorrows of a ruined community. In many cases, cunning and unscrupulous men creep into the command of these institutions; they act for the benefit of themselves, their friends, and confederates, regarding neither the interests of stockholders, nor the welfare of the country. Such persons are worthy of the gallows. But if the managers of the system be honest, and disposed to do their duty, how can they avoid the periodical crises under which we suffer? Where is the index to point out the limit of issues, beyond which it were unsafe to go? Who can tell when the demand for paper ceases to be natural, and the cravings of a morbid appetite begin to operate? It is said that the foreign exchange is the test; that, if specie be exported, the currency is redundant and should be contracted. This is a remarkable principle; the evil has occurred, and the community is injured, though the banker may moderate the mischief by listening to the warning received from countries across the water, that have a sounder currency. Should it happen, however, as is the case in England, that the foreign nation, with which we have dealings, has also expanded her circulating medium, the state of exchanges will not indicate the disease; or if we borrow large sums of money from European capitalists, the test is completely destroyed; indeed the rate of exchange would be in our favor, and yet we might be gasping from a plethora of paper. Sir, so long as companies, organized for private purposes, and pursuing private objects, have the entire control of the currency, and are assisted by the funds and power of the Government, so long will the standard of value be rendered uncertain, the condition of our citizens fluctuating, and their best interests placed in constant jeopardy. It is ridiculous to ask a remedy of those who are thinking only of themselves; these corporations have received their privileges from Government, and all that is now asked is to diminish, in a slight degree, the dangerous monopoly. The refusal of paper at the custom-house and land office will remind the banker that he is liable for the payment of his notes; he will be called on daily for the precious metals, and he will become more scrupulous in the use of his credit. I am not sanguine in the hope that this measure will produce a complete reform; it will certainly abate the the evil, and the Federal Government has not authority to do more. If these abuses continue to afflict the country, the power of the States must be invoked for a correction.

A learned member from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] seems to think that the prosperity of a country is commensurate with the quantity of its circulating medium. If the currency be something valuable, its increase is undoubtedly an evidence of industry and enterprise, but considered as a mere instrument of commerce, as a means to effectuate a particular purpose, as a measure of value and exchange, its excellence depends on its efficiency for the desired object. A railway between two large cities may be useful and profitable; but if another be constructed, though the former could convey all the passengers, and transport all the merchandise that was to be carried, at a fair price, the usefulness of both would be diminished, and a portion of the expenditure would be a loss to the community. If fifty millions of dollars be able to keep in motion the plough, the ship, and the shuttle, and perform the contracts of trade, what good could be obtained by doubling this sum? Money would be depreciated, and all kinds of property would rise in the market; corn might be sold for six dollars instead of three, but the farmer would pay in the same proportion for land and labor, for the comforts and luxuries of life, and for the education of his children. In a country where improvement is constantly going on, where new lands are opening, where cities are building, and the mechanic arts are rapidly approaching perfection, there must be a gradual increase of the currency, but it should be according to the wants of business not the caprice and selfishness of individuals. Gentlemen need not fear a deficiency; if trade be left to itself, if bankers be put on the same footing with other industrious classes, if credit be free as the air of heaven, the circulating medium will be adapted to the capabilities of the country, to its varied industry, and gigantic enterprises.

Honorable members are addicted to being eloquent when speaking of the happy effects of a swollen currency. The poor young man, starting into life with no capital but his moral qualities, the hidden resources of the country brought to light and ministering to our greatness, the high wages which carry solace to the wearied laborer and his humble family, are topics on which they disport in their peculiar strain of declamation. Why will they not sometimes view the dark side of the picture? Why will they not notice those periods of our history when the banks are retracing their hasty steps, when the price of all articles is brought down, when labor is almost worthless, when the debor is pressed to the earth, and one universal cry of distress pervades the land? Between the years of 1816 and 1821, during the existence of the late National Bank, fifty millions of paper were drawn from circulation; previous expansions had created the heaven in which gentlemen delight, but the banks were forced to call on their debtors in order to sustain their own credit, and thence began the fall of prices, the destruction of property, and the derangement of business, so well known to those acquainted with commercial affairs. Since that time, similar events have occurred, though not of a character so disastrous; and now we are in the midst of a paper revolution, unequalled for its extent and appalling consequences, crushing the merchants, embarrassing the artisan, and depriving the laborer of the common necessaries of life. Can these fluctuations benefit any class of the people, or advance any species of industry? If we are pushed forward by expansion, we are dranged farther back than our old position by contraction. This country does not need an artificial stimulus—the spirit of our people is not broken by the despot's frown; the reward of industry is tempting beyond example; the field for enterprise is rich and varied; the fear is that we may advance too rapidly, that our strength will not be equal to our growth, and that we may be wanting in those great qualities of virtue, stability and moral excellence, which elevate and adorn a nation.

Some gentlemen have been seized with a wonderful regard for the institutions of the States; lips which have poured forth scorn and derision upon the doctrine of State rights, have lately used most honeyed phrases, and invoked the South to interfere and reject a measure that will destroy their local banks. Sir, the real object of this pretended sympathy is to play on the feelings of honorable members, and use them to advance a measure condemned by our constituents, and utterly repugnant to their interests; the hope is to destroy this bill, and establish a great National Bank, which is so friendly to the States and so little hostile to their own corporations! Let us compare the effect of such an institution with that of the Independent Treasury. According to the act of 1816, the officers of the revenue received the notes of any bank which paid specie at the place of reception, or the notes of the National Bank payable any where. If the collector at Charleston took the paper of a local bank, it was deposited in the branch of the national institution, whose manager immediately demanded payment, which was effected by means of specie or a draft on Europe. This Government would not touch the notes of State banks, except for a moment, to suit the temporary convenience of the citizen, but it gave strength and circulation to the issues of the great mammoth. How then can the passage of this bill injure the State corporations? Under no circumstances can they be benefited by the receipt and disbursement of the Federal revenue. In addition to this, the paper of a National Bank would find its way to the channels now occupied by that of the local institutions having the advantages which would be conferred by law, and the credit which would be given by the countenance of Government, it would be a favorite with the public, and perform much of the duty now devolved on its rivals, and of course reap the best of the harvest. The friends of the National Bank are therefore the enemies of the State corporations; the refusal of paper in this bill will be a wholesome check on its issue, but we do not also present a competitor in the market for the business of the people.

Mr. Chairman, one of the strongest arguments in favor of this measure, is its tendency to introduce stricter habits of economy, and to make the people understand any malversation which may occur in the conduct of their affairs. In 1824 and 1828, under the pretence of collecting revenue, laws were passed imposing heavy taxes on the people of this country, for the purpose of protecting domestic manufactures. I shall not descant on the subject, but will merely remark that these enactments were considered unjust and oppressive by those who did not participate in the bounties granted; they were contrary to those modern principles of philosophy, which teach that commerce should be free and industry unrestricted; they were in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, which forbids that the Government should be prostituted to the interests of a particular class or section of this wide spread confederacy. Under their operation, large sums of money were collected from the people, which were not necessary for the public service; in a short time the national debt was liquidated, as if the present generation alone should pay the price of our liberties, and the most ridiculous, expensive, and unconstitutional schemes were projected to absorb the revenue, and yet there was a surplus in the Treasury of forty millions of dollars. Sir, does the history of Engand or France, or even Turkey, exhibit a policy so unjust and foolish? Monarchs have taken the property of their subjects to carry on war, by which their ambition might be gratified, their territories increased, and their families enriched; but in this Republic, established for the benefit of the whole people, whose ancestors refused to pay King George a small tribute, we have an instance of levying more taxes than are wanted, or could be wisely spent! This fund was deposited in the banks, which loaned it out to the real owners at an interest of six per cent. and kept them from feeling the burden that had been imposed; but finally, the authors of this miserable system of duplicity and plunder, to conceal the enormity of their conduct, proposed that these millions of dollars should be distributed among the States. Thus trading politicians, combined with the representatives of selfish and grasping interests, passed laws for the benefit of the few, at the expense of the many, and, when the result of the policy began to be manifest, a cunning scheme is devised to blind the eyes of the country, by returning the money which had been improperly seized, and by endeavoring to have it believed that this Government was a paternal benefactor. Sir, do you think that the juggling conspirators could have consummated the plan of deception, if the revenue had been paid in gold and silver, and been kept by the public officers? If forty millions of coin had been accumulated in the Treasury, every branch of industry would have suffered so intensely that the people would have seen the real nature of these hypocritical enactments, and with one voice, from Maine to Louisiana, demanded a repeal. Such is the beautiful operation of this measure, that the Government and banks are made to exert on each other an indirect but wholesome influence; the demand for specie will tend to keep the issues of paper within proper limits, and unjust or improvident legislation will receive a sure check from its bearing on the moneyed interests of the people.

Mr. Chairman, I have been amused at the various and contradictory objection which have been made to the passage of this bill. One member tells us that most of the coin will be collected at New York, and it must be transferred to different places where it may be wanted by the Government, and thence it will return by the course of trade to the city from which it came; he concludes therefore, that specie will be travelling about the country, and keeping commercial affairs in constant agitation, as if drafts, payable at the depositary in New York, and sent to St. Louis, for instance, would not be readily cashed by merchants or bankers of that city, who stand in need of Eastern funds, and thus prevent the movement of a single dollar. Another member opines that a great bank is to be erected, where all the specie of the country will be hoarded, and paper will be issued to take the place of our present currency, as if this bill countenances or approves of any such project, or does not contain provisions, which a fair and honorable statesman would consider utterly hostile to the life of a monster so obnoxious. A third gentleman is stuffed by his leaders with both these ideas; and not perceiving their inconstency, he pours them forth with all the gravity of conviction, and congratulates himself with having dealt a heavy blow on the Independent Treasury and its supporters, when his simplicity has only excited their pity or laughter. Sir, honorable members are compelled to resort to their old tactics; overthrown in argument, they create men of straw of vast dimensions, and bad propensities, against whom they war most lustily, or charges of corruption and imbecility are made against the Administration, which finally sinks into the awful crimes of buying a few flowers, or eating with a silver spoon, or using a cambric handkerchief. The object of this virulent slander and pretty persecution, is to divert the public mind from the real issue, to keep the people from considering the great questions which they are called to decide, and slyly elevate a party whose heart's desire is to establish a National Bank.

The beauties of such an institution have been often portrayed to this House, and to the country. A circulating medium at par throughout the Union—domestic exchanges regular, and at a small charge—the State banks compelled to redeem their issues—these are the boasted blessings to be conferred by a National Bank! It is certainly convenient for travellers to have a paper currency, that will be received in all the States; but they constitute an exceedingly small part of the community, and the trouble of taking a few gold pieces would save them from the loss and annoyance of using the notes of local corporations. This advantage is also counterbalanced by another consideration; it is not the ability of a National Bank, or the skill with which it might be managed, that gives a general currency to its bills, but the Federal Government receives them in payment of dues, and thus gives them credit in sections far distant from the place of redemption. Were the note of any bank or an individual stamped with such an authority, it also would go every where and be eagerly sought after; the granting of this favor to a special association is a great monopoly, and can only be justified by the overruling law of necessity.

Exchange between two points depends on the business of commerce, on the productions sold and the merchandise purchased, and on the relations subsisting between them as debtor and creditor. Natural causes, therefore, govern exchange, and if there be no tampering, no interference by the Legislature, it will always be on a proper footing; no body complains of exchange between New York and Liverpool, and merchants would think it ridiculous to speak of regulating it by a bank; for it is rarely much above or below the par standard. If a trader in New Orleans had one thousand dollars to pay a debt in Philadelphia, and a draft could not be bought on fair terms, he could transport the money by water, at the small expense of one or two per cent. This is done in all parts of the world, and where is the need of an artificial ruler, who will always have private interests in view, and secret objects to attain? When gentlemen talk on this subject, they should distinguish between the exchange of equal values, and the exchange of banker's paper. There is no difficulty about the first; and as to the various depreciations of the last, these must be corrected by ceasing to screen them from the penalties of the law, and by the stern sense of an honest community.

But, sir, we are told that a corporation of large capital, chartered by this Government, and sustained by its revenues, would furnish a paper medium equivalent to specie, would control the issues of State banks, and prevent those expansions and contractions of the currency that so often convulse the country. I grant that the powers of such an institution, wielded with prudence, wisdom, and patriotism, would produce a happy effect; and, if such qualities were often found among men, the State corporations themselves would not require a master, but would perform their duties faithfully. What reason have we to think, however, that more virtue, good sense, and love of country, will be found in the managers of a National Bank, than in those of the State institutions? Will not the offices of each be distributed by intrigue and favoritism? Will not all be equally desirous of large dividends? Will not all be closely importuned by needy borrowers and restless speculators? Where is the test of sound operations that will be accessible to the one and not to the other? Why should the President of the great company heed the signs of a coming storm, and prepare for its fury, more readily than his humble and weaker brethren? Sir, the truth is manifest, that the same tendency to overaction pervades the whole system—the same liability to err, and the same want of means to avoid the fatal consequences of mismanagement. Great Britain has a National Bank of immense resources; and yet, from 1797 to 1823, that corporation could not redeem its own notes. Within the last twelve months, it has been on the verge of suspension, having been saved by borrowing millions from France; and so far from controlling the small banks, her directors have charged the late disasters on those companies. Behold, too, the Bank of the United States, that has attracted so much attention during the last few years! Was the paper currency sound, stable, and worthy of confidence, from 1816 to 1821? Have there been no sudden expansions and contractions, at one time maddening the public mind with the exciting stimulus, and at another destroying the hopes and blighting the prospects which a selfish policy had caused to spring forth? Let the merchant, let the honest citizen, answer at the bar of his country. Where now is this great institution, the model of finance, the cynosure of all eyes, the everlasting topic of eloquence and declamation? Almost in a state of hopeless bankruptcy, the pity of its friends, and the scorn of its enemies. Ought this to have been its condition at the end of a long career, if there be so much magic, so great safety and excellence in a National institution? Where was the skill and wisdom of its directory, the sagacity which could penetrate into the future? where the lofty bearing of strength and confidence? Sir, have they passed away in the energy that marked the progress of a bold and violent warfare?

Whatever force may be in the statements of honorable gentlemen as to the usefulness of their favorite measure, is weakened by the fear that its privileges might be exerted to the detriment of the country. We have a diversity of climate, soil, and population. One State is agricultural, another manufacturing, a third commercial, or there may be rivals in the same pursuit. And is there no danger that an institution of great power might be prostituted to sectional purposes? A charter granted to-morrow would aggregate capital from all parts of the trading world. It would soon belong to foreigners and vagrant natives, and it would be controlled by a few merchants and brokers of New York or Philadelphia. In these men would be united the money dealer, and the local partisan; profit would be the first object, and the aggrandisement of their city or section the next consideration. Would they care for the well-being of a distant community, if it came in conflict with their own interests? Would an appeal from those with whom they have no sympathies of feeling reach their hearts and influence their conduct? Cold and calculating, they might sweep from existence the State banks, established to foster the dawning commerce of our ancient sovereignties, and create a dependence on themselves throughout this extensive empire. They might concentrate the trade of the country, at particular points, when the wishes and welfare of those whose industry has brought it into existence, would give it another direction. Sir, can I vote to place the happiness and the prosperity of my constituents at the command of strangers, who know them not? Can I give to a few bankers the control of their commerce, and the regulation of their industry? Should I become the servile instrument of cunning politicians, who, having national words on their lips, are entirely governed by local feelings, and assist in sacrificing my own home and my own friends, to pamper the pride and increase the wealth of the people of other sections? No, sir, let this Government be separated from all banks, let it raise aloft the standard of the Constitution as the guide of the country and the protector of the people; let it warn men of business from the shoals and quicksands, hid under the smooth current of unsound credit; let it be the signal of safety in the hour of distress, the solid bulwark of national honor amid the rage of disastrous speculation and the petty tricks of temporary expediency! The enemies of this great doctrine have endeavored to degrade it into a mercenary scheme for the benefit of the public officers. This view is more consistent with the narrowness of their own minds and the bitterness of political feeling, than the important consequences that will flow from its adoption, either to the advantage or the injury of our descendants. My own opinion is, that the connection which has existed between the Government and the moneyed class of our citizns, was corruptive of both. It did not advance the permanent interests of society, and, if prolonged, might so change the character of our institutions, as to render profitless the blood and treasure that were expended in their establishment. This subject has caused all the strife and turmoil that have made the last eight years so memorable in our history. The party in power refused to recharter the late National Bank, whose stockholders immediately threw themselves into the arms of the Opposition, and the question became the prominent topic of political controversy. General Jackson was charged with designing to tamper with that institution; and he retorted with accusing the Bank of using its funds in operating on the public mind. Members of Congress and men of influence received loans or high compensations for service, which were stigmatized as bribes and the varying state of the Bank's discounts, was said to be without reference to the business of the country, and intended to produce panic and uneasiness thoughout the land. The removal of the deposites was proclaimed an act of tyranny, and defended as necessary to curb a bold and intriguing corporation. The substitution of the State banks to keep the public money was hailed as a deliverance, whilst the Opposition considered them mere political machines, brought up to aid the policy of a corrupt Administration. I know nothing of the truth of these charges and criminations, though to this day they are believed by thousands of honest and intelligent citizens. The secret doings of factions, and the private arrangements of public men can never be fully understood; but in matters of this kind a well grounded suspicion is sufficient for an argument, and patriotism bids us to be ever watchful in guarding the purity of our noble institutions. An association of capitalists prays for the grant of extraordinary privileges, even the power of controlling the commerce, regulating the industry, and valuing the property of fifteen millions of people. This is refused; and it is unreasonable to suppose that these men would use uncommon efforts to attain their objects? Would they scruple to form an alliance with needy politicians, that were in search of new weapons to attack their adversaries? Would they hesitate to work zealously in the cause of a party, whose elevation will redound to their own personal advantage? Or, let us suppose that an ambitious Executive shall unite with the moneyed power for mutual assistance, the one using the influence of station to obtain for his ally a valuable monopoly, and the other endeavoring to wrest from the people obedience to a tyrannical chief, by adroitly operating on their business and affecting their pecuniary condition. If a President, endeared to the people by his eminent qualities, and sustained by the patronage of the Government, found it difficult to withstand a wealthy corporation, is it not to be feared that a coalition of the political and moneyed influences of the country would be perfectly irresistible? No one supposes that a direct assault would be made on public liberty, for we are not prepared to bend the knee to a master, but the offices of the country would be used to gratify the ambition of corrupt politicians, and its legislation would be directed according to the selfish purposes of individuals, and not for the glory and welfare of the whole people. Should this bill become a law, and the declaration go forth that privileges and immunities be no longer conferred on private associations, our politicians will not be tempted from the path of duty by the hope of making selfish partisans, and no class in our extensive country will have its feelings and opinions of public affairs affected by other considerations than those of enlarged patriotism.

Honorable gentlemen have spoken strongly of the injury inflicted on all branches of industry by the strife which we have witnessed during the last eight years. They have been pleased to say that the "war on the currency" has deranged business, destroyed confidence, and wasted the means of the people; and they conclude that nothing but a return to the old paths will insure safety to trade, stability to agriculture, and wages to the honest laborer. Sir, I draw a different moral from the past; it teaches that a barrier should be raised between politicians and bankers, that no future opportunity should be given for agitating the country, and mixing private affairs with the intrigues of politics. What careth the Jew for the cries of his victim, if he obtain the "pound of flesh?" When did the spirit of party listen to the suggestions of reason? The ignorant and bigoted partisan will use any weapon to overthrow an opponent—patriotism has no abiding place in his heart—the sentiment of honor is buried in the desire of success—nothing too low or contemptible for his alliance—nothing so sacred as to escape pollution—ay, he would sacrifice the honor of his father, and the fame of his mother, to gain a miserable triumph. It is wise, then, to separate the Government from the business of the people. If gentlemen succeed and renew the connection, the struggle will be continued by those who honestly entertain the principles we advocate; and the mere Swiss, who fight for bread and popularity, will ever be ready to keep up strife and turmoil. Is it not best, then, for the agriculturist, the merchant, the mechanic, and the laborer, to have peace and certainty? the dews of heaven will fall, and the grain will spring forth under the industry of man—economy, skill, and ingenuity will push to supremacy our infant manufacures—enterprise will spread over every ocean our glorious banner, and all that is necessary, is protection from the Government.

Every man knows what he can do, what are his means, and what his capacity; the eagerness for improving his condition will stimulate him to great efforts; the resources of the country will be developed, and its wants supplied by the good sense of the people, if they be left to themselves. Freedom is the life-blood of our institutions: let it be extended to all things and to every occupation. If bank paper be useful, it will continue in the service of the country; if it be a curse, time will moderate the evil, until a subsutitute can be prepared. But let the Federal Goverment desist from granting special favors, or conferring extraordinary privileges on any class of the people. Wherever this has occurred, under whatever pretence rulers have acted, the invariable result has been to oppress the great mass, and ultimately to diminish the strength and wealth of the country. Great Britain prohibits the entry of foreign corn, until the domestic article rises to a high price, and thousands of the poor rarely have their hunger satisfied. The excuse for such legislation is most patriotic; but when it is remembered that Parliament is composed of landholders, who must have large incomes to support them in luxury and extravagance, every sensible man will behold a mean and sordid motive in English statesmen. In the annals of Rome, we read of contests between the patricians and plebeians; and one would suppose that the latter designed to rob the former of their property; but modern histerians have discovered that the Senate wished to divide the national domain among its own members, and this was the origin of their intestine commotions. Whether the Government be monarchical, aristocratical, or of any other form, there will always be an effort to use it for private purposes. The king will think of himself and family; the nobles will desire to perpetuate their authority; and the ambitious portion of a Republic will struggle to escape from an equality odious to their pride, and destructive to their hopes of living without labor and at the expense of their neighbors. Sir, now is a propitious time for destroying this loathsome seed of discord; let us send forth the declaration that no class of the people, and no kind of industry, is to receive peculiar patronage from this Goverment; all should depend on their own exertions, and every occupation should live or die, according to its fitness for the country, and the skill of those who pursue it.

These are the doctrines contained in the bill on your table—they are the doctrines of the Constitution—they are the bulwarks of civil liberty; and without them, any form of Government will become a nuisance and a tyranny. And whilst we are struggling in the glorious cause, will the people forget their faithful friends, and desert their ancient principles? Can they be drawn off by a hue and cry about small faults, and permit an enemy, whom they have often conquered, to re-establish his power? Are low debauch and disgusting charlatanry to be substituted for reason and reflection? If so, we are unworthy of the blessings for which our fathers suffered, and we are prepared to be slaves.

IN SENATE,
THURSDAY, June 25, 1840.

Mr. ANDERSON addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: The bill upon your table is now on its final passage; and I rise, sir, with very great reluctance, to ask the indulgent attention of the Senate, while I state, in the briefest possible manner, the reasons which will induce me to record my vote against it. There are occasions, sir, when a man may not be excused for his silence; and so I think my duty, under the present circumstances, to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, demands of me that I should bear, thus publicly, my testimony against this dangerous and searching measure.

My distinguished colleague, before the recommitment of the former bill, took the occasion, then, to express his entire disapprobation of the adoption of any general bankrupt law at this time, whatever might be its provisions, and adverted to the fact that he had no reason to suppose that Tennessee wished a system of this kind. I concurred most fully in the views which he entertained, and have now to state, that I have not myself, up to this time, received any evidence that the opinions of the people of Tennessee are in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law. It may well be supposed, therefore, that at the moment when such a mighty power is about to be brought into existence, in a crisis of such peculiar character as that which now pervades this country, I should feel the deepest anxiety for the result, which may, perhaps, fall most unwelcomely, and unexpectedly, upon my constituents.

This bill provides that all persons may become bankrupts at their election, upon petition, verified by oath, and stating their inability to pay their debts; and that a certain other class, including the merchants, shall be liable to be made bankrupts, under particular and specified circumstances. It has been partially modified with a view to protect the interests of the creditor, by amendments offered by my distinguished friend [Mr. WRIGHT] from New York. Several propositions which he made, intended to effect this object to a greater extent, I regret to say it was the pleasure of the Senate, by very small majorities, to reject. I voted for most of them, in order to make this bill less exceptionable than I believed it to be, as originally reported by the select committee. Still, sir, I look upon it as a measure teeming with mischiefs of no ordinary character, to the highest welfare of the Republic.

I shall not now advert to the constitutional questions which this bill involves. They have already been fully and ably discussed by others, and I shall, therefore, call the attention of the Senate to the expediency and probable results of this measure. I confess, sir, I cannot contemplate its passage, without the deepest solicitude for the interests and character of our common country. Without, as it seems to me, sufficient evidence of public opinion, we are pushing it forward with an ardor, and a haste, for which we can offer no adequate justification. We have before us the progress of more than fifty years of fruitful experience, and it is now nearly forty since we dismissed from our statute book, with disgust and indignation, the trial of this system, which was made in eighteen hundred. We had then a population of not much more than four millions of people, and the difference between that number and sixteen millions—between thirteen independent sovereignties and twenty-six of greater magnitude—with our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures multiplied in a far higher proportion—with the pursuits of men not only augmented, but in the general progression of every thing immensely diversified beyond any former example, has added much to the increased importance of the question under consideration, and, as I think, to the doubtful character of its policy. Sir, in such circumstances, what are we about to do? We seem upon the very verge of exercising a power which is destined to search this vast and extended population—to try its most vital interests—to take absolute and summary possession of the great relations of creditor and debtor—to supersede, at a single step, long established opinions—to overlay the varied customs and legislation of twenty-six States, differing widely in their interests. All this is to be done by one great, paramount, inflexible, and uniform law—a law which tramples beneath its foot the private rights of individuals, and the judicial power of the States, which interposes for relief, or remedy, between the creditor and the debtor—a law which carries with it into twenty-six distinct and independent jurisdictions more than the power of the writ of summons, and more than the power of the writ of possession. Release is founded upon the oath, and fraud legally presumed at the will of the applicant. The house and the lands of the citizen are to be taken without notice or preparation. The whole system of things is to be changed by the single move of the creditor or debtor. In a contradictory spirit of concession, you give to the most wicked of either class the right to destroy others, and compel, by your policy, the more virtuous to enter into the competition. Accidents and oaths, under this law, may accomplish either end, and it offers the singular spectacle of granting the immunities of voluntary bankruptcy to all, upon the condition that the creditors may make a particular class of debtors liable to their compulsory process. Thus the catastrophe of bankruptcy is to be completed, where undisturbed industry, prudence, integrity, and talent, might relieve the incumbent, without the odium of the injury forever clinging to his name, and rankling in his heart.

If the proposition were now made for the first time, to grant this power, I have no doubt it would be refused by a large majority of the American people. It has an extent, as it stands in the Constitution, far beyond what could originally have been designed, and which partly arises from the more fully developed, and better understood nature and construction of our peculiar Government.

Hitherto the danger has been that of obtaining power by construction, but this is so broad and so comprehensive, in its literal sense, that we find ourselves resorting to the expedient of reducing it by appealing to the standard of English authority. And, sir, there is no country in the world where its practical influence would be so peculiarly felt as in ours, both by the people and the Government. It would turn the fears and the hopes of the one to an entire concentration upon the other, and bring that other into the possession of a strength which would give it a consolidated mastery, ultimately, over all things, over men, and over States. In this may be found, in part, connected with other intrinsic objections, the explanation why the exercise of the power was so long postponed, though pressed from seventeen hundred and ninety, annually, until eighteen hundred; and why it was afterwards so early discontinued, and has been since so steadily resisted, until at length, yielding under a succession of panics and disasters, the natural product of the vast bank power of the land, we seem about to re-enact this great statute sponge, to be applied, retroactively, upon all the pecuniary responsibilities in the country. Sir, this long postponement, the early repeal of the law, the resistance against its introduction since, present to us, the instructive portion of the history of this subject, and we ought to regard it, until we shall be otherwise informed, as expressive of the deep sense of the American people in favor of the policy of leaving the power entirely dormant in the General Government, and to be supplied by the legislation of the States.

The first blow which will be struck, I fear, will fall heavily upon the moral feeling of society. It will superinduce on the one side temptations to seek immediate relief by a single act of surrender, where perseverance and skill would, in the course of a few years, recover the unfortunate debtor from his embarrassments. It is certainly true, that the very offer of legal relief, in the first moment of a public panic, is an invitation to cease to make efforts, and will practically be an extinguishment of all debts, without a struggle to pay. On the other hand, it bestows a power upon the creditor which it is illusory to suppose will not be often abused, and as often productive of the most mischievous results. The whole basis of the measure invites fraud on the one side, and suspicion on the other. You bring into active application two utterly antagonistical principles—the newly awakened hope of the debtor to escape from responsibility, and the vigilance of the creditor to overtake the debtor for a delinquency, which he may not disregard, for fear of leaving to him the ultimate advantage of the law upon his own terms. The main pillar of credit, that confidence which is mutually inspired by integrity and by justice, will be struck down at a single blow. You destroy, at once, all mutuality of feeling, of forbearance, and of interest. No compositions will ever be proposed, and which might be effected at less expense and less risk between the parties. It will be a race of escape and pursuit, and in the present condition of the country, we will confound the honest and persevering debtor, who would finally pay, with the man of desperate fortunes. We will make an indiscriminate sweep of the unfortunate who yet bear themselves against the tide, with the bold and reckless speculators, who are already ruined; and with this solitary act we will render memorable, in all time to come, the present epoch of our calamity, by a great legal catastrophe, fashioned with singular zeal, anxiety, and labor, from our own hands. If it were possible to limit the effect of the bill before us, I am not prepared to say that it would be without a useful and happy influence upon the condition of society. But, sir, one of the very features which recommend it most strongly to the support of its warmest advocates, is, that it goes to the extent of every interest, and every class in the community, not by merely discharging the contracts of those who are hopeless and remediless, but that the offer of emancipation from debt is universal. The practical effect of this, we know, will spread itself through all the relations of life, but the final end no man can tell. When you shall have broken up the moral bond of union which strengthens and protects the transactions of men, as much as law itself legalizes them, it is impossible to estimate the consequences. I speak not of solitary exceptions—the plundered, willing or unwilling, must struggle with the plunderers—the virtuous with the vicious—and the blow which fells to the earth your next neighbor, will carry with it another, and another, without being able to say who shall escape, and who shall be counted last.

This measure, let it be remembered, has been urged by an eloquent appeal to our sympathies; that he, whose head was bowed down, should be lifted up; that the tears of his wife, and his innocent children, would be dried; that the wretched and forlorn should again take their place in society. Sir, no man, I trust, feels more deeply for his fellow man than I do, or would go farther to relieve him under the pressure of distress. But, sir, does justice, does humanity require that we should save some by destroying others? That to dry tears, which already flow, we should strike new fountains from which they would be shed more abundantly? That we should multiply the unfortunate in order to relieve them? That we should disregard the claims, the interests, and condition of the largest business class of men in the nation; and that, of all others, they should be made to feel that we legislate not for them, but for those who are already desperate? Is this fair? Is it just? Is it wise? Is it humane? Will you lay your hand most heavily upon the commercial community, under a mere suspicion that they may deal harshly with others, while your generosity is poured redundantly upon the head of the speculator? Is this, sir, the boasted love of that great interest? Is this the tender mercy which the mercantile class is to receive at the hands of their peculiar friends? Sir, it is the embrace of death—death to credit—death to confidence; that confidence which procures rank and station to the trader; which sustains him in many a sore and trying struggle; that confidence which, when every honest effort is expended, would, upon a surrender of his effects, discharge him from his liabilities; that confidence, above all, which reposes upon our justice and our wisdom!

Mr. President, this measure has, to my mind, the most peculiar aspect. It comes before us under the potent auspices of the most singular compromise ever presented in legislative history. I repeat, it is no more or less than that the voluntary bankrupt is to be allowed to escape from his creditor, upon condition that creditors may be allowed to oppress a particular class of debtors. The first would not be permitted, but it is the condition of power to the latter; and, on the other hand, the latter is to be conceded on the condition of that special benefit to the former. It seems to me, sir, that if either would be wrong, and publicly mischievous singly, because of the peculiar state of the country, that the two united will certainly augment the measure of injury. I am unable to understand the philosophy of this subject in any other way. It has been contended that neither, alone, ought to be adopted; if so, a compromise, by which both may be efficient, must therefore, I think, add a double force to the objection that lies against this great experiment.

Sir, I would address Senators, in the language of Mr. Burke, when he wrote to his constituents, with whom he had differed: "I would appeal from the opinions which you now have, to the opinions which you will have five years hence." From the present excitement, to the practical results which we are now preparing, and when every other influence will have passed away, except that experience which will then come home to the feeling and observation of all men!

The policy of this measure may be partly estimated by the amount of debt which exists in the country, and upon a large portion of which it will be immediately directed. It is probably a fair calculation, that the mercantile debt owed by that portion of the country which is now within the range of the suspended banks, is equal to one hundred millions of dollars. Of this, I understand the computation for the city of New York alone to be upwards of sixty millions. The remainder may be divided between Philadelphia and Baltimore. This debt is to be extinguished in two methods; by the voluntary act of the bankrupt, and by the compulsory process which you give to the hand of the creditor. The contracts were made in a period of the highest prices and a swollen currency. That currency has been reduced by the curtailment of the banks, and with their action has fallen the price of wages and of property. They were the primary causes of the first, as they have been of the last; and although over one-half of the nation they are now suspended, and refusing to pay their own notes in specie, the utmost extent of their paper currency is not more than one hundred millions of dollars—not equal to the precious metals which they have driven into retreat. It is in this state of things that you propose this measure of voluntary and compulsory bankruptcy. And, sir, to whom have you given that power of coercion, upon mere petition, without being verified upon oath? without even the right of traversing the question of fraud by a trial by jury, until after the decree is entered up—until after the blow is struck? We most graciously propose to bestow it upon those very banks, as well as upon individuals—the banks, to whom we have been told, in this debate, that there is a sum of four hundred and sixty millions of dollars owed by the citizens of the United States. They are to be brought into the great field of action, and to become the potent competitors in the general work of ruin and distress. Are we prepared for a scene like this? One vast scene of disaster, of which no man can tell the end? One wide, deep, and lasting excitement. Sir, the country will stand aghast at the practical march of this measure, with its train of clients, of debts, of agents, of assignees, of lawyers, of courts of power, and of patronage! And who will reap the harvest? Most surely, not the creditors! What is the experience of those who bore a part in the administration of the bankrupt act of eighteen hundred? I have before me the testimony of one whose talents and character entitle his opinions to the highest respect. I am not disposed to surrender a question of this magnitude to the mere authority of names; but Mr. Tazewell of Virginia delivered this testimony in the Senate, upon the debate on the bankrupt bill in eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, and spoke of that which he personally knew, and which no man will venture to controvert, and which I have no doubt, upon examination, will be found to be sustained by the facts that transpired in almost every State of the Union. I beg leave, sir, to read his statement. He says: "When the former bankrupt law was in existence, he resided in a seaport town, and was engaged in almost every case of bankruptcy that occurred during its operation; and he could assure the Senate that he never knew a solitary case, in which the creditor obtained one cent. The debtors had often large estates—there was a large amount of property somewhere; but by the time it had been filtered through the hands of the assignees, of the commissioners, and their deputies, and agents, and this, and that, and the other officer, appointed to act upon it, not a fraction was left for the creditor. The whole had been absorbed in its progress." And such, sir, I have no doubt, will be the progress of this measure, in the contact and process of agents and of courts.

There is another consideration connected with this subject, which, I think, is entitled to some weight, and ought to be felt, at least by those who complain of the expenditures of this Government. The total sum which will, in all probability, be extinguished, either by payment or discharge, cannot fall much short of two hundred millions of dollars. The number of bankrupts will be, perhaps, not less than two hundred thousand. I have heard it estimated to be much greater. Be this as it may, it is very certain that your courts, as at present constituted, cannot possibly execute the immense mass of business—the almost endless suits, in addition to the separate cases of bankruptcy, which will be cast upon them. It is true that this bill provides that they shall be considered as always open to applications under the act, but their number is too few to enable them to go through but a small portion of the causes. You will be compelled to increase the number of your judges, and subdivide your present districts, or to create a special set of commissioners, for the sole purpose of executing this law. Let those who are the special friends of this measure, be prepared to take also this responsibility. It will be found to be one of no inconsiderable magnitude.

The period now fixed, at which it is to take effect, is the first of February next. Why not then postpone any legislation until the next session of Congress, as we shall have, in the interval, the opportunity of returning to our constituents, and consulting them upon a subject scarcely inferior in importance to any which may require their consideration? Or is it possible that the anxiety to pass this bill will not brook delay? Sir, that delay would bring back upon us the judgment which may reverse the decision which we are probably this day to make.

Mr. President, I fear it is in vain to hope for the defeat of this measure. But, sir, I think it would have been prudent, in the midst of the present excitement and pressure, to have trusted a little longer to the forbearance and magnanimity of the creditor, to the honesty, the industry, and the perseverance of the debtor. In Tennessee, sir, like every other portion of this Union, we are considerably in debt; and although we cannot pay to-day, or to-morrow, or next day, we are essentially a solvent and a paying people. We want no sponging retroaction—but will, in the end, with few exceptions, pay the last cent for which we are liable. But establish this law, and though it may cast the sunshine of hope upon the path of many a worthy and unfortunate man, who is bent beneath the burden of his disasters, it will just as surely overshadow with misfortune others of equal merit, who would, if undisturbed, pass triumphantly through the impending calamities. For every bankrupt it may relieve, the very moral, as well as compulsory power of its provisions will follow, pari passu, to add its victim to that object of your mercy. The very mercy of this twofold system will stimulate the fears of the creditor, who will most naturally avail himself of every advantage against the debtor, whom the law has armed with the choice of his own fortunes, and we shall exhibit the great national spectacle of fierce passions and private plunder, overruling the mastery of every nobler feeling, under the influence of such temptations as few can resist, and the impulse of such a revolution as none can stay.

Instead of being a measure to cure the evils under which we are suffering, it will propagate bankruptcies with a prolific hand. Whatever may be the theory of gentlemen upon this subject, however they may expect to bring peace, hope, and joy to the bosom of the ruined, there is another side of this picture, upon which the statesman cannot look without apprehension and doubt; it is where these are to be seen on whom ruin will be brought. The law will take its course. The fears and cupidity of men will sweep over the land in one deep and rapid stream! No industry, no integrity, no perseverance, no probable prospect of success can arrest it. I would that we could pause before we adopt this terrible and delusive measure. There is nothing in the history of the past to assure us of the wisdom of the step we are about to take.

If the Constitution contemplates such a measure as this for the protection of commerce, our prosperity, for nearly forty years, is proof that it is not demanded. It is said to have this basis for its policy in England, but with all her advantages, and the aid of its protection and encouragement, we have advanced many per cent. in the proportion of the whole, beyond her commercial and navigating interests. As a permanent measure, it would be found, as I think, to have no such influence. Even as a temporary remedy, the power is too dangerous, and the consequences are too alarming.

Let us pause before we pass this bill. It will array the North against the South. It will engender a suspicion, a distrust, a deep rooted prejudice, which can scarcely be obliterated during the quarter of a century. It will be a standard subject of reference for the guidance and action of the next generation, and instead of promoting the prosperity of commerce, I fear it will materially affect its best interests, particularly by its premature adoption.

Besides all this, the country has not had half time to right itself—to recover from the stupor of its extravagance—to return to habits of economy—to make a steady, united, and persevering effort to pay its debts. Let us, therefore, look not so much to fear as to hope—to despair as to a firm resolve to pay—to the forbearance of creditors—to the justice and industry of debtors. Our countrymen are full of a noble love, and a noble confidence towards each other; and it becomes us, as the grave advisers and lawgivers of the land, not to weaken, discourage, or destroy these sacred relations. We may rely upon it, sir, public opinion is not fully ripe for this measure. The time may come when it may demand some system of this kind, for relief and for remedy; but let us not hastily and prematurely, at the first alarm, produce a revolution in our laws, and the laws of twenty-six States, which, when put into motion, cannot be arrested by a hand less powerful than our own. Let us not be borne down by the mental pressure of the moment, but standing erect, with a wise forecast, ask ourselves the question, how this will be, after the experiment has been passed, and the experience of years has sealed its character?

DISTRICT BANKS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 1, 1840.

The following bill from the Senate, extending the charters of the banks in the District of Columbia, coming up in order, viz:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the charters of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the 4th day of July, 1842, unless Congress shall, in the mean time, otherwise order and direct, upon condition that neither of said banks shall issue and pay out the notes of any other bank, banker, or banking institution or corporation, which is in a state of suspension or non-payment of its liabilities in specie; and upop the further condition that the said banks, nor either of them, shall take a stay of execution on any judgment recovered against them in any case whatever, nor appeal from such judgment, nor take a certiorari thereon, except on an affidavit of merit.

After some remarks by Messrs. W. C. JOHNSON and ADAMS in favor of the bill,

Mr. PETRIKIN addressed the CHAIR, and was recognised by the SPEAKER as being entitled to the floor, in opposition to Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, who claimed it on the ground that he had, out of courtesy, given way to Mr. ADAMS. Mr. PETRIKIN having insisted on his right, under the rules, the SPEAKER decided that he was correct, and he proceeded as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have known for years, that banks and their agents claimed and possessed exclusive rights and privileges on all occasions; and that the claims of individuals, here and elsewhere, have been, in most instances, postponed at their wink and nod. I am glad that, for once, a humble individual has been able, on this floor, to have his rights respected in opposition to these powerful institutions. I am opposed to the recharter of these banks in the way they demand it to be done; for, Mr. Speaker, they do not merely request a renewal of their charters, but they demand it.

Weare told that the present bill must be acted upon immediately, and passed by a pliant vote. Individuals have to petition for their rights; they have to ask respectfully, year after year, without being able to get a hearing before Congress, or a redress of their grievances, (and such is the case even with the war worn soldier, the widow, and the orphan,) but when the agents of banks, their presidents, cashiers, and directors command it, all business, both public and private, must be laid aside, and Congress is required, and when so required must do for the banks all that they ask; and not content with that, the banks must have it done without delay and without debate. What is it that is now demanded by the banks of this District? Why, sir, we are asked, ay, peremptorily commanded, to pass a law sanctioning their violations of law, and the rights of the people. We are asked to legalize swindling and fraud of every species, without any regard to the rights of the community. Let an attempt be made to amend the charter of a bank, and they are met at once with the cry of "an infringement of contracts," "a violation of chartered rights," &c. &c; though banks claim the right to violate their contracts with impunity, and demand the sanction of the constituted authorities for the grossest frauds. The banks, while in a state of suspension, by which they violate a solemn contract of promise to pay on demand, have the barefaced impudence to ask Congress to give its sanction to crime, alleging as a reason for it that it is for the benefit of the people. We are told that the people ask for the recharter of these banks. I well know what is meant by these bankers, when they say that the people require us to legalize their swindling. By the term people is meant banks and bankers, not the mass of the citizens; not those whom a Whig member a few days since, on this floor, called "the rabble;" not the laboring man, mechanic, and farmer, who, by the sweat of their brows, support their country, but the nabob, who rides in his coach and four through the streets of this city, and the speculator, who, vampyre like, sucks the hearts blood of the industrious and laboring part of the community. These are they who are called "the people" by the bankers. I aver, sir, that a large majority of the people of this District are opposed to the rechartering of these banks. But a few, in comparison to the whole number of he people, are indebted to the banks. I would venture to say, if the truth could be ascertained, that of the whole number of persons resident in the District at this time, exclusive of members of Congress, and the officers and directors of banks and their connections, that there are not three hundred individuals who owe the banks one dollar.

We are told that if these charters are not renewed, a great deal of distress will be produced among the people. This I deny, because, as I have said before, the mass of the people owe the banks nothing, and the bankers will be cautious how they distress each other. There being no elections in this District, real panics will not answer any political purpose; but an imaginary panic is now in full force here, with a view to operate on Congress; for if we look around us, we see very few symptoms of distress among those who deal in banks, that is, if we are to judge from their manner of living, and the extravagance of their habits. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that our refusal to recharter these banks would produce distress among a part of the people of the District who happen to be their debtors, is that any reason why we should act in direct violation of every principle of justice, by legalizing the frauds and violations of law which these banks have committed? When was crime punished without producing some distress? When was any great political or moral reform obtained without individual suffering? And what greater evil could exist than legalized swindling by the few at the expense of the many? What greater moral and political reform could take place for the benefit of our country than to reform the banking system of this District as an example to other evil doers? We are not to inquire whether it is expedient or inexpedient to comply with the demands made of us, but we must first inquire what do justice and the public good require at our hands.

Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed the operation of these speculators upon the people of this District, and throughout the Union. We have seen the effects of their systematized violations of law and common honesty on the industrious, honest laborers of the country, who have been cheated out of their hard earnings by the worthless depreciated paper issued by the banks. We have on record before us, that these very banks now asking us to extend their charters, have three times, in the short space of six years, suspended specie payments, depreciated their stock and notes, and that their officers and directors have purchased them, thus depreciated, at a discount of from ten to fifty per cent.—defrauding in this way the unsuspecting widows and orphans of the District. I repeat that we have proof before us that the banks of this District have three times flooded the country with their irredeemable paper, knowing that they did not intend, nor could not do, what their notes on their face promised; and that they as often swindled the poor people by purchasing their paper themselves at from ten to fifty per cent. discount. We know that they have four times had their swindling doings legalized by Congress, and they are the subjects of the sympathy of the bank advocates on this floor. Is not this a pretty commentary on the morality of those who composed the Congresses that passed these acts? And shall we again be operated upon by the banks, to legalize for a fifth time such vilely dishonest transactions? Are those banks deserving your pity and sympathy? Will the Democrats in this House violate their solemn obligation made before God and the country, to faithfully represent their constituents, by obeying the demands of these swindling insolvent corporations? I hope not, and that we will exhibit to the world—what is an anomaly in these times—one legislative body, a majority of which is not under the control of the necromancy of banks, or operated upon by the talismanic influence of bank notes.

Mr. Speaker, it was my lot to be a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia during the session of 1837-8, when these banks applied for a recharter; and to me was assigned by that committee the duty of examining and inquiring into their condition at that time. I made the attempt, and prosecuted it as faithfully as time and circumstances would permit; and although I had to take their own statements in writing, yet I learned enough to satisfy me that they were a rotten profligate concern, unable to pay their liabilities, and practising a gross imposition on the public. Having had an opportunity to know a little about them, I shall offer a few amendments to the bill from the Senate; not such as I would wish to have enacted; not such as will fully protect the public against those corporations; but as much or more than I expect will be carried. I have before me the lesson of bank influence in the State Legislatures. I have seen a decided majority elected to the Pennsylvania Legislature at its last session, for the express purpose of producing bank reform; and I have seen that majority reduced to a minority, and that Legislature obeying the directions and dictations of bank agents. I have seen that Legislature, or a part of it, violate their pledges to the people, and grant to the banks all they asked or desired, by passing a law legalizing a suspension of specie payments—a violation of the laws of common honesty. I have known the Legislatures of other States of the Union to do the same thing; and I cannot expect the members of this House to be more than human beings, and be able to resist the posse of bank directors, presidents and cashiers who I now see thronging our hall, and leading members out of their seats to importune and operate on them. Under all these circumstances, I have reason to fear that the bill will pass as it did two years since, just as the bankers wish it; yet I will not be deterred from doing my duty. I will raise my voice, feeble as it is, to protect all classes, but particularly the humble but industrious part of the community, by asserting on this floor their grievances. If I fail in protecting them from the ruthless gripe of bankers, it shall not be for want of a will to do it.

I propose, by the first clause of the amendment, to make the president and directors of the banks liable for their acts in their individual capacities. It is no more than right that they should be restricted by the fear of personal accountability, for men, as corporations, will do things that they will not do when made liable for their acts. Were I creating a new bank, I would include, in this individual liability, the stockholders to the amount of the stock subscribed; but as most of the stock of the banks now before us is in the hands of persons who purchased it under their present charters, and as it would have the appearance of unfairness to create a new liability against them, I will not go to that extent. The second clause of the amendment is intended to prohibit the banks from declaring dividends while they refuse to pay their debts. No honest man can object to such a provision.

The third clause of the amendment is for the purpose of enabling individuals to bring suit and recover debts from the banks. At present, the judges of the courts here claim and exercise the right to issue injunctions at the instance of the banks when sued for their notes, prohibiting justices of the peace from entering a judgment even where there was no defence. As proof of this fact, I will refer the members of this body to House document No. 53 of the extra session of 1837. In that document, it will be found that James H. Causten sued one of the banks for notes which the officers refused to pay; that the judge of the district court issued an injunction prohibiting the justice of the peace entering a judgment, and that the prohibition was obeyed. No affidavit of defence on the merits was filed; and all that was alleged in the affidavit was, that the Bank was unable to pay its notes, and that the plaintiff bought them. Is it not time to enact some law to prevent the repetition of such a gross violation of law and justice. Here is proof that even the judiciary is made to subserve the corrupt practices of the banks. The president of the Bank of the Metropolis not content with the use he made of the court, to defraud the holder of his own notes, waylaid Causten, knocked him down with a club and beat him, in order, no doubt, to deter others from asking for their rights. There is another instance of the gross dishonesty of the officers of this same bank, which is a matter of record in the proceedings of this House. At the extra session of 1837, the Speaker deposited the money, for the pay of the members of the House of Representatives in the Bank of the Metropolis. Roderick Dorsey, the Sergeant-at-Arms, as honest and confiding a man as lives, not doubting the honesty of men who make such large professions as the bank officers, took the specie to the bank in bags and boxes; but when he came to count it out, there was a deficiency of nearly four thousand dollars. This deficiency the bankers refused to make good, although the whole money was counted by one of the clerks of the bank, when disbursed, and the books of the bank, when compelled by a committee of the House of Representatives to exhibit them, showed that the deficiency did exist. This is a specimen of bank morality, and this is one of the institutions for which the Whigs of this House claimed the sympathy of its members. I could state other instances of bank morality, which would startle even the Whigs, but I will confine myself to what is of record and easy of proof. I will ask any honest man if restrictions, by legal enactments, inflicting personal punishment on bank officers, and giving a true and summary remedy to individuals against banks, is not absolutely necessary to prevent such gross tyranny and dishonesty as I have quoted, and which no man on this floor dare attempt to deny or even apologize for?

It is not long since my colleague [Mr. OGLE] anathematized the President of the United States as a "horrible specimen of aristocracy" because he rode in a plain carriage with two horses; but we hear no complaints from him, or any other of the bank party in this House, of the aristocracy of the president of one of the insolvent banks of this city, who has his coach and four grey horses, with several liveried servants as outriders, driving along the streets of this city. He may well afford to have his coach and four, with servants in livery, when his bank, of which I am told he is the principal stockholder, can pay its debts of several hundred thousand dollars at 59 cents on the dollar. I do not know this man, and if half I have heard of him be true, I hope I never may be his associate. If, Mr. Speaker, you or I were allowed to contract debts to the extent these people have, and pay them in the same way, we too might have a coach and four; but would we have that sympathy which the sage legislators have expressed here for those insolvent banks? Would we be permitted to pay our debts at that rate and yet have property to the amount of thousands of dollars untouched? No sir, we would not, as individuals, be permitted to do so; but as corporators and bankers, I have no doubt but we would be, provided we used the proper means to enlist the sympathies of members!

We have been told by the member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] that we dare not refuse to extend the charters of these banks, for if we do not extend them we will not receive our pay as members. I had supposed that the Government of the United States provided the means to pay its officers, and it is news to me that members are dependent on banks for their pay. I have no doubt that some are dependent on them for one kind of pay, in the shape of fair business transactions; but not for their per diem. I have always held that every man has his price if that price can be ascertained. I have no wish to claim exemption from the common frailty of human nature, but I can assure the gentleman that if he rates himself at eight dollars per day, that price will not buy me. I will willingly sacrifice my pay rather than be the means, by my vote, of encouraging such public swindling by an extension of these bank charters without sufficient provisions to restrain them from a repetition of their past acts, or providing means of summarily punishing the guilty individuals.

If, as the gentleman from Massachusetts says, the Government did get the money from the banks, does he wish us to suppose that it was without its being paid for? Does not every man know that bankers are all Shylocks? They require not only "the last pound of flesh nearest the heart," but take the heart also without mercy. But the Government does not get the money to pay the members, from the banks.

The bank partisans, by misrepresentations of this kind, are continually endeavoring to induce a belief that banks are essential to the well-being of the Government; but the truth of this matter is, that so far from the Government being benefited by the banks, the contrary is the fact. The Speaker of the House of Representatives has been in the habit of drawing from the Treasury of the United States the whole amount necessary to pay the members, and depositing in one of the banks, from which it is drawn as wanted during the session.

The Democratic members of this body have but yesterday declared their willingness to separate the Government from the banks, and I hope they will show by their votes, on the bill now before the House, that they are as ready to protect the individuals who compose the community, as they are the Government, from fraud and imposition. The contest between the banks and the country is not yet ended. The campaign is only fairly commenced; and he that thinks differently will find his mistake if he lives a few years. The bankers wield a power more dangerous to the liberty of the people than an army of one hundred thousand foreigners would be, and the banks act openly or covertly as may best suit their views, or the subject to be acted upon. The first victory in favor of the people over the banks—the Independent Treasury law—is only half won. Vigilance is the watchword, and perseverance the only guarantee of success. I hope the Democrats will be found recording their names on the present question consistently with their votes yesterday, so as to strengthen that measure. We will then be able to show to the State Legislatures an example worthy of being followed, and will be entitled to receive from our constituents, when we return to them, the cordial and gratifying welcome of "well done ye good and faithful servants." The eyes of the American people are upon us, anxiously waiting to see whether we will retrograde or advance; whether we will row one way and look another; and whether the banks and their influences are as formidable and successful as they always have been in legislative halls. Have we not every motive to resist wrong and to do our duty?

Mr. Speaker, I had intended only to submit my amendments to the bill, without any remarks, until the friends of the banks showed a disposition to stifle all inquiry. I have now occupied much more of the time of the country than I had thought I would; but the importance of the subject requires it. I now close.

Mr. P. then submitted the following amendments:

Provided, also, That the president and directors of each of said banks shall be jointly and severally, in their individual capacity, liable for all notes issued or debts contracted by said banks respectively, from and after the day this act goes into effect, to be recovered as other debts of like amount may at the time be by law recoverable.

And be it further provided, That the said banks shall not make any division of profits, or declare any dividends, during the time said banks shall refuse to pay all their liabilities in specie on demand; and the president and directors of any of said banks, who shall make any such division of profits, or declare any such dividend, or consent to or vote for the same, shall be liable to pay double the amount of the sum so divided or declared, to be recovered of them in their individual capacity, by any person suing for the same as debts of like amount are recoverable, one-half of said forfeiture to go to the person suing, and the other half to the corporation where said bank is located.

Be it further enacted, &c. That justices of the peace within the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction in all actions of debt against any of the banks whose charters are hereby extended, for sums not exceeding $100, and no appeal, certiorari, or injunction, shall be allowed, granted, issued, or directed, by any court within said District, unless an affidavit be first made and placed in said court by the president, or one or more of the directors, of the bank so sued, that such appeal, certiorari, or injunction, is not asked for the purpose of delay, but because he or they believe there is a just defence on the merits, and that injustice is likely to be done if said appeal, certiorari, or injunction, should not be granted.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said: it was not necessary to the purpose he had in view, in the few remarks he intended to submit, to classify the House by denominating one portion of it bank men, and another party enemies of the banks. Nor was it his purpose to cast imputations upon gentlemen because they happened to be connected with banks. It was his pleasure to know some of the gentlemen who were connected with the institutions in question, and it was but just to them to say that they were gentlemen for whom he entertained very high respect. Still, he felt it his duty to say that the bill under consideration, considering the situation in which all the banks of this District now exhibited themselves, was a very extraordinary one. They were in a state of suspension—of open delinquency—of open violation of the law that created them; and while in this condition, they came and asked for an unqualified extension or renewal of their charters. It could not be, that after our doings of yesterday, we were prepared to vote for this bill, without any amendment to drive the banks back to their duty. What a spectacle would we exhibit to the nation by so doing. It was our incumbent duty to set a better example to the States. The facility with which the banks of the several States now-a-days suspended specie payments was, indeed, a reproach to our country. An honorable merchant, during a pecuniary or commercial revulsion, would often times sacrifice hundreds of thousands of dollars to maintain his credit and integrity; but, according to the ethics of banks, they suspended specie payments whenever it became a little inconvenient to maintain them. Indeed, they seemed to suspend some times for pretty much the same reason that Betty assigned for skinning her eels, "BECAUSE THEY LIKED IT." It was high time that we at least should set our face against the facility with which the banks assumed this unjust—this demoralizing position. That portion of the House that was now coming out for the recharter of these suspended banks, had always told us that it was the duty of Congress to regulate the currency of the country—that the friends of the Administration were subject to the reproach of permitting an important power, conferred upon us by the Constitution, to lie dormant. And was this a specimen of the manner in which they would put this alleged power into execution? Was this the mode in which they would "regulate the currency"—recharter a batch of banks, that are daily in the open violation of law and duty? They could not pay their debts, or redeem their bills; but what could they do—what had they done under our very eyes? Why make dividends of profits while in a state of suspension—yes, PROFITS made at a time when the poor market woman, with one of their notes, was liable to be shaved to the tune of from five to ten per cent. Were we prepared to legalize such doings, by voting for an unqualified renewal of these charters; one that would involve no rebuke for, but would rather sanction, their past and present demerits? If we passed this bill, what a beautiful commentary would it be upon our doings of yesterday—a day signalized by the passage of that great measure of reform! He would never consent to vote for the bill, unless a provision was inserted that the banks should resume specie payments within thirty, or, at farthest, sixty days. As matter of example and principle, this bill extended in its operation beyond the ten miles square. It was commensurate with the Union. By passing it in its present state, we would proclaim to the world, to the institutions of the States, the immoral sentiment that a state of suspension is not a state of palpable and most reprehensible delinquency.

After some remarks by Messrs. BRIGGS and WADDY THOMPSON, and JOHNSON of Maryland, in favor of the bill, and Mr. MARK A. COOPER in favor of certain amendments proposed by himself, compelling specie payments, and prohibiting the issue of notes of less denomination than $10, $20, and $30, at given periods.

Mr. STEENROD took the floor, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot meet the earnest request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] who has just taken his seat, and give my vote for this bill without disregarding my party predilections and party principles. I understand that the bill under consideration proposes to continue the existence of the incorporated banking institutions of this District until July of the year 1842; I also understand that those institutions, with a single exception, are all acknowledged to be in a state of suspension, in direct violation of their charters; or, in other words, in open and public insurrection against the laws. Shall we, then, in view of this condition of things, confer on these institutions the exclusive right to issue paper as a measure of value, without imposing on them corresponding obligations to meet their engagements with the holders of their notes? Shall we give to them the incorporated privileges to withdraw from circulation the gold and silver to be hoarded up in their vaults, and to issue in its stead, to this people, their depreciated and irredeemable paper? These, in fact, are the questions submitted to our consideration, and these are the affirmative propositions maintained in this bill. By whom are such principles as these advocated and sustained here? and who are the friends of the bill now under consideration? The same members of this House who have so often denounced, and the same party which has deprecated, the great public measure providing for the safekeeping, transfer, and disbursing the revenues of the Government, as an innovation that would furnish two currencies—one for the Government, and another for the people. But chartered privileges to such institutions as these, to withdraw from circulation, and to hoard up all the gold and silver currency and to issue their irredeemable and depreciated paper, they can approve and support. Yes, sir, the banks may use and hoard up the better currency, and issue the legalized worse currency for the people, and these gentlemen can view the act with composure and complacency; but they are convulsed with indignation, and startled with apprehension, at a simple public measure that proposes to collect and pay out the revenues of the Government in gold and silver; and can see, in such a measure as that, one currency furnished for the Government, and another for the people. To those gentlemen who would condemn what they may suppose to be the tendency of a measure of the Government, and approve a like measure in the banks, I have nothing to say. But, sir, what are the arguments advanced here in support of this bill, and what has been said by its friends to commend it to our support? We have been informed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] that the adjoining States (and Virginia and Maryland have been mentioned) have passed similar acts to this, and, therefore, we should copy the precepts of this State legislation, and do likewise. I had supposed, sir, that it rather became us, as legislators, to set an example of wise and good legislation, and not to follow the bad or imprudent legislation of particular States. I have never seen an act in the statute book of Virginia similar to the bill now under consideration. It is true the State of Virginia has legalized the suspension of the State banks, but never without at least giving an apparent protection to the note holders as a remedy for the abuse of this privilege.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] expressed great surprise that any one here should intimate that these institutions were "swindling concerns." Sir, I here in my place, before this House and the country at large, arraign those institutions and charge this upon them, and invite an examination of the proofs. I will not here refer to the conclusive evidence adduced to day by my able and eloquent young friend from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] of the frauds of these institutions, but to the acknowledged facts in their history. The rights of the people have been abridged to confer on those institutions high privileges and profitable immunities, and in return for which, these institutions have assumed responsible trusts, beneficiary functions to this community. How have they demeaned themselves in their offices? Have they discharged, with fidelity and probity, the duties imposed on them by virtue of their charters as a consideration for the exclusive rights granted them? No, sir. They have closed their doors, and pertinaciously refused to pay their just debts, while they have, on the other hand, exacted from the debtor community uniform reduction or payment of their obligations. They have assumed to keep their paper at its par value, convertible into gold and silver at the will of the holder; they have disregarded their public engagements, and have suffered their paper to depreciate, and the loss to fall on the community. While, as public institutions, created to subserve the public interest, (and they should have subserved the public interest by preserving a sound currency,) they have, as brokers and stockjobbers, deranged the exchanges by their undue exactions and extortions. With these offences, then, resting on those institutions, the gentleman may entertain no surprise that any one here should "intimate that these banks were swindling concerns."

But we have been appealed to not apply to our legislation for the people of this District our rigid party principles! To this I must answer, that I have no two sets of principles, one for my immediate constituents, and another for what I believe is intended for the especial benefit of the bankers here. If, as an American citizen, I would ever disdain to seek or accept of any franchise or privilege from this or any other legislative body, which was not to be conferred alike on all my countrymen, as an American legislator, I will ever refuse to confer immunities on one portion of my fellow-citizens, that are denied to or withheld from others. We have been told, by the high and distinguished authority of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] that the respective Legislatures have refused, yes, that they have been afraid to carry out the principles of the Republican party on the subject of the currency; and therefore (I suppose the argument is) that we, too, should refuse, and prove ourselves afraid to do so. But, sir, these are not the tenets of the political school in which I was educated. One who has imbibed an early reverence for the men of the Revolution, and who entertains great respect for those time-honored exemplars of American principles, would first rather study the virtue and utility of a public measure, to know whether it was to promote the good of the community at large before passing upon it; and if it was for the public good, then be not discouraged by fears, or swerved from his honest purposes, by the rash and reckless denunciations of others; but pursue the even tenor of his way until he shall witness a consummation of his principles.

Our organic State laws of distribution in descents, and the prohibition of entailments and primogeniture, have been cited as a barrier to the encroachments of these corporations. It is true that these laws were established to fortify our Democratic Government, and to prevent the encroachments of property on right. But no protection is afforded by these laws, if the respective legislative bodies will create and multiply a swarm of corporations for the purpose of amassing and managing property; "corporations, whose distinguishing attribute is to live forever, and whose legal entity may for ever remain the same." "Property thus holden in perpetual succession, cannot come under the full operation of our statutes of distribution." The privileged corps, which are thus fortified, are rendered more formidable to equal rights and liberty, than they could be by the English statutes of entails and primogeniture. What protection can there be to the masses, if valuable immunities are denied to individuals and conferred on corporations? Exclusive privileges and monopoly are as dangerous in an incorporated association of persons as in the person of a nobleman or lord; and the Government that would distinguish in favor of one over the other, by conferring power, but shows its folly by adding to crime. These organic laws of our States but demonstrate that these irresponsible powers are opposed to the genius of our institutions and popular freedom; and as such, as Americans, we should wage against it an earnest war—open hostility.

The gentleman from South Carolina also disconrsed most eloquently on the banking institutions of the country, and ascribed to them a magic influence in forwarding the construction of roads and improvements generally, in the States. But, sir, if I were to ask the gentleman what was the immediate agent employed in constructing these improvements, the only correct answer that he could give would be, that it was not the capital nor the banks, but the labor of the country that was entitled to this high commendation, for the erection of those enduring monuments, those magnificent improvements. I have heard labored efforts here to justify and excuse the suspension by these banking institutions, but all the arguments are alike inconclusive and unsatisfactory to my mind. There is but one moral code for the government of man, either in public or private life, or of parties. A justification of these institutions is a departure from hat code. A bank suspension is a violation of Public engagements; it is a fraud perpetrated on the community by these corporations; and no legislative body could be justified in sustaining or legalizing it; such a principle could not be sustained morally in an individual or a corporation. Public faith, public justice, and national honor, forbid it.

Sir, I look upon this as but a struggle between the note holders and the note makers—between the bankers and the people; one laboring for privileges and monopoly, and the other for equal rights; one for honest and just legislation, and the other for partial and unjust government. These are the antagonist and opposing principles involved in this question—principles that concern every man in the country. The bill under consideration not only proposes to legalize the actions of these suspended banks, and their consequent frauds on the public, but to confer extraordinary privilege and the right of monopoly on these associations of bankers. Yes, sir, we are about to be most partial and extremely indulgent to these delinquent bankers; indulgent, that they may not be compelled to toil and labor—that the elements may not visit them too roughly—that they may loiter on their walks of pleasure, and loll in their mansions of royal splendor. You authorize them to issue their false measure of value, and to be tax gatherers, to feed on the substance of the body politic, while the honest laborer, who, in the heat of summer and the blasts of winter, exposed to all the vicissitudes of the seasons and the times, is left to toil for his daily maintenance. Yes; on the poor laborer you impose the tax of this depreciated and irredeemable paper, and a great proportion of the loss in consequence of its frequent and periodical failure. You virtually say to him, "we impose on you, by our laws, a paper currency, as an exclusive measure of value, but you shall not circulate your notes at its trade value: the Government will not authorize or permit your paper as a currency, for that privilege or monopoly is exclusively confined to and conferred on these bankers." This is counter to that Democratic principle which ever seeks to protect the weak, to elevate the depressed, and to secure to all just and equal rights. Where, then, do the members of this House get their authority for this partial legislation? Are we not returned here as the representatives of all the great interests of the country—as well the rights and interests of the laborer, as the rights and interests of the capitalist—to protect the one from the natural and instinctive encroachments of the other, and to secure the other in its proper and appropriate possessions? Why, then, should one of these great interests of the country elicit so much of our sympathy, and engage so much of our favor and partiality? Do I hear the whisper—that the public good requires it? I deny it. The history of the country—its periodical embarrassments—admonishes us rather to reduce than to increase the number of the banking institutions. The depressed condition of business, the unexampled and precarious condition of labor, and the agonizing shrieks of the thoughtless intoxicated trader and speculator, with which our ears in this hall are so frequently assailed, have all been traced to the expansion and contraction of the paper machinery of the banks. We must, then, commence to retrace our steps, and to restore the country and its business to a sound and healthy condition. To enable us to do that, we must not credit the prediction that great distress will be consequently produced in this community if those institutions are ordered to wind up their affairs. No proposition is more clear and conclusive in political economy than that nothing is added to the actual capital of a country by instituting banks, or the issuing of paper money. But the credit system, we will be told, can only be sustained by banks that have the authority to issue paper as a circulation, and their present chartered immunities. This, I believe, is likewise untrue and fallacious—a sound and well regulated system of credit can be preserved in the country without these extraordinary chartered privileges being conferred on banks. The instincts of capital always seek employment. If it is to be found oftener under the seal of the act of incorporation of a bank, it is because it is its present fastness—its stronghold. Withhold these acts of incorporation which confer exclusive privileges on the capitalists here, and the natural laws which govern capital must still prevail; and it cannot, therefore, remain unemployed—it will still go into the market and seek to pass into the hands of labor; and though under this direction the profits of capital may not be so great, its acts and influence so powerful, still its advantage to the public will not be impaired by the absence of its incorporated privileges and monopoly.

Sir, I am nauseated with this daily nostrum, that the credit system of this country is confined to your bank parlors, and in the exclusive keeping of your bankers, who, to preserve it, must be endowed with incorporated privileges and monopoly. The history of my own State might be adduced as a memorable example to contradict this position. From the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1788 to 1804, banks were unknown in our State legislation. What people were more pure than this people at that period? When was our commerce greater? Or what portion of the world was more prosperous than the Old Dominion at that time? That was the period in our history when honesty and industry were esteemed virtues, necessary to constitute the respectable man and citizen. Every farmer's desk in Virginia, at this period, was adorned with some gold and silver, and never had we less inconvenience and cost in transporting money from point to point. This, then, was done by our traders and merchants before we had learned the magic of creating corporations with monopolizing privileges. The merchants were then honest and accommodating, and their credit was better than your banks. Bank suspensions and explosions, and bank irresponsibility, have impaired public confidence in this modern system of credit. The system that will promise to pay to-day, and be authorized with impunity to refuse payment by to-morrow, may be approved by the swindler, but not by the honest man. If the Commonwealth of Virginia, then, at this period, could prosper without the aid of banking institutions, it might be supposed that this District of ten miles square could do likewise. Where are the enduring monuments and boasted testimonials of the utility of your system here? Will I be pointed to the superb cities and magnificent improvements that adorn this ten miles square? These are but the evidence of the profligacy of this Government, and of the munificence of the legislators for this orphan territory. Where are your chambers of commerce, with their evidence of enterprise—the rich garnerings of the product of labor and trade? Where are the streets crowded with enterprising merchants and tradesmen, and where the busy hum of industry in the workshops and manufactories? Or where are the fields which have been made to blossom under the toil of the husbandman, as an evidence of the good effects of the modern credit system on this District? You may look here in vain for testimony of this kind, as an argument why these institutions should be rechartered. But, on the other hand, look at the poor country around this city, that seems never to have had employed upon it the renovating hand of industry. This may be a portion of the fruits of that paper system, of bank facilities and credit, which is so prolific of evil; a system, the effect of which is to lead men to believe they can live without industry and labor.

Mr. HOLMES of South Carolina then delivered an animated appeal against the ruinous consequences which must instantly follow to this District, should the bill be rejected. He avowed himself the friend of credit, and said he had voted for the Independent Treasury bill not to destroy, but to give it stability.

Mr. RYALL of New Jersey made a short speech in most decided opposition to the bill; but if it must pass, he was for Mr. PETRIKIN's amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD spoke for the bill, urging the distress which must ensue should it fail.

Mr. U. in the close, moved the previous question.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD withdrew the call for the previous question, on condition that Mr. WELLER of Ohio, who obtained the floor, should renew it.

Mr. WELLER then took the floor, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I cannot consent to give a silent vote on the important question now presented to the consideration of the House. I would be doing injustice to my own feelings, and to the generous warm-hearted friends at home who have honored me with a place in this hall, were I to sit quietly in my seat and suffer a bill, involving principles of such deep and vital importance to our free Government, to become a law. I trust I shall obtain the attention of gentlemen while I present my objections to this bill, although I have but little hope that any thing I can say will induce members to record their votes against it. It comes to us endorsed by the Senate, and, judging from past legislation, I have no doubt it will pass this House before to-morrow's sun shall have set. I desire, however, to give it an especial kick, by way of showing my disapprobation of it, and the principles upon which it is supported.

Permit me to say, that I regret that the friends of this measure did not present it at an earlier period in the session. We have now been here seven months, and when we are within three weeks of an adjournment, a bill is presented for the extension of the charters of the banks of this District, and an effort made, by the application of the previous question, to push it through this House, without allowing members an opportunity of examining its merits and demerits, or inquiring into their actual condition. It is true, we have a short and imperfect report made out by the officers of these banks, exhibiting partially the condition of these institutions, but I venture the affirmation that not a dozen members of this House have looked into that document. Besides, I would much prefer a report made by a committee of this House. I would have more confidence in their statements than in the exhibit of bank officers.

The bill now under consideration proposes to extend the charters of six banks in this District for two years. It proposes to continue their corporate existence for two years, from the 4th of July, instant. Some of these banks have been in existence for more than thirty years. The original charters are to be found in the book I now hold in my hand; and I ask gentlemen, before they vote for the act now before the House, to examine these charters, and see the almost unlimited powers conferred by them. Let gentlemen look into them, and tell me whether they would be willing this day to incorporate banks, with such tremendous powers; and if they would be unwilling to do this, then I ask, how can they vote to extend them? The act now before us will confer on them all the powers and privileges conferred in the original charter.

But, sir, I am told that this act is simply designed to enable the banks to wind up their affairs, and settle up their concerns! This is not the first time this plea has been made. On the 4th May, 1820, an act was passed by Congress, extending the charters of the banks in the District "then paying specie, and during such times only as said banks should continue to pay specie," to the 1st June, 1822. This act may be found in vol. 8, Laws of the United States, page 53. On the 2d March, 1821, an act passed, extending the charters of these banks to the 3d March, 1836, (see vol 8, United States Laws, page 19.) It was then pretended, as now, that it was necessary to do this, in order to enable the banks to wind up. But, sir, you find them in 1836, when their charters again expired, asking a further extension for the same purpose; and an act was accordingly passed, on the 2d July of that year, extending their charters to the 4th July, 1838. See Laws of the United States, vol. 9, page 447. Well, sir, did the expiration of this act find their affairs settled up? Did they proceed to wind up their business in accordance with the understanding of the time? No; but they again, whilst under suspension, come in, and ask for another renewal—a little more time to settle up! On the 31st May, 1838, an act passed renewing their charters to the 4th July, 1840, upon three conditions, two of which I ask leave to read:

"Second. To redeem all their notes of the denomination of $5 in gold and silver, from and after the 1st day of August, in the present year.

"Third. To resume specie payments in full, on or before the first day of January, in the year 1839, or sooner if the principal banks of Baltimore and Richmond shall sooner resume specie payments in full." See Laws of United States, vol. 9, page 765.

Now, sir, the 4th of July, 1840, being the period at which this act expires, is near at hand, and they are again at our door, asking for two years more! It becomes us, then, to inquire, whether they have complied with the requisitions of the law to which I have just adverted. The obligation to pay specie for their notes was a condition precedent, and the banks were bound to perform it, before they could exercise any of the privileges conferred by the act. The very moment they refused to comply with that condition, that very moment their corporate existence ceased, and they could no longer legitimately exercise the power of banking. This position, it seems to me, is so palpable and plain that it needs no argument to establish it. Well, sir, have they performed this condition? Have they observed the restrictions and limitations imposed on them by this act? The fact is stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and is notorious, that they have suspended specie payments, and are refusing to redeem their notes! For more than eight months past have they been standing out in open violation of the law, and yet they have the effrontery, the unblushing impudence, to present themselves before Congress, and ask for an extension of their charters to the 4th July, 1842! Such a daring outrage upon decency and propriety should not be tolerated. They have suffered their notes to depreciate at their own doors from six to twelve per cent. and yet we are told that their charters must be renewed! They have, it is true, set at defiance the positive enactments of Congress, laughed at the restrictions imposed on them; and yet we are to endure and countenance all this, and submit to another extension! Sir, I care not what course other members may pursue, but I cannot, as a Representative of the people, give my sanction to such an act. I would be recreant to the trust confided to me, as one of the watchmen on the tower of liberty, were I not to sound the alarm, and warn my countrymen against the strides these incorporations are making towards swallowing up the legislative power of this country.

But, sir, I have said that we have no report enabling us to understand the precise condition of these institutions, which we are now called upon to incorporate. I have, however now before me a report made to the House in 1836, by a committee, to which I call the especial attention of members. We may judge of their present conduct, from what has taken place heretofore. My friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] who made a few remarks against this act, was charged with intimating that these banks had been dishonestly managed. Sir, if he had so alleged, he would have been sustained by the record now before me. I ask the friends of this swindling system to examine this document, and see the heavy loss sustained by the citi ens of this District, by the failure of these institutions, before they record their votes.

In order that gentlemen may see that I am not speaking without the book, I ask leave to read the following extract from the report before alluded to:

"In 1821, there were in the District of Columbia eleven banks, the capital of which amounted to $5,214,641; of these, four, whose capitals amounted to $1,994,694, have since failed. At different periods, at the time of their failure, they had of notes in circulation, private and public deposites, the aggregate sum of $741,037. The committee have not had time to ascertain precisely what proportion of these stocks was ever in fact paid in originally; neither do they know exactly what part of these deposites and circulation, if any, have been or will be paid or redeemed; but from the price at which the obligations of these institutions have been sold in the market, it is not unreasonable to conclude that the United States, (the deposites of which alone in these banks exceeded $450,000,) and the people of the District, have lost in capital, circulation, and deposites, a sum exceeding one million seven hundred thousand dollars!

"The other seven banks, chartered in 1821, (all of which are now petitioning for a recharter,) had originally capital, amounting together to $3,279,629, of which they have severally purchased up to the amount of $1,258,887, and have now in pledge stock for debts to the amount of $205,488 70, which leaves actual capital paid in $1,815,252 30, being $1,464,376 70, less than the amount with which these institutions commenced operations.

"Here again the committee must say, that they have not had time to ascertain precisely the sum for which each share of this stock has been purchased by the several banks. That would be a work of some labor, and without it an opportunity is not offered to decide how large or how small is the amount of the speculation which has been made by those who hold the residue of the stock of these banks. But it may be safely assumed, that when a large proportion of the capital stock of a bank has been purchased in by the institution, there has been gross mismanagement of its affairs. It is imprudent for a bank, having notes in circulation, to own or loan largely on pledges of its own stock, and it is indubitable that large amounts of the stock of a bank, skilfully conducted, would not be so far below par, that no purchaser could be found for it, when pledged to secure the payment of a loan at six per cent. but the bank itself.

"From the testimony of a respectable broker, to be found in the appendix, it appears that the stocks of two of these banks have sold as low as fifty per cent. below par.

"It would be a work of interminable labor to attempt to ascertain what sum has been lost to the community by the depreciation of the notes and obligations, other than stock certificates, of the seven banks now under consideration; or rather, it should be said of three out of those seven, for the committee do not know that the notes of the Bank of Metropolis, the Union Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of Potomac, or the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, have ever been below par. Neither will the committee undertake to estimate the loss to the public sustained by the depreciation of the obligations of the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank of Washington, or of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, occasioned chiefly by their suspension of specie payments in 1834; neither will they now express an opinion as to the justice or propriety of that measure. There is, in the appendix, much evidence to enable the House to decide intelligently on those matters; but they can and will advert to portions of that evidence, in support of proof already given, to show that the people of this District have been grievously injured by the manner in which these banks have been managed; and that it is the solemn duty of Congress to deliberate calmly, and endeavor to provide some guards against a recurrence of those mischiefs, regardless of the clamorous demands of those interested in the existing banking establishments, many of whom, too, have profited largely by their abuses.

"There were four banks in the District which suspended specie payments in 1834; one of them (the Bank of Alexandria) has not applied for a recharter, and, consequently, no means have been taken to ascertain the extent of the depreciation of its various obligations in the hands of the holders. At the time of failure, its capital was $500,000; of which $115,565 had been taken by the bank in payment of debts. Its notes in circulation, its public and private deposites, amounted to $152,167. As this bank has not yet settled with the holders of its obligations, it cannot be said, with certainty, how much of this amount of property has been lost to the public; but we feel warranted in estimating that at least sixty per cent. of it (say $350,000) may be added to the large sums heretofore named, which have been taken from the profits of labor, and been absorbed by adventurers and speculators in currency and stocks. What amount of the stock or paper, of the other three banks which suspended specie payments, changed hands at a discount, cannot be stated fully. It appears, from the testimony of several witnesses who have been examined, and whose testimony is appended to this report, that large amounts of the stock and notes of these three banks, changed hands, at a discount at from fifteen to sixty per cent. And the committee regret to discover that several of the directors of these institutions, some of whom had, by their own acts, depreciated their obligations, entered the market, and purchased freely the stock and notes of the banks of which they were directors, at a discount, and then paid the paper, thus obtained, into the bank at par, in discharge of the debts due from them thereto. The extent of these and other speculations in the currency, of the four banks, may be measurably estimated from the fact that they had in circulation and in deposites, at the time of suspension, $696,471; more than one-half of which obligations, together with these stocks, probably changed hands in sixty days after the suspension, at an average of thirty per cent. discount to the original holder. A considerable porportion of the profits of which operations, it appears, were made by the directors of these institutions, whose speculations are certainly reprehensible, as they were largely indebted to the several banks committed to their care, at the time of their respective failures, and had it in their power, by paying in current funds, their own notes, to have postponed, and, in all probability, to have prevented entirely those disastrous speculations, by which they profited so much, while the community suffered so seriously."

From this report it will be seen that nearly a MILLION AND A HALF OF DOLLARS have been taken from the profits of the labor of the industrious mechanic of this District, and absorbed by these bank officers and swindling speculators. Has the power of the Federal Government become so weak, that it cannot protect the people of this District from these outrages? Have these institutions become so powerful, that they can no longer be controlled by legislation? If so, the days of our glory are numbered, and a moneyed aristocracy will soon be established upon the ruins of our Republican institutions; and this, the most glorious nation that ever existed, will be numbered with the things that "were, but are not."

That the House may fully understand the manner in which the officers of these institutions speculated in their own paper, I ask leave to read a small portion of the evidence taken under oath before that Committee:

First, I give you the evidence of William Jewell, a director of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown:

"The Bank failed during my absence in Baltimore. After my return, I told Mr. W. W. Corcoran that I wished to exchange property I had for stock of the bank, if he should hear of any that was for sale. In a few days he told me that a widow lady had stock, worth, at par value, $15,000, for which we gave her houses and lots assessed at about $8,000. I purchased, also, of another person, $225 worth of stock, at fifty dollars on the hundred. During the last winter, I purchased $3,700 worth of stock, at fifty-six dollars per hundred."

Next in order, I present the evidence of John Pickerell, a director of the same bank:

"I sold, to a lady in Georgetown, a house and lot, and took, in part payment, $2,900 worth of stock, at seventy-five cents on the dollar. I also exchanged property in Washington city, which had cost me less than $1,200, for $1,800 worth of stock. A few weeks ago, I purchased of a broker $3,750, for fifty-six dollars on the hundred."

One more extract, and I have done with this report. It is the tesmony of William Prout, a broker, of Washington city.

"I bought stock of the Washington Bank at fifty cents on the dollar, and Patriotic at seventy-five cents on the dollar. I bought paper of the Bank of Washington, and Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, at sixty-five cents on the dollar, and the Patriotic at sixty-five cents to the dollar. I purchased notes to an amount exceeding $80,000. * * * * * * * *

"I made frequent sales to the directors of the banks, at a small profit. Some was sold, I recollect, to E. Ingle, a director of the Patriotic Bank; to Edward Simmes, a director of the Bank of Washington; to William A. Bradley, president of the Patriotic Bank; to Jonathan Prout and S. J. Todd, directors in the Bank of Washington; and R. Simmes, a director of the Farmers' and Mechanics'

Bank of Georgetown. * * * * To some of these gentlemen I sold these notes, and took, in payment, their individual notes, at long dates, without interest."

Here, sir, you find these bank presidents and directors borrowing money out of the banks which they controlled, compelling, by their own acts, the banks to suspend, purchasing up their stock and notes at a discount of fifty per cent. and paying them in, as a discharge of their liabilities, at par! Is this a fair business transaction? Shall I be told that all this is honest? If it is so regarded here, then you must have a different standard of moral honesty from that which we have on the other side of the mountains.

Now I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether we are to incorporate institutions which have been managed in this way. Ought we, in any shape or form, to countenance this system of swindling? Why, sir, if you will give me an act of legislation that will enable me to discharge my debts with fifty cents on the dollar, I would be able to ride in as fine a four-horse coach, have as splendid an equipage, and as many servants in livery, as the president of either of these banks!

The passage of this act must have a deleterious influence over the action of the State Governments. Here, it is admitted, we have exclusive jurisdiction; and if we set the example of rechartering banks while in a state of suspension, who can tell how many of the States will follow in our footsteps? The immense power exercised by these institutions is truly alarming. You have now nearly a thousand of these shaving machines in the nation, the owners of which procure a livelihood by the sweat and toil of their neighbors. You will find the officers, agents, and dependants of the banks, in our National as well as State councils. In 1816, when the banking interest in this country was much less powerful than it is now, John Randolph of Roanoke said, upon this floor, "Every man you meet, in this House or out of it, with some rare exceptions, which only serve to prove the rule, is either a stockholder, president, cashier, clerk, doorkeeper, runner, engraver, paper-maker, or mechanic, in some way or other, to a bank."

Now, sir, I can turn round and see the officers of these District banks in the lobbies and galleries of this House, attempting, by their persuasive eloquence, to satisfy members that expediency and sound policy require their renewal! Yes, sir, they have obtruded themselves upon the deliberations of Congress, and are endeavoring to influence its action. Their anxious countenances bespeak the deep pecuniary interest they have in this measure. Gentlemen would have us believe that this bill will be an accommodation to the citizens of this District. Sir, it is a mistake. Some of these officers, who profess to be Democrats, have much more regard for their own pecuniary interests than the rights of their neighbors. These charters are to be extended, not for the accommodation of the industrious farmer or the hard-fisted mechanic, but in order to enable some of these lordly aristocrats, now in my eye, to enjoy luxury and ease at the poor man's expense.

I rejoice, Mr. Speaker, that there is a portion of the people of this District who are opposed to the renewal of these charters. I read you the memorial of a part of the citizens of Georgetown:

"The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of Georgetown, D. C. respectfully represents:

"That the suspension of payment by the banks of the District of Columbia is a gross and palpable violation of their charters, by which valuable privileges were conferred upon them; that it is an outrage upon the moral sense of the community in which they are situated; debasing and demoralizing in its tendency and example; and a grievous injury and oppression upon those who are compelled to take their notes at their nominal value in payment for their labor.

"That the mere association of a number of individuals, in the form of a chartered company, gives them no license for dishonesty, or impunity for crime, in their aggregate, more than in their individual capacity.

"That the banking institutions of the District having been chartered professedly for the purpose of promoting the interests and convenience of the inhabitants thereof, we are the best, and should be the only judges in what manner our interests and convenience are best promoted.

"That at the suspension of payment of the banks of this District, in the second week of October, 1839, they had in circulation upward of seven hundred thousand paper dollars, which by that act were depreciated twelve and a half per cent. inflicting a loss of upward of one hundred thousand dollars upon the holders thereof; that the rates of depreciation, since that period, have ranged from twelve and a half to eight per cent. thus filching from the working man from one-eighth to one-twelfth of the nominal amount received as the wages of his labor.

"That the practical operation of this state of things in the District is, that while those who are in the service of the Government receive their compensation in gold and silver, their neighbors are compelled to receive, as a return for their labor, depreciated bank paper; thus constituting, emphatically, one currency for the Government, and another for the people.

"They therefore pray your honorable body to take such measures as may, at the earliest possible day, compel the banks of the District to fulfil their obligations by the resumption of specie payments, or that they be required to assign their property for the benefit of their creditors, and wind up their affairs."

This memorial is signed by forty-nine citizens, and proves that there at least that number of free and independent men, who properly understand their interests, and dare to come into this House and protest against the extension of the charters of these suspended banks. Sir, I do not know, personally, a single individual upon that memorial; but they have my respect for the independence they have manifested in coming forward, bearding the lion in his den, and asserting the principles of Democracy, in despite of the frowns of these purse-proud bankers.

I cannot close my remarks without calling upon my Democratic friends to come up to the rescue. I invoke them to come forward and defeat this measure. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] tells us that this ought not to be made a party question! Sir, it is a party question—a question involving principles upon which the two parties in this country have divided. The subject of the currency has occupied the attention of this House for a large portion of the present session, and will continue to agitate the public mind for many years to come. The Democrats have been endeavoring to redeem the country from an irredeemable currency; they have been advocating the necessity of divorcing the General Government in its fiscal operations, from all connection with banks; they have been denouncing the present system as unjust, and in violation of every principle of equal rights; they have been zealous in exposing the swindling practices of these institutions, and calling upon the people to effect a radical reformation in them—and now, sir, are we to be told that a measure involving the question of whether banks which have violated the law, refused to comply with their contracts, mocked at your legislation, and purchased up at a heavy discount their own notes, should not be made a party question? Sir, fasten these irredeemable shinplaster manufactories upon the people, and, my word for it, the men who are now invoking you not to make this a party question will be the first to reproach you after the deed is done.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the political party with which I act will present an undivided front against this bill. I ask them to come up and meet this question manfully, and show by their votes their adherence to Democratic principles. If, however, in despite of the evidence I have produced, and the arguments which have been urged, they shall be rechartered, I shall have the proud consolation of knowing that I have raised my feeble voice against them.

July 2, 1840.

The following bill was introduced by Mr. HOLLEMAN of Virginia, viz:

A BILL to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia for certain purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the provisions, restrictions, and enactments of the act of Congress of the 25th May, 1838, entitled "an act to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia," be, and the same are hereby extended to the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank of Washington, the Bank of the Potomac and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria; Provided, That whenever in the original act the 1st of July, 1838, occurs, it shall be so construed as to mean the 4th of July, 1840; and whenever the 1st of July, 1842, occurs, it shall be construed to mean the 4th of July, 1844.

Mr. ADAMS inquired whether it made no distinction in favor of the Patriotic Bank, which never had suspended specie payments?

Mr. HOLLEMAN replied that it did not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice of his intention to offer the following amendment in case the bill of Mr. HOLLEMAN should not meet with favor:

"That the several acts of Congress creating and granting charters to the several banks in the District of Columbia which were in force on the 1st day of July, 1840, be, and the same are hereby, continued in full force for the term of two years from and after the 4th day of July, 1840: Provided, however, That no one of the existing banks shall declare or make any dividend of its profits among its stockholders during the time it fails to pay specie for its notes: And provided, further, That all the profits hereafter made by any one of the said banks over and above six per cent. upon its capital, clear of expenses, shall be paid over to the corporate authorities of the city in which such bank is located: And provided, further, That said banks shall severally resume the payment of specie for their notes thrown into circulation, within ninety days from the said 4th of July, 1840."

After a few remarks by Messrs. HOLLEMAN and UNDERWOOD,
